standing, however, the excellency of this translation, it must be acknowledged that our increasing acquaintance with oriental customs and manners, and the changes our language has undergone since king James's time, are very powerful arguments for a new translation, or at least a correction of the old one. A very considerable change has been unwarrantably introduced into the text in the subsequent editions, by turning into italics what did not thus appear in the editio princeps and several which followed it; by means of which, numerous passages are rendered unavoidably perplexing to the mere English reader. There have been various English Bibles with marginal references, by Canne, Hayes, Barker, Scattergood, Field, Tennison, Lloyd, Blayney, Wilson, Scott, and Bagster.

22. The Esquimaux version of the New Testament has been prepared at different times by the Moravian missionaries, and printed between the years 1809 and 1826.

23. The Estonian New Testament was first printed in 1685, and the whole Bible in 1689.

24. The Faroese Gospel of Matthew was printed at Copenhagen, 1823, for the use of the inhabitants of the Faroese Islands.

25. The Finish New Testament was first printed at Stockholm, 1548, and the whole Bible at the same place, 1642. It was executed by certain professors and clergymen well qualified for the task.

26. The Formosan version of the Gospels of Matthew and John, was prepared by Robert Junius, a Dutchman, and printed at Amsterdam in 1661.

27. The French Bible.—The oldest French Bible is the version of Peter de Vaux, (Waldo,) chief of the Waldenses, about the year 1160. Raoul de Preste translated the Bible into French in the reign of king Charles V. of France, about A. D. 1383. Besides these, there are several old French translations of particular parts of the Scripture. The doctors of Louvain published the Bible in French at Louvain, by order of the emperor Charles V., in 1550. There is a version by Isaac le Maître de Sacy, published in 1672, with explanations of the literal and spiritual meaning of the text, which was received with wonderful applause, and has often been reprinted. Of the New Testaments in French, which have been printed separately, one of the most remarkable is that of F. Amelotte, of the Oratory, composed by the direction of some French prelates, and printed, with annotations, in 1666, 1667, and 1670. The author pretends he had searched all the libraries in Europe, and collated the oldest manuscripts; but, in examining his work, it appears that he has produced no considerable various readings which had not before been taken notice of either in the London Polyglot, or elsewhere. The New Testament of Mons, printed in 1665, with the archbishop of Cambray's permission, and the king of Spain's license, made great noise in the world. It was condemned by pope Clement IX. in 1668, by pope Innocent XI. in 1669, and in several bishoprics of France at several times. The New Testament, published at Trevoux, in 1702, by M. Simon, with literal and critical annotations upon difficult passages, was condemned by the bishops of Paris and Meaux in 1702. F. Bohours, a Jesuit, with the assistance of F. F. Michael Teller and Peter Bernier, Jesuits, likewise published a translation of the New Testament in 1697; but this translation is for the most part harsh and obscure, which was owing to the author's adhering too strictly to the Latin text. There are likewise French translations published by Protestant authors; one by Robert Peter Olivetan, printed in 1535, and often reprinted with the corrections of John Calvin and others; another by Sebastian Casthalo, remarkable for particular ways of expression never used by good judges of the language. John Diodati likewise published a French Bible at Geneva in 1644; but some find fault with his method, in that he rather paraphrases the text than translates it. Faber Stapalensis translated the New Testament into French, which was revised and accommodated to the use of the Reformed churches in Piedmont, and printed in 1534. Lastly, John le Clerc published a New Testament in French at Amsterdam, in 1703, with annotations, taken chiefly from Grotius and Hammond; but the use of this version was prohibited by order of the States general, as tending to revive the errors of Sabellius and Socinus.

28. The Gaelic.—The New Testament in this language was first published in 1765; and the Old Testament, in three volumes, printed at different times, in 1785, 1787, and 1801. The translation has since been revised and improved, and new editions have issued from the press in 1807 and 1826.

29. The German versions.—Of these there exists a great number; but the most important are,—1. The version of Luther, of which the New Testament appeared in 1522, and the entire Bible in 1530; the different books appeared in the interval either separately or coupled together, as they were got ready. The edition of 1546 was printed under the reformer's immediate superintendance; and, giving to it all the perfection in his power, he was desirous that it should be considered as the standard copy of this great work. It was made immediately from the Hebrew and Greek originals; but in order to render it as correct as possible, he collected a number of learned men, to revise every sentence by a collation not only of the version with the original text, but with the Targums, the LXX, the Vulgate, and other versions. Of these, Melancthon appears to have taken the most active part in the assistance rendered to Luther. It is highly distinguished for its energy and perspicuity; and the style is so pure and elegant, as to be considered a model of the vernacular language even in the present day. 2. The version of Piscator, professor at Herborn, at which place it appeared in 1602. It was designed to give a closer rendering of the words and phrases of the original, and appears to have derived considerable coloring from the Latin version of Tremellius and Junius. It was in great repute among the members of the Reformed church. 3. The version of J. D. Michaelis, published between the years 1773 and 1791, and accompanied with notes for the unlearned, is professedly an improved translation of the Scriptures, according to more enlightened principles of criticism and interpretation. In many respects, it unquestionably possesses great merit; but the unwarrantable liberties which the author has not infrequently taken with the text, and the fondness for conjecture which he has indulged, detract from its claims on public confidence and adoption. 4. The version of Augusti and De Wette, 1809—1814, one of the last that has appeared in the German language, is certainly one of the best translations ever published in any language. Simple, close, yet easy and elegant, it must be read with pleasure; and though one of the translators is well known to occupy the first rank among the neologians of the present day, it is a remarkable circumstance that his peculiar dogmatical views appear to have exerted no influence on the version. Translations of the Bible into German existed some time before the Reformation: the oldest known was printed in the year 1466.

30. The modern Greek or Romaic version of the New Testament was made by Maximus Calliergi, and printed at Geneva, 1638. A translation of the Old Testament is now being made in Greece, under the auspices of the Bible Society.

31. The Greenlandish New Testament exists in two translations; the one printed in 1799, and the other in 1822.

32. The Grisonic.—The Bible, in the language or dialect of the Grisons, was published in 1719.

33. The Guzeratee version of the entire Scriptures has been made and printed for the use of the inhabitants of the peninsula of Guzerat.

34. The Hebrew New Testament.—Several attempts have been made to furnish a good translation of the books of the New Testament in the original language of the Old. The first edition is that of Elias Hutter, published in his Polyglot of 1599: the second was published by Professor Robertson in 1661, but most of the copies perished in the great fire of London: a third and greatly revised text was published by the Jews' Society in 1821; but the best is that lately executed by the lamented Mr. Greenfield, and published by Bagster in 1831.

35. The Helvetian.—In this language there are two versions: the former was executed by Leo Juda, and published between the years 1525 and 1529: the latter, called, by way of distinction, the New Zurich Bible, was made by the learned orientalist, Hottinger, assisted by several other biblical scholars of acknowledged ability. It was published at Zurich in 1667.

36. The Hindee or Hindustanee New Testament, prepared in two different translations by the Serampore missionaries, and by the Rev. Henry Martyn, is extensively in circulation among the inhabitants of Hindostan.

37. The Hungarian.—Besides a popish version made from the Vulgate, there exists a Protestant version, executed with great care by Caspar Caroli, and first published in 1589.

38. The Icelandic New Testament, done by O. Gottschalkson, was printed in 1539, at Copenhagen; and the whole Bible was published at Holum, in 1584, under the superintendence of bishop Thorlakson, who liberally contrived to defray the expense of the undertaking.

39. The Irish version of the New Testament was executed by Dr. Daniel, archbishop of Tuam; and that of the Old Testament by Mr. King, but revised by Dr. Bedell, bishop of Kilmore. The whole was printed in 1685, at the expense of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

40. The Italian.—The first Italian Bible, published by the Romanists is that of Nicholas Malermi, a Benedictine monk, printed at Venice in 1471. It was translated from the Vulgate. The version of Anthony Bruccioli, published at Venice in 1532, was prohibited by the council of Trent. The Calvinists likewise have their Italian Bibles. There is one of John Diodati, in 1607 and 1641; and another of Maximus Theophilus, in 1551, dedicated to Francis de Medicis, duke of Tuscany.

The latest version that has appeared in Italian is that of Martini, printed in 1769—1779.

41. The Karelian.—In this Finnish dialect the Gospel of Matthew was printed at Petersburg in 1820.

42—45. Into the Khasse, the Kashmeeree, the Kanoj, and the Kunkua dialects, versions of different portions of the Scriptures have been prepared by the missionaries of Serampore.

46. The Laponesc New Testament was first printed in 1755, and the whole Bible at the printing-office of Dr. Nordin, bishop of Hermand, in 1810.

47. The Lithuanian version of the Bible is said to have been first made by one Chylinskey, and printed in London, 1660; but it is merely stated by Le Long, without giving his authority. It was afterwards printed at Koenigsberg, 1735.

48. The Livonian or Lettish, made by Ernest Glück, was published at Riga, 1689.

49. The Lusatian, in what is called the Sorabic dialect of the Wendish, printed at Bautzen in 1728.

50. The Madagasse or Madagascare version of the New Testament has recently been completed by the missionaries belonging to the London Missionary Society.

51. The Mahratta version of the New Testament, and the historical books of the Old, have been prepared and printed at Serampore.

52. The Malay.—Into this language the entire Scriptures have been translated at different times by learned Dutchmen, connected with the East India company. The New Testament was printed in 1668, and the whole Bible in 1731, 1733, in Roman characters. It was afterwards printed in Arabic characters in 1758.

53. The Malayalim language, spoken on the coast of Malabar, has recently received a translation of the Scriptures by the Rev. B. Bailey, of the Church Missionary Society.

54. The Maltese, a remnant of the ancient Punic. Into this dialect the New Testament has been recently translated by a learned native, under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Jowett; and a version of the Old Testament is in progress.

55. The Manks New Testament was first printed in 1756—1760; and the whole Bible at Whitehaven, 1775.

56. The Mohawks has as yet only had the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John, and a few chapters of the Old Testament translated into their language.

57. Into the Mohegan language the whole of the New Testament, and several portions of the Old, were translated by the Rev. Mr. Freeman, but do not appear ever to have been printed.

58. The Mongolian Gospels have been prepared by Mr. J. Schmidt of Petersburg, with the assistance of two native Mongolians; and the whole of the Old Testament, in a very superior manner, by the Rev. Messrs. Swan and Stallytrass, missionaries in Siberia. The gospels were printed in 1815, 1816.

59. The Mordavian Gospels, translated and printed at Petersburg, 1821.

60. Into the Orissa language, the whole Bible has been translated by the Serampore missionaries; and the New Testament has already gone through two editions.

61. The Pali is the learned language of Ceylon and the Burman empire, and is spoken in South Bahar. The New Testament in this language was undertaken by W. Tolfrey, Esq., in 1813, and is being completed by the missionaries Chater and Clough.

62. Besides the Persic, specified among the ancient versions, there is a version of the four Gospels by Lieut. Col. Colebrooke, printed at Calcutta, 1804; a version of the New Testament, by the Rev. Henry Martyn, printed at Petersburg in 1815; and two distinct translations of the Old Testament are at present in progress: the one, by the Rev. William Glen, at Astracan; and the other by the Rev. T. Robinson, chaplain at Poonah.

63. The Polish language possesses three versions of the Scriptures; a Roman Catholic, a Protestant, and a Socinian version. The first was printed at Cracow in 1561; the last under the patronage, and at the expense of prince Radzivil, at Pinckzow, in 1563; and that of the Calvinistic Protestants in 1596. A version into the Judeo-Polish dialect has recently been prepared, and is now circulating among the Jews in that country.

64. The Pomeranian version, done from Luther's Bible, was printed in 1588. It is no longer in use.

65. The Portuguese has two versions; the one done by Protestants, and printed,—the New Testament at Amsterdam, 1681, and the Old Testament at Batavia, 1748—1753; and the other by Antonia Pereira, a Roman Catholic, from the Vulgate. The New Testament was printed at Lisbon in 1781, and the Old Testament in 1783.

66. The Pushtoo version of the New Testament, begun by Dr. Leyden, and finished by individuals employed by the Serampore missionaries, was printed in 1818. The version of the Old Testament, in the same language, is in progress.

67. The Punjabee or Sikh version of the entire Bible has been prepared and printed by the same individuals.

68. The Russian versions.—Into a Polish dialect of the Russian, a translation of the Pentateuch, and other parts of the Scriptures, was made by Dr. F. Scorina, and published, 1517—1525. A version of the entire Bible was made by Dean Glück towards the close of the seventeenth century, but the MS. was destroyed at the siege of Marienburg, in 1702. In consequence of the establishment of the Russian Bible Society, a modern version has been prepared by proper persons, selected for the undertaking, of which the four Gospels appeared in 1819; the Gospels and Acts in 1820; and the entire New Testament in 1823. A translation of the Psalms was printed in 1822, and the first eight books of the Old Testament were printed in 1824, but have never been published, in consequence of the interference of those who are inimical to the spread of the Scriptures. These last mentioned were made from the original Hebrew.

70. The Romanese version.—In the Churwelsche dialect of this language, the Bible was published in 1657; and in that of Ladin in 1719.

71. Into the Samogitian language, a version of the New Testament was made by a Roman Catholic bishop, at the request of the Russian Bible Society, and printed in 1820.

72. The Sanscrit, or learned language of India, possesses a version of the entire Scriptures, executed by the Serampore missionaries, and printed between the years 1808 and 1818.

73. A Servian version of the New Testament was prepared for the Russian Bible Society, and printed in 1825.

74. The Spanish versions are various. The earliest, done from the Vulgate, was printed at Valencia, 1478.

Pinel's version of the Old Testament, for the use of the Jews, was printed at Ferrara in 1553. There are also the versions of De Reyna, 1569; San Miguel, 1793, 1794; and Arnata, begun in 1823, and not yet completed.

75. The Swedish versions are two: that made from Luther's version, and published in 1541; and the revised version, undertaken by order of the king in 1774. The latter translation, though executed in accordance with the more enlightened critical principles of the period at which it was made, has never gained the approbation of the Swedish public, and has not superseded the more early authorized version.

76. The Tahitian version, executed by the London Society's missionaries, comprises most of the books of the New Testament, and several of those of the Old. The rest are in progress.

77. The Tamil versions are also two in number: that executed by the German missionaries, the New Testament of which was printed at Tranquebar, 1715; and the Old Testament at the same place, 1723—1728; and another by Fabricius, also a German missionary, and printed at Madras, 1777.

78. The Tartar versions exist in different dialects; but none of them contain more than a single book or two, excepting that executed by the Scotch missionaries at Karass, on the north of the Caucasus, and that in the Orenburg-Tartar dialect, both of which comprise the whole New Testament. The former was printed at Karass in 1813; the latter at Astracan in 1820.

79. The Telegoo or Telinga New Testament, was translated by the missionaries at Serampore, where it was printed in 1818. They also completed a translation of the Pentateuch into the same language.

80. In the Turkish language, there exist three versions of the New Testament. The first was executed by Dr. Lazarus Seaman, and printed in 1666. The second was made by Albertus Bobovsky or Ali Bey, dragoman to the sultan Mahomet IV., and completed in the forementioned year; but it was not printed till 1819, when it was carried through the press at Paris, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In consequence, however, of egregious faults and improprieties having been detected in the style, and in many of the renderings, the committee of that society were ultimately obliged to suppress the edition; and a new impression, purged from the objectionable matter, appeared in 1827. An edition from a revised and corrected copy of Bobovsky's version of the Old Testament also appeared at the same place in 1828. The third version of the Turkish New Testament was undertaken by Mr. Dickson, one of the Scotch missionaries at Astracan. It is partially based on the Karass New Testament, and that of Bobovsky. A considerable portion of the Old Testament was also completed by the same translator; but, owing to the change of biblical affairs in Russia, no part of either has been published.

81. The Virginian translation of the Scriptures was executed by Eliot, the apostle of the Indians. The New Testament was printed at Cambridge, 1661, and the whole Bible in 1685.

82. The Wallachian New Testament was first printed at Belgrade in 1648; the entire Bible in 1668, at Bukharest.

83. The Welsh version was made in consequence of an act of parliament passed in the reign of queen Elizabeth. The New Testament appeared in 1567, and the whole Bible in 1588. It has since been revised and corrected, and has gone through many editions.

84. The New Testament has been translated and printed in the Wutch or Multanee dialect, which is spoken on the eastern bank of the Indus.

VII. BIBLES, Polyglot.—Bibles printed in several languages, exhibiting, in general, the text of the different versions on the same page, or at least on the two open pages of the volume, are called Polyglots, from polus, many, and the Attic glotta, a language.

1. The earliest attempt of the kind was made by Aldus, the celebrated Venetian printer; but it contains only the first fifteen verses of the first of Genesis. The Psalter, by Justinian, Genoa, 1516, in Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Chaldean, and Latin, is the first Polyglot of any biblical book. His example was followed by Potken, who, in 1518, published the Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, Ethiopic, and Latin.

2. The first Polyglot of the whole Bible was the Complutensian, so called from its having been printed at Complutum, in Spain, 1502—1517, and published in 1522, in 6 vols. folio. It contains the Hebrew, Latin Vulgate, and Greek of the Old Testament, and the Greek and Latin Vulgate of the New. It was undertaken and superintended by Cardinal Ximenes, whom it cost about 50,000 ducats, though only six hundred copies were printed. It contains the first printed, though not the first published, edition of the Greek New Testament.

3. The Royal Polyglot, printed at Antwerp, 1569—72, in 8 vols. folio. It was published at the expense of Philip II. of Spain, and edited by Arias Montanus. In addition to the texts in the Complutensian, this edition exhibits part of the Targum, and the Syriac version of the New Testament, with literal Latin translations.

4. The Parisian Polyglot, published by Le Jay, 1628—45, in 10 vols. large folio, adds to the former the Samaritan Pentateuch and version, the Syriac version of the Old Testament, and an Arabic translation both of the Old and New. It also gives a Latin version of each of the Oriental texts.

5. The London Polyglot, published 1657, in 6 vols. folio, contains, besides the texts of all the former Polyglots, the Psalms, Song of Solomon, and the New Testament in Ethiopic, and the Gospels in Persic. It also contains the Chaldee paraphrase in a more complete state than any of the preceding works. It was edited by Brian Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, and generally has accompanying it the invaluable Heptaglot Lexicon by Castell, a work which is indispensable to those who would consult the Oriental texts to advantage, since the Latin translations in the Polyglot itself are not to be depended on. To the first volume are prefixed important prolegomena; and the last is entirely occupied with various readings and other critical matters.

6. Reinecii Polyglot, Leipsic, 1750, in 3 vols. folio, contains the Old Testament in Hebrew, Greek, Seb. Schmidt's Latin translation, and Luther's German; and the New Testament in ancient and modern Greek, the Syriac, the same Latin and German versions. It is very accurately printed, cheap, and convenient.

7. Bagster's Polyglots.—For elegance, accuracy, and convenience, the productions of Mr. Bagster's press far surpass all preceding editions of Polyglot Bibles. They are so printed that any selection of texts may be had at the option of the purchaser. There are, however, two principal works of this description: the Quarto Polyglot, 1821, containing the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English texts of the Old Testament; and the Greek, Syriac, Latin, and English of the New: and the Folio Polyglot, in 1831, one of the most splendid volumes ever published, containing the Bible in the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Latin, English, French, German, and Italian languages.—Hend. Buck.

BIBLIANDER; a learned Lutheran divine, and distinguished writer, of the sixteenth century.—Mosheim.

BIBLIAS; a Christian martyr at Lyons in the second century, during the persecution of the emperor Marcus Aurelius. At first, she had the weakness to apostatize from fear; but still a Christian in her heart, she abhorred herself for the crime, and could not conceal the horror she felt at the rites of paganism. She was again arrested and put to the torture. Believing her to have intelligence with the Christians, they thought to make her own the crimes they were accused of; amongst others, that of eating children. "How can that be," cried Biblias, "when they are forbidden to shed blood!" Resolute to expiate her former fault, she continued to justify them, and suffered martyrdom.—Betham.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM, is the science by which we arrive at a satisfactory acquaintance with the origin, history, and present state of the original text of Scripture. In the wide extent of its investigations, it embraces the languages in which the Scriptures were originally written, together with the cognate or kindred dialects; the materials used for writing; the composition, collection, and preservation of the different books; the age, character, and relationships of MSS.; the ancient versions; the various readings; the printed editions; and the various philological and historical means to be employed in order to determine what the text was as it proceeded from the original penmen. It has been divided into two kinds: lower criticism, which is more of a verbal and historical nature, and is confined to the words, or the collocation of the words, as they stand in the manuscript or printed texts, the ancient versions, and other legitimate sources of appeal; and higher criticism, which consists in the exercise of the judgment in reference to the text, on grounds taken from the nature, form, method, subject, or arguments of the different books; the nature and connexion of the context; the relation of passages to each other; the known circumstances of the writers, and those of the persons for whose immediate use they wrote. Of the two, the former is obviously the more important, as it presents a firm basis on which to rest our investigations: the latter, lying more open to conjecture and variety of opinion, may easily be abused, and has indeed been carried to a most unwarrantable length by many German critics.

The science of biblical criticism should be assiduously cultivated by all who venture to interpret the Bible: for in attempting to expound a work of such high antiquity, which has passed through a variety of copies, both ancient and modern, written and printed, copies which differ from each other in very numerous instances, they should have some reason to believe that the copy or edition which they undertake to interpret, approaches as nearly to the original, as it can be brought by human industry, or human judgment. Or, to speak in the technical language of criticism, before they expound the Bible, they should procure the most correct text of the Bible. This principle, which is justly deemed important in reference to mere human productions, must necessarily commend itself as of paramount and indispensable importance in its application to the Scriptures. Without attending to it, we never can be satisfied that what we interpret, really is what it professes to be—the word of God.

The object of this science is not to expose the word of the Lord to the uncertainties of human conjecture (a charge which has sometimes been brought against it); for there is no principle which it more firmly resists than conjectural emendation, or emendation not founded on documentary evidence. Its object is not to weaken, much less to destroy the edifice, which “for ages has been the subject of just veneration,” but to show the firmness of the foundation on which the sacred edifice is built, and prove the genuineness of the materials of which it is constructed. See Marsh’s Lectures, pp. 24, 26.—Henderson’s Book.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; the science of teaching or expounding the meaning of the Bible. Strictly speaking, it is either grammatical, when the meaning of words, phrases, and sentences is made out from the usus loquendi, and the context; or historical, when the meaning is illustrated and confirmed by historical arguments, which serve to evince that no other sense can be put upon the passage, whether regard be had to the nature of the subject, or the genius and manner of the writer. It presupposes a knowledge of biblical criticism, and an acquaintance with ancient geography, chronology, the civil, religious, and political history, the manners, customs, &c. of the Jews and of the surrounding nations, and especially with the doctrinal and preceptive contents of the Bible itself as a whole, and of its different parts in particular. As the same method, and the same principles of interpretation are common both to the sacred volume, and to the productions of uninspired men, it follows, that the signification of words in the Holy Scriptures must be sought precisely in the same way in which the meaning of words in other works usually is, or ought to be sought. Hence also it follows, that the method of investigating the signification of words in the Bible is no more arbitrary than it is in other books, but is in like manner regulated by certain laws, drawn from the nature of languages. And since no text of Scripture has more than one meaning, we must endeavor to find out that one true sense precisely in the same manner as we would investigate the sense of Homer or any other ancient writer; and in that sense, when so ascertained, we ought to acquiesce, unless, by applying the just rules of interpretation, it can be shown that the meaning of the passage has been mistaken, and that another is the only just, true, and critical sense of the place. In order to assist in determining what is this one meaning, the following rules have been laid down:—1. Ascertain the usus loquendi, or the notion affixed to a word by the persons in general by whom the language either is now or formerly was spoken, and especially in the particular connexion in which such notion is affixed. 2. Retain the received signification of a word, unless weighty and necessary reasons require that it should be abandoned. 3. Where a word has several significations in common use, that must be selected which best suits the passage in question, and which is consistent with an author’s known character, sentiments, and situation, and the known circumstances under which he wrote. 4. Although the force of particular words can only be derived from etymology, yet too much confidence must not be placed in that frequently uncertain science. 5. The distinctions between words which are apparently synonymous, should be carefully examined and considered. 6. The epithets introduced by the sacred writers are also to be carefully weighed and considered, as all of these have either a declarative or explanatory force, or serve to distinguish one thing from another, or unite these two characters together. 7. General terms are used sometimes in their whole extent, and sometimes in a restricted sense; and whether they are to be understood in the one way or in the other, must depend on the scope, subject-matter, context, and parallel passages. 8. The most simple and obvious sense is always the true one. 9. Since it is the design of interpretation to render in our own language the same discourse which the sacred authors originally wrote in Hebrew or Greek, it is evident that an interpretation, or version, to be correct, ought not to affirm or deny more than the inspired penmen affirmed or denied at the time they wrote: consequently we must always take a sense from Scripture, and not bring one to it. 10. No interpretation can be just, which brings out of any passage a sense that is repugnant to the ascertained nature of things.

The subsidiary means for ascertaining the sense of Scripture are the usus loquendi, context, scope, subject-matter, philological and doctrinal parallelisms and analogies, historical circumstances, quotations and exegetical commentators.—Hend. Buck; Stuart’s Ernesti; Horne’s Intro. to the Scriptures; Bib. Repository, for 1831.

BIBLICISTS, or BIBLICIS; a class of divines in the twelfth century, who in opposition to the scholastics, and in conformity with the example of the ancient doctors, drew their systems of theology from the Holy Scriptures, as illustrated by the writings of the fathers. In this last particular, they differed from the Waldenses, whose theology was purely biblical. They were also opposed to the Mystics. Paris was the centre of their influence, and was, at this time, frequented by students of divinity from all parts of Europe, who resorted thither in crowds, to receive instruction from the most celebrated masters in the biblical, mystic, and scholastic theology. The Biblicists were sometimes distinguished by the title of Positivi, or Ancient Theologians, because they explained the doctrines of religion, in a plain and simple manner, by passages drawn from the Holy Scriptures, from the decrees of councils, and the writings of the ancient doctors; and very rarely made use of the succors of reason, or philosophy, in their theological lectures, though they did not reject them altogether. Of this class were St. Bernard, Peter, surnamed the Chanter, Walter of St. Victor, and others. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, Lanfrank, and Hildebert, of the preceding century, were their chief models.—Moshelm.

BIDDELIANS; so called from John Biddle, A. M. of the university of Cambridge, and one of the first persons who publicly propagated Socinianism in England. He taught that Jesus Christ, to the intent that he might be our brother, and have a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and so become the more ready to help us, hath no other than a human nature; and therefore in this very nature is not only a person, since none but a human person can be our brother, but also our Lord and our God. He was cruelly persecuted, and died in prison, in 1662.

Biddle, as well as Socinus and others of similar sentiments before and since, made no scruple of calling Christ God, though he believed him to be a human creature only, on account of the divine sovereignty with which he was invested. Toulmin calls him the father of the modern Unitarians. He was the author of various small works in defence of his sentiments, which are now scarce. His "Scripture Catechism" met with an able refutation from the pen of Dr. Owen. See his works, vol. viii.—H. Buck.

BIDDING PRAYER. It was part of the office of the deacons in the ancient church, to be monitors and directors of the people in their public devotions in the church. To this end they made use of certain known forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service began. Agreeable to this ancient practice is the form, "Let us pray," repeated before several of the prayers in the English liturgy. Bishop Burnet, in his "History of the Reformation," vol. ii. p. 20, has preserved the form as it was in use before the reformation, which was this:—After the preacher had read and opened his text, he called on the people to go to their prayers, telling them what they were to pray for: "Ye shall pray," says he, "for the king, the pope," &c. After which, all the people said their beads in a general silence, and the minister kneeled down likewise, and said his: they were to say a pater-noster, ave Maria, &c. and then the sermon proceeded.—Head. Buck.

BIGOTRY consists in being obstinately and perversely attached to our own opinions; or, as some have better defined it, "a tenacious adherence to a system or opinion, adopted without investigation, and defended without argument, accompanied with a malignant intolerant spirit towards all who differ." It must be distinguished from love to truth, which influences a man to embrace it wherever he finds it; and from true zeal, which is an ardor of mind exciting its possessor conscientiously to defend and propagate the principles he maintains with the meekness of wisdom. Bigotry is a kind of prejudice, combined with a certain degree of malignity. It is thus exemplified and distinguished by a sensible writer: "When Jesus preached, Prejudice cried, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Crucify him, crucify him, said Bigotry. Why, what evil hath he done? replied Candor." Bigotry is mostly prevalent with those who are ignorant; who have taken up principles without due examination; and who are naturally of a morose and contracted disposition. It is often manifested more in unimportant sentiments, or the circumstantialities of religion, than the essentials of it. Simple bigotry is the spirit of persecution without the power; persecution is bigotry armed with power, and carrying its will into act. As it is the effect of ignorance, so it is the nurse of it, because it precludes free inquiry, and is an enemy to truth: it cuts also the very sinews of charity, and destroys moderation and mutual good will. If we consider the different makes of men's minds, our own ignorance, the liberty that all men have to think for themselves, the admirable example our Lord has set us of a contrary spirit, and the beneficial effects of this disposition, we must at once be convinced of its impropriety. How contradictory is it to sound reason, and how inimical to the peaceful religion we profess to maintain as Christians! See CATHOLICISM; LIBERALITY; PERSECUTION, and books under that article.—Head. Buck; Draper on Bigotry; Fuller's Works, vol. i. p. 239.

BILLOWS. Grievous afflictions succeeding one another are called in the Scriptures God's waves or billows. Sent and ordered by God, they terrify, perplex, and threaten to destroy men. Ps. 43: 7. and 88: 7. This phrase also signifies frequently the Divine wrath which broke on Jesus' soul. Ps. 69: 1, 2. The billows or swellings of Jordan denote the greatest trials, or perhaps death. Jer. 12: 5.

BILNEY, (THOMAS,) one of the English reformers and martyrs, was born near the beginning of the sixteenth century, and educated at Cambridge. At an early age he became bachelor of both laws; but soon after, in reading the New Testament in the translation of Erasmus, he was delivered from the errors of popery and the bondage of sin; and leaving the study of human law, devoted himself wholly to the study of divinity. In a letter to Cuthbert Tonsal, bishop of London, he gives the following lively picture of his conversion, and inward call to the Gospel ministry. Referring to 1 Tim. 1: 15, This is a faithful saying, &c., he says, "This one sentence, through God's instruction, and inward working, did so exhilarate my heart, which before was wounded with the guilt of my sins, and almost in despair, that immediately I found wonderful comfort and quietness in my soul; so that my bruised bones leaped for joy. After this, the Scriptures became sweeter to me than honey or the honey-comb. For by them I learned that all my travels, fastings, watchings, redemption of masses, and pardons, without faith in Christ, were but, as St. Augustine calls them, "a hasty running out of the right way;" and as the fig-leaves, which could not cover Adam's nakedness. And as Adam could find no rest to his guilty soul, till he believed in the promise of God, that Christ, the seed of the woman, should tread upon the serpent's head; so neither could I find deliverance from the sharp stings and bitings of my sins, till I was taught of God that lesson which Christ spake of in the third chapter of John: As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. As soon as, by the grace of God, I began to taste the sweets of this heavenly lesson, which no man can teach, but God alone, who revealed it to Peter, I begged of the Lord to increase my faith. And at last I desired nothing more, than that I, being so comforted by him, might be strengthened by his Holy Spirit and grace, that I might teach sinners his ways, which are mercy and truth, and that the wicked might be converted unto him by me, who also was once myself a sinner indeed."—In another letter, speaking of the scholastic divines and popish priest, he remarks, "This is the root of all mischief in the church, that they are not sent inwardly of God. For without this inward calling of God, it helpeth nothing to be a hundred times consecrated by a thousand bulls, either of pope, king, or emperor. God beholdeth the heart, and his judgment is according to truth, howsoever we deceive the judgment of men for a time; though they also at last shall see the abomination. This, I say, is the original of all mischief in the church, that we thrust in ourselves into the charge of souls, whose salvation and the glory of God (which is to enter in by the door, John 10: 1—9) we do not thirst nor seek for, but altogether our own lucre and profit."

The ministry of Bilney was crowned with success. Many gowmsmen of the university, among whom was the celebrated Latimer, were led by his instrumentality to the Savior. He extended his labors into the country with great effect; until cardinal Wolsey, alarmed by his success, arrested him, Nov. 25, 1527, and brought him to trial for preaching the doctrines of Luther. After four appearances before his judges, his firmness was overcome, rather by the persuasions of his friends than from conviction, and he signed a recantation, December 7, 1529. After this, he returned to Cambridge; but the consideration of what he had done embittered his peace, and brought him to the brink of despair. Latimer, who was intimate with him, tells us that "Mr. Bilney's agony was such that nothing did him good, neither eating nor drinking, nor any other communication of God's word; for he thought that all the whole Scriptures were against him, and sounded to his condemnation." Being restored, however, by the grace of God and conferences with good men, to peace of conscience, he resolved to give up his life in defence of the truth he had sinfully abjured. Accordingly, in 1531, he went into Norfolk, and there preached the Gospel, at first privately and in houses, afterwards openly in the fields; bewailing his former recantation, and begging all men to take warning by him, and never to trust the counsels of friends, so called, when their purpose is to draw them from the true religion. Being thrown into prison, Drs. Call and Stokes were sent to persuade him again to recant; but the former of these divines, by Bilney's doctrine and conduct, was greatly drawn over to the side of the Gospel. Finding him inflexible, his judges condemned him to be burned.

To some of his friends who visited him in prison the night before he suffered, and who expressed surprise at his perfect cheerfulness, Bilney, putting his hand into the flame of the candle, (as he had often done before,) replied, "I feel by experience that the fire is hot, yet I am persuaded by God's holy Word, and by the experience of some spoken of in it, that in the flame they felt no heat, and in the fire no consumption. And I believe, that though the stubble of my body shall be wasted, yet my soul shall thereby be purged; and that after short pain, joy unspeakable shall follow." With like serenity, on his way to the stake, he remarked: "When the mariner undertakes a voyage, he is tossed on the billows of the troubled seas, yet in the midst of all, he beareth up his spirits with this consideration, that ere long he shall come into his quiet harbor; so (added he) I am now sailing upon the troubled sea, but ere long my ship shall be in a quiet harbor. I doubt not, but, through the grace of God, I shall endure the storm; only I would entreat you to help me with your prayers." His friend Dr. Warner, who had accompanied him in prison and to the stake, in taking his last leave of his beloved friend, was so much affected that he could say but little for his tears. Bileyn accosted him with a heavenly smile, thanked him kindly for all his attentions, and bending towards him, whispered, in a low voice, his farewell words, of which it is hard to say whether they convey more of love to his friend, or faithfulness to his Master: "Pascere gregem tuum, pascere gregem tuum; ut cum venerit Dominus, inveniat te sic facientem: Feed your flock, feed your flock; that the Lord, when he cometh, may find you so doing." His afflicted friend could make no answer, but retired from the awful scene overwhelmed with grief and tears.

Some mendicant friars who had been present at his condemnation, having been accused by the people of instigating his death, and fearing to lose their customary alms, at this moment besought him to assure the people to the contrary. Bileyn instantly complied, and assured the people of their innocence in this sad affair.

The faggots were then applied, and the body of the dying martyr was consumed to ashes, A. D. 1531, in the reign of Henry the Eighth; leaving behind him the character of distinguished learning and piety.—Middleton's Evang. Biog.

BILLSON, (THOMAS;) an English prelate, born at Winchester, in 1536, where, and at Oxford, he was educated. The Perpetual Government of Christ's Church, which he published in 1593, led to his obtaining the see of Worcester, whence he was translated to that of Winchester. In the Hampton court conference he bore a prominent part; and, in conjunction with bishop Smith, had the revision of the new translation of the Bible. He died in 1616. He produced various controversial works and sermons.—Davenport.

BIND, TO, AND LOOSE, is a figurative expression derived from carrying burdens; that is, confirming or removing a burden of the mind. It is also taken for condemning or absolving: (Matt. 16: 19.) "I will give unto you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Binding and loosing, in the language of the Jews, expressed permitting, or forbidding, or judicially declaring any thing to be permitted, or forbidden. In the promotion of their doctors, they put a key into their hands, with these words: "Receive the power of binding and loosing;" whence the allusion, "Ye have taken away the key of knowledge," Luke 11: 52. "I am not come to unloose the law, but to complete it," says our Savior, Matt. 5: 17, that is, as in our translation, "not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it." The religion of Jesus has perfected the law of Moses, discovered its true spirit, unfolded its secret meanings, and accomplished all its types and figures. If it have also abrogated some of its ceremonial institutions, it is only for the purpose of accommodating mankind at large, and causing the essential principles of it to be better observed. "To bind the law upon one's hand for a sign;" to "wear it like a bracelet on one's arm," (Deut. 6: 8,) was meant figuratively, implying an intimate acquaintance with its precepts; but the Jews took it literally, and bound parts of the law about their wrists. See PHYLACTERIES. In Isa. 8: 16, "Bind up the testimony, seal the law," is to be understood thus, "Seal what thou hast been writing, bind it about with thread or riband, and set thy seal upon it:—for closure and confirmation of its contents; to witness thy confidence in its veracity, and thy expectation of completion." It is said that Daniel was the most learned of the magi, interpreters of dreams, &c. "for showing (explaining) hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts;" (Heb. untying of knots;) also, chapter 5: 16, where "loosing" things which were bound is used to express—the explanation of things concealed. See DANIEL.—Calmet.

BINGHAM, (JOSEPH,) an eminent divine, was born at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, in 1668, and educated at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, which he resigned, in consequence of being censured for heterodox opinions concerning the Trinity. He then retired to his living of Headbourne Worthy, in Hampshire. In 1712, he obtained the rectory of Havant; in 1720, he was nearly ruined by the South sea bubble; and he died in 1723. His Origines Ecclesiasticae, or Christian Antiquities, is a valuable work.—Davenport.

BIOGRAPHY. It has been remarked by Dr. Johnson, that "no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography, since none can be more delightful or more useful: none can more certainly enchain the heart by irresistible interests, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition." Our great English moralist might have gone further than this, in praise of his own favorite theme, and added, that to treasure up memoirs of the wise, the learned, and the virtuous, is to fulfil an exalted duty to mankind. It is gratifying to reflect how much this branch of useful knowledge has been cultivated since the commencement of the last century. To say nothing of the memoirs of individuals published in a detached form, we have now the "General, Historical, and Critical Dictionary," in ten volumes, folio;—the "Biographia Britannica," in seven volumes, folio;—a "General Biography; or, Lives, Critical and Historical, of the most Eminent Persons of all Ages and Countries," in ten volumes, quarto, by Dr. Aikin and others;—"The General Biographical Dictionary," by Mr. A. Chalmers," in thirty-two volumes, octavo;—the "British Biography," in ten volumes, octavo, edited by the late Dr. Towers; besides many similar collections of minor interest, such as the compilations of Lodge, Granger, Birch, Lempriere, Davenport, Betham, and others. These noble collections do honor to our literature. But every reflecting mind must be aware, that the extent and costliness of these works place them entirely out of the reach of the great mass of the reading population of this country, to whom a single volume of well-selected lives might be a desideratum. To supply this deficiency, has been one object aimed at in the present undertaking, which, it is hoped, will not be found without its use. The editor, however, claims the privilege of adopting the words of Mr. Jones, with the view of obviating some objections that may arise respecting the plan on which he has proceeded: for he is quite aware that some persons may censure it, as being too confined, while others may view it as quite latitudinarian.

Taking a review of the numerous sections into which Christendom is now divided, the Church of England may be fairly allowed, with the exception of Germany, to take the precedence on the score of erudition. In her academic bowers, biblical literature has been cultivated in times past to great extent and valuable purpose. To her ministers and members, consequently, something like a prominence will be found to be given in this manual; and so far, the editor trusts, he shall stand clear of the charge of having indulged any sectarian bias. Let it, however, be recorded to the honor of this generation, that the English statute book is no longer disgraced by those odious penal enactments, the test and corporation acts, which formerly placed the conscientious non-conformist "under the ban." That middle wall of partition is now removed out of the way; and, accordingly, the modest dissenter is, in these pages, permitted to take his place, without a blush, by the side of his conforming brother; to whom, though he may be expected to yield the palm in respect of the number of learned men, and the extent of their literary attainments, he comes not a whit behind, in the less showy, but more solid and useful acquisitions in theological lore. Some little pains have also been taken to adjust, with an impartial hand, the conflicting claims of the different classes of English dissenters. The Presbyterian will here find that his favorite Knox, Maclaurin, Baxter, Doddridge, Davies, Henry, Campbell, Stewart, Witherspoon, and many others, of whom he may be justly proud, have not been overlooked in this compilation. The Independent, or Congregationalist, will be gratified to meet with his Owen, Watts, Howe, Chandler, Grosvenor, Leland, Jennings, Mather, Edwards, Dwight, and a long et cetera of illustrious names; while the Baptist will have good reason to complain of injustice, had we omitted Gale, Gill, Bunyan, Robinson, Stennett, Booth, Fuller, Ryland, Hall, cum multis aliis. The Methodists will find that a niche in the temple of fame has been reserved to their Whitefield and Wesley, Fletcher and Asbury, Clarke and Watson;—and even the peaceful Quaker has not been forgotten: he will recognise in the memorials of Barclay and Penn, the founders of the denomination to which he belongs. But our catalogue of classification is not yet complete. The English Catholics have triumphed after a mighty struggle, and are placed, in respect of civil and religious privileges, as in this country, on an equality with their other fellow citizens. They had a right to expect that such men as Bossuet and Fenelon, Fleury and Massillon, Pascal and Rollin, whose writings have done so much honor to their church, and been the source of so much delight and information to all who have dissented from it, should here be allowed to repose in peaceful solitude among the mighty and illustrious dead of other communities.

A word to the tyro in the study of ecclesiastical history shall close this article. Though it cannot be denied that the alphabetical plan of arrangement is better fitted to facilitate reference than any other, it nevertheless has its disadvantages. By reading the lives in this volume chronologically, it will be found a useful compendium of church history. For instance; would the reader form an estimate of the state of society in regard to morals and religious knowledge prior to the dawn of the Reformation? It is recommended to him to take the lives in something like the following rotation:—Bacon (Roger), Bede, Claude (of Turin), Grosseteste (Robert), and Arnald (of Brescia). From these he will discover, that the state of Europe at that time, may be fitly termed one of "darkness visible, serving only to discover sights of woe." And this will prepare him for reading advantageously the lives of Wickliffe, Huss, Jerome (of Prague), Luther, Melancthon, Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Grotius, Zuinglius, and the other continental reformers: after which he will be prepared to enter on the "noble army" of reformers and martyrs of England; such as Bilney, Tyndal, Latimer, Ridley, Crammer, Colet, Hooper, with many others who were the glory of the sixteenth century—men "who loved not their lives unto the death"—but whose memorials ought to be held in everlasting remembrance. He may then advance to the seventeenth century, when he will find fully verified the truth of an observation once made concerning it, by George the Third, "There were giants in the earth in those days." Such indeed is their number, so extensive the acquirements, and so profound the erudition of the divines and others of that period, that we gaze and admire, and are humbled at the view!

The reader may wish, of many of these lives, that they had been given more in detail: and to say the truth, the editor could have wished so too; but to have indulged his own feelings in this respect, must have necessarily enlarged the size and price of the book, and consequently, defeated the end which throughout this work it was indispensable to keep in view.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BIRCH, (THOMAS, D. D.) a valuable historical and biographical writer, was born in London, in the year 1705. His parents were both of them Quakers; and his father, who was a coffee-mill maker by trade, endeavored to bring him up to his own business; but so ardent was the youth's passion for reading, that he solicited his father to be indulged in this inclination, promising, in that case, to provide for himself. After gaining an education, he took orders, obtained various literary honors and church preferments, and was one of the secretaries of the Royal society. By a fall from his horse, while riding for his health, he was unfortunately killed, in 1766. The first great work of Dr. Birch was "The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical," wherein a new translation of that of the celebrated Mr. Bayle was included, and which was interspersed with several thousand lives never before published. It was in the year 1734, that Dr. Birch, in conjunction with some other persons, agreed with the booksellers to carry on this important undertaking. The whole design was completed in ten volumes, folio; the first of which appeared in 1734, and the last in 1741. It is universally allowed that this work contains a very extensive and useful body of biographical knowledge. We are not told what were the particular articles written by Dr. Birch; but there is no doubt of his having executed a great part of the Dictionary.

The next great design in which Dr. Birch engaged, was the publication of "Thurlow's State Papers." This collection, which consists of seven volumes, in folio, came out in the year 1742. In 1744, Dr. Birch published, in octavo, "The Life of the Honorable Robert Boyle, Esq.;" which hath since been prefixed to the quarto edition of the works of that excellent man and eminent philosopher. In 1751, Dr. Birch published, in two volumes, octavo, "The Miscellaneous Works of Sir Walter Raleigh;" to which was prefixed the life of that great, unfortunate, and injured man. The same year, he revised the quarto edition of "Milton's Prose Works," and added a new life of that incomparable man.

What enabled Dr. Birch to go through such a variety of undertakings, was his being a very early riser; whereby he had executed the business of the morning before numbers of people had begun it. But with all this closeness of application, he was not a solitary student. He was of a cheerful and social temper, and entered much into conversation with the world. He was personally connected with most of the literary men of his time, and with some of them he maintained an intimate friendship.

Dr. Birch was entitled to that highest praise, of being a good man, as well as a man of knowledge and learning. His sentiments, with respect to subjects of divinity, were rational and enlarged; and he was a zealous friend to religious and civil liberty. His turn of thinking was similar to that of the late bishop Hoadley; and surely the wise and liberal minded will not esteem it a dishonor to him, that he had a conformity to the principles of that eminent and excellent prelate.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BIRDS; one of the most beautiful and numerous classes of animated nature. A few introductory observations may be permitted, before we proceed to describe the several individuals that are presented to our notice, in reviewing the ornithology of the Bible.

The common name for a bird in the Hebrew Scriptures, is tzephur, the rapid mover, or hurrier; a name very expressive of these volatile creatures. A more general and indefinite name is ouph, a flier; but this appellation denotes every thing that flies, whether bird or insect. It is frequently translated "fowl" in the English Bible. A bird of prey is called oith, a rusher, from the impetuosity with which it rushes upon its prey. In several of the passages where it occurs, our translators have rendered its plural form by "fowls."

The first thing which claims our attention, is the structure of the feathered tribes. In a comparative view with man, their formation seems much ruder and more imperfect; and they are in general found incapable of the docility even of quadrupeds. To these, however, they hold the next rank; and far surpass fishes and insects, both in the structure of their bodies, and in their sagacity.

In reference to the structure of birds of the most perfect order, a few things demand our attention.

The whole body is shaped in the most convenient manner for making its way through the air; being, as Mr. Ray observes, constructed very near Sir Isaac Newton's form of least resistance. According to Barr, in his continuation of Buffon, "it is neither extremely massive, nor equally substantial in all its parts; but being designed to rise in the air, is capable of expanding a large surface without solidity. The body is sharp before, to pierce and make its way through that element: it gradually increases in bulk, till it has acquired its just dimensions, and falls off in an expansive tail." The motion of birds being twofold, walking and flying, they are provided with legs, at once wonderfully contrived to walk with, and raise them like a spring for their flight; wings to buoy them up, and waft them along; and a tail to keep them steady in the air, assist them in their evolutions, and direct them in their course.

Although the feathery covering of birds is admirably constructed for lightness and buoyancy, their wings are furnished with a strength that is amazing; and by these they are enabled to impel themselves forward with an inconceivable rapidity. To fit them the better for their flight, the feathers are disposed in the most perfect order, lying one way; and, that they may glide more smoothly along, they are furnished with a gland situated on the rump, from which they occasionally press out oil with the bill, and anoint the feathers.

Their beak or bill is a curious piece of art, formed of a hard, horny substance, constructed in the most commodious manner for piercing the air. Their ears stand not out from their head to retard their flight; and their eyes are placed in such situations as to take in nearly a hemisphere on either side.

Birds have no teeth to chew their food; but those of the granivorous kind are provided with two stomachs, in one of which the victuals is softened and macerated before it enters the other to be completely digested. Being often employed in traversing the upper regions, where they would be much incommoded did they bring forth their young in the manner of quadrupeds, their mode of generating is wisely made to differ, and their offspring are produced by means of eggs. In the speedy growth of young birds, by which they acquire a degree of strength and size, so as to be able so soon to provide for themselves, we have also an instance of the tender care of Providence.

What unseen power inspires these little creatures with "the passion of the groves," at the most fit season for forming their alliances; that is, when the genial temper of the weather covers the trees with leaves, the fields with grass, and produces such swarms of insects for the support of their future progeny? And how comes it to pass, that no sooner is the connubial league formed, than the little warblers immediately set about building their nests, and making preparation for their tender offspring? In the building of their nests, what art and ingenuity are displayed! Whether they are constructed from the collected portions of clay and mortar, or from the more light materials of moss and straw, they contrive to mould them into the most convenient forms, and to give them a durability proportionate to their wants. Nor is the wonder less, that birds of the same kind, however widely separated, should all follow the same order of architecture, in the construction of their habitations: that each should make choice of the situation most suitable to its kind; and that all should agree in laying as many eggs as to be sufficient to keep up their species, yet no more than they can conveniently hatch and bring up.

In the incubation, with what patience do these little creatures sit on their eggs when necessary, till the young are ready to be hatched, and then how officious in assisting the little prisoners to escape! With what inimitable care do they afterwards watch over and provide for their brood, until it is capable of doing so for itself; and with what scrupulous exactness, during this period, do they distribute to each its allotted portion of food!

The observations we have made are applicable to the feathery tribe in general; but when we turn to the peculiarities of a few of the different species, we shall observe that the wisdom and the goodness of God are no less conspicuous. How wonderful is the migration of some birds; or that surprising instinct by which "the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times," and "the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming!" Jer. 8: 7. These are a few of the proofs of the wisdom and goodness of God, which this part of creation exhibits; but, few as they are, they are sufficient to excite our admiration, and inspire us with sentiments of adoring gratitude to the Author of all being.

The number of birds already known, amounts, we believe, to between three and four thousand. To distinguish the different kinds from each other, and the varieties of the same kind, when they happen to differ, is a work of great difficulty; and perhaps the attainment, when made, would not repay the labor. Linnæus divides all birds into six classes, namely; birds of the raptacious kind—birds of the pie kind—birds of the poultry kind—birds of the sparrow kind—birds of the duck kind—and birds of the crane kind.

The first four comprehend the various kinds of land birds; the two last, those that belong to water.

From the Hebrew legislator, who had issued the strictest injunctions on the subject of animals, clean and unclean, we might naturally expect directions equally strict respecting birds; a class no less distinguished among themselves, by their qualities and modes of life. But here his animal characteristics, derived from the feet, failed; nor was it easy to fix on marks which should, in every instance, guide the learned and the unlearned to a right conclusion. Hence there is not, in the Mosaic institutes, any reference to conformation, as the means of distinguishing birds into clean and unclean, lawful and unlawful; a list of exceptions forms the sacred directory, and certain kinds are forbidden, without a word concerning those that are allowed.—Abbott's Scrip. Nat. History.

BIRTH, is taken for the natural descent of offspring from its parent: figuratively, New Birth imports an entire change of principles, manners, and conduct. See REGENERATION.

There have been great difficulties started, on the nature of the instrument rendered stools in our translation, Exod. 1: 16. "And the king of Egypt said to the Hebrew midwives, When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and see them upon the stools, if it be a son, then ye shall kill him; but if it be a daughter, then she shall live." Now the Hebrew word (ABENIM) rendered stool, plainly signifies "a stone vessel for holding water," in Exod. 7: 19. By referring the pronoun to the children, therefore, the sense of the passage would be this: "When you see the new-born children, for the purpose of being washed, in the vessels of stone for holding water, ye shall destroy the boys." Upon this subject Mr. Taylor remarks, (1.) that this custom in relation to children is justified by Eastern usages; (2.) that this destruction of boys (or children) at their nativity is actually practised in the courts of Eastern monarchs. Thevenot (Part ii. p. 98) hints at these maxims and practices: "The kings of Persia are so afraid of being deprived of that power which they abuse, and are so apprehensive of being dethroned, that they destroy the children of their female relations, when they are brought to bed of boys, by putting them into an earthen trough, where they suffer them to starve;" that is, we suppose, under pretence of preparing to wash them, they let them pine away, or contrive to destroy them in the water.

Apply this to the situation of Israel in Egypt: it was not every child, every son born throughout all Israel, as well those in the country of Goshen as those in the city of Mizraim, that was included in the directions of Pharaoh; but those of the chiefs, the principals; for, had Pharaoh thus treated all Israel, he had undoubtedly raised a rebellion; he had diminished his stock of slaves, which was his property; whereas, the depriving that people of chiefs answered his purpose equally well. He acted much according to the custom of his own court and seraglio, and did not very greatly extend it, except by including a distinct race, and a sojourning people. These considerations coincide with the idea previously suggested, that Moses and Aaron were of note and rank, among the Israelites, by birth and by natural condition; and they agree perfectly with the account of Josephus, who relates that the birth of Moses was predicted, as of a child who should wear the crown of Pharaoh, taking it from him: that is Pharaoh feared some illustrious youth would rise up to destroy him, and to deliver Israel, which fear became his torment.

These extracts serve to illustrate the conduct of Herod: first, toward his own sons, (see HEROD;) secondly, toward the infants of Bethlehem: for, if the kings of Persia destroy the infants of their own relations, and if the king of Egypt, fearing the birth of Moses, was peculiarly jealous and vigilant, where is the wonder, that Herod destroyed the infants of Bethlehem, under the idea, that among them was concealed a pretender to his crown? He did no more than was approved and practised in the East in such cases; nay, perhaps he might applaud his own clemency in that he did not destroy the parents also, with their elder offspring, but only infants entering on their second year.

In confirmation of the proposition, that the children, not the mothers, were washed in the stone vessels containing water, Mr. Taylor has given in his Fragments an engraving from an ornamental basso relievo on a sepulchral urn, which shows a midwife in the act of placing a new-born infant in a vessel, apparently of the same nature, and for the same purpose, as the Hebrew abemim: her intention is, evidently, to wash the child; while the mother sits in an enfeebled attitude, looking on. An attendant holds a capacious sweater, to receive the child after washing; and the notice of the time of the child's birth, and perhaps its horoscope, occupies a female, who stands behind, and who inscribes it with a stylus on a globe. This representation, he remarks, proves that children were committed to the midwife for the purpose of being washed; Pharaoh might therefore say to the Hebrew midwives, or to those Egyptian women who were midwives to the Hebrew women, as was the opinion of Josephus, "When you are engaged in washing the Israelite infants, if they be boys, contrive to drown them in the water." This order not succeeding to his mind, he directed his officers to seize, and to drown by force, whatever young Israelites (boys) they could lay their hands on.

The ancients bestowed considerable attention on the washing of a new-born infant; and, indeed, it was in some degree ceremonious. "The Lacedaemonians," says Plutarch, in his Life of Lycurgus, "washed the new-born infant in wine, (principally, no doubt, persons of property,) meaning thereby to strengthen the infant;" but generally they washed the child in water; warmed, perhaps, in Greece; cold, perhaps, in Egypt; or according to the season. We see, then, that the washing of a child newly born was a business of some consideration: how easily, therefore, did the hearers, and readers of Christ and his apostles comprehend the phrase "the washing of regeneration;" or of "the new birth."

Mr. Taylor's engraving suggests another subject of inquiry, respecting the swaddling clothes appropriate to infants; an article but imperfectly known by us. Our translation has, as it may be thought somewhat unhappily, used the term swaddling bands; which implies a number of small pieces—narrow rolls—strips—bands: but the true import of the word is, more probably, that of a large cloth, or wrapper; such as the female figure in the engraving holds up, extended, ready to receive the child; an envelope of considerable capacity and amplitude.

The idea may be applied to an occurrence in the New Testament; of the propriety of which application the reader will judge with ease. "The virgin mother brought forth her son, the first-born; and she enveloped him in an ample swaddling robe, such as befit, at least in some degree, the heir of David's house; and she took that kind of care of him which persons in competent circumstances take of their new-born infants." If this be a fact, observe, how it became a sign to the shepherds: "You shall find the babe wrapped in a handsome swaddling cloth—though lying in a manger." For aught we know, they might have found in Bethlehem, then crowded to excess, a dozen or a score of infants lying in mangers; but none with those contradictory marks of dignity and indignity; of noble descent, and of personal inconvenience; of respectable station, and of refuge-taking poverty.—Calmet.

BIRTH-RIGHT, or PRIMOGENITURE, was the right of the first-born or eldest son, to take the precedence of his brethren. In ancient times, and particularly among the Hebrews, many privileges were annexed to the right of primogeniture. The first-born son was consecrated to the Lord. Exod. 22: 29. To him belonged "the excellency of dignity and the excellency of power," Gen. 49: 3. He had a double portion of the estate allotted him, Deut. 21: 17, and, in the royal families, succeeded to the government of the kingdom. 2 Chron. 21: 3. The right of primogeniture, and the privileges belonging to it, might, nevertheless, be forfeited by improper conduct, and consequently transferred from an elder to a younger brother, as we see was actually done by Isaac in the case of his two sons, Esau and Jacob. The apostle terms Esau "a profane person, who for one morsel of meat, sold his birth-right," Heb. 12: 16. And in Gen. 27: 37, we are informed how the patriarch Isaac transferred the privileges of his birth-right to his brother Jacob. "And Isaac answered and said unto Esau, Behold I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants; and with corn and wine have I sustained him." Hence it appears that to confer the dominion or rule on any one, is to constitute him the first-born. See Ps 89: 27.

A proper attention to what has been now remarked is necessary, to lead us into the meaning of much that is said in the apostolic writings respecting the dignity which was conferred upon Christ, as the head of his body, the church, when he was raised from the dead, and for the sufferings of death crowned with glory and honor. He is termed the "first-born," or "first begotten from the dead," and "the heir of all things," Col. 1: 18. Rev. 1: 5. Heb. 1: 2. The Father, by raising him from the dead and exalting him to the throne of his glory in the heavens, is said to have constituted him "both Lord and Christ," Acts 2: 36. "Lord of ALL," chapter 10: 36, which is equivalent to his being "heir of all things;" and it imports his supreme dominion as the lord, proprietor, ruler, and disposer of all persons and things; all power and authority being given unto him both in heaven and on earth. Matt. 28: 18. Hence it is said, "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands," John 3: 35. Christ, considered in reference to his divine nature, was "before all things," Col. 1: 17, and "had glory with the Father before the world was made," John 17: 5. He in the beginning was with God, and was God, by whom all things were made, John 1: 1. He is said to have existed "in the form of God," and to have "thought it no robbery to be equal with God," Phil. 3: 6, but he emptied himself of the form or majesty of Deity; took upon him a mortal body; was made, for a little while, lower than the angels, for the sufferings of death, and to accomplish our salvation, humbled himself, even to the death of the cross. Phil. 2: 8. Heb. 2: 9, 10, 14. This is that obedience of the Savior's which was so acceptable in the sight of his heavenly Father, John 10: 17, in which he is represented as delighting, Eph. 5: 2, and as rewarding, by conferring upon his Son, "dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him," Dan. 7: 14. Heb. 1: 2—4, having put all things under his feet. 1 Cor. 15: 27. All the angels of God are now his subjects, and are commanded to worship him. 1 Pet. 3: 22. Heb. 1: 6. All the redeemed company are his heritage, his peculiar people. 1 Pet. 5: 3. Titus 2: 14. They are his brethren to whom he stands related as the first-born among them. Rom. 8: 29. He is their head, their Lord, and their lawgiver; the object of their love, worship, and obedience. He is also the dispenser of all spiritual blessings; for "it hath pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell," Col. 1: 19. And not to enlarge further, he is "heir of the heavenly inheritance," for it is in his right, and as joint-heirs with him that all his redeemed brethren obtain it. Luke 22: 29. Col. 3: 14. Rom. 8: 17.—Jones.

BISHOP,* (Gr. episkopos); an overseer, superintendent, or inspector. The English word comes immediately from the Saxon, bischof, which is only a derivative of the Greek.

I. In the New Testament it is once applied to Christ, (1 Pet. 2: 25.) but in every other passage is spoken of men who have the oversight of Christ's flock. Because the same men are called both bishops and presbyters or elders, the inference has been drawn by the advocates of a party in the ministerial office, that this community of name indicated community of office and authority. The reverse of this however appears from the fact, that over the persons called indifferently elder, presbyter and bishop, an office will be found of oversight and authority held by Timothy and Titus, and directions how to discharge it, and a strict injunction to Timothy, "the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also." In the church of Ephesus, there were ministers thus called, before Timothy was fixed there, as may be seen from Acts 20. If those ministers had the power of ordination, it would not have been necessary to set Timothy over that church in order to exercise these very powers. (See ORINATION.) Similar to the authority which Timothy possessed at Ephesus was that which was exercised by Titus over the island of Crete, which is represented as very populous, and famous in history for its hundred cities. In every one of these Titus was authorized by St. Paul to "ordain elders, and set in order the things that are wanting." The fact is, that during the lives of the apostles, the three orders of the ministry were distinguished by the names of apostles; bishops, presbyters or elders; and deacons. After the death of the apostles, their successors in the first order of the ministry, not choosing to retain the name which by way of eminence had been applied to the twelve, took the name of bishops, which was never afterwards applied to the second order of the ministry, but was considered as the appropriate name of the first order. Theodoret says expressly, that "in process of time those who succeeded to the apostolic office left the name of apostle to the apostles strictly so called, and gave the name of bishop to those who succeeded to the apostolic office." Thus the name of bishop and that of elder or presbyter, which were promiscuously used for the same office in Scripture, came to be distinct in the ecclesiastical use of words, as the offices were from the beginning. Bishops,* as they are distinct from presbyters, do not derive their succession from those who are promiscuously called in the New Testament bishops or elders, but from the apostles themselves, and their successors, such as Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Epaphroditus, &c.

* The article which appeared under this head in the first edition of this work not being satisfactory to Episcopians, the Rev. Mr. Byland, of New York, has furnished the following argument for Episcopacy, 1 Ed.

II. Episcopacy, according to the views of Episcopians, is the divine constitution of the Christian church in the first order of her ministry.

In the preface to the ordinal of the Church of England, and of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, it is declared as "evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' time there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's church, bishops, priests and deacons." In the office of making deacons, in that of ordaining priests, and in that of consecrating bishops, the same truth is solemnly declared in the supplications to Almighty God, who is addressed as having by his divine providence and Holy Spirit instituted divers orders of ministers in his church, and bishops, priests and deacons are enumerated as these orders. An external commission, conveyed by episcopal consecration or ordination, is considered necessary to constitute a lawful ministry, and it is therefore in the ordinal declared that no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest, or deacon in this church, or suffered to execute any of said functions, unless he has had episcopal consecration or ordination; and the power of ordaining, setting or laying hands upon others is vested in the bishops.

The proof of this solemn and official declaration is, 1st. from Scripture. "Paul and Timotheus," the one an apostle, the other having the episcopal power of ordination, address themselves as servants of Jesus Christ to all the saints which are at Philippi, with the "bishops," then the interchangeable name of presbyters or elders, "and the deacons." Here are certainly three orders. The apostle Paul, writing to Timothy, who is elsewhere termed an apostle, (compare 1 Thess. I: 1, with 2: 6.) also gives him particular directions as to an order of ministers whom he calls bishops, (the same who in another place are called elders or presbyters,) and also as to an order inferior to them, whom he calls deacons. Here also there are to be observed three orders of ministers. That of these three orders bishops were superior, is very evident in the cases of Timothy and Titus. Presbyters or elders had been already ordained at Ephesus and Crete. Had they the power of ordination? No: but Timothy and Titus are sent there for the express purpose of laying on hands, of ordaining to the ministry. It is alleged by some, that Timothy and Titus were extraordinary officers and held * "Concerning the signification of the word bishop," says the judicious Hooker, "it is clearly untrue that no other thing is thereby signified but only an oversight, in respect of a particular church and congregation: for, I beseech you, of what parish or particular congregation was Matthias bishop? His office Scripture doth term episcopal, which being no other than was common unto all the apostles of Christ, farasmuch as in that number there is not any to whom the oversight of many pastors did not belong by force and virtue of that office, it followeth that the very word doth sometimes, even in Scripture, signify an oversight such as includeth charge over pastors themselves."

this power as evangelists. But presbyters and deacons were also evangelists. If then the powers of Timothy and Titus ceased with them because they were evangelists, for the same reason ceased the powers of the presbyters and deacons. Thus, in destroying their episcopal power, these writers would also destroy the Christian ministry. Again, it is said that St. Paul's charge to Timothy implies that presbyters had the power of ordination. "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." But he also says in his second epistle, "Stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands."

St. Paul then ordained Timothy, it would hence appear, with the concurrence of the presbytery; and that their concurrence was intended to express approbation, and not to convey authority, seems evident from the phraseology, "by the putting on of my hands,"—"with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery."

In the Church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, this concurrence is still observed.

III. If from Scripture proof we proceed to the historical proof of episcopacy, we shall find the declaration of the ordinal fully established.

The writings of Ignatius abound throughout with testimonies. To the Trallians he says, "He that is with the altar is pure, but he that is without, that is, ones to the church without the bishop and presbyters and deacons, is not pure in his conscience." To the Smyrniens, "Let no man do any thing of what belongs to the church without the bishop." Irenæus says, "We can reckon up those whom the apostles ordained to be bishops in the several churches, and who they were that succeeded them, to our times." Clement of Alexandria thus enumerates the three orders of the ministry: "There are other precepts without number, some which relate to presbyters, others which belong to bishops, others respecting deacons." Tertullian, writing of baptism, asserts, "The power of baptizing is lodged in the bishops, and that it may be also exercised by presbyters and deacons, but not without the bishop's commission."

Origen, commenting on that petition, "forgive us our debts," thus writes: "Besides these there is a debt due to the church, which is maintained by the bishop, and another to the presbyters, and another to bishops, which is the greatest of all, and exacted by the church." Cyprian, whose epistles are many of them addressed to the presbyters and deacons, in his 32d epistle writes, "When our Lord, whose precepts we ought to follow, was settling the honors of his bishop, and the regimen of his church, we find him speaking thus to Peter: 'I say unto thee that thou art Peter.' &c. From the regular succession downwards, we find the ordination of bishops, and the course of ecclesiastical administrations, so as that we understood the church to be settled upon her bishops. The deacons ought no more to attempt any thing against bishops by whom deacons are made, than deacons should against God who makes bishops."

To add authorities would be unnecessary. One fact is however worthy of consideration—that there is no ancient ecclesiastical writer extant who does not speak of certain individuals as bishops of particular churches: for instance, Ignatius, bishop of Antioch; Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna; or who mentions as cotemporary with them in their particular churches any other bishops. This uniformity is not to be explained, but on the principle that there was in each of those churches some one individual supreme in the powers of ordination and government, on whom was bestowed the title of bishop. It is proper in this place to make a distinction between the ministers and government of the church properly so called. The ministry is of divine constitution, in the three orders of bishop, priest, and deacons. But the government of the church is of human regulation, and susceptible of such modifications as circumstances may render advisable. Offices may be organized; the mode in which her ministers are invested with jurisdiction may be varied; the constitution of her legislative, executive and judiciary powers may assume such organization as expediency may dictate. "I may securely," (says Hooker,) "therefore conclude that there are at this day in the Church of England no other than the same degrees of ecclesiastical orders, namely, bishops, priests, and deacons, which had their beginning from Christ and his blessed apostles themselves. As for deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, curates, archdeacons, and such like names being not found in the Scriptures, we have been thereby, through some men's errors, thought to allow ecclesiastical degrees not known nor ever heard of in the better ages of former times. All these are in truth but titles of office, wherunto partly ecclesiastical persons and partly others are in sundry forms and conditions admitted, as the state of the church doth need, degrees of order still remaining the same they were from the beginning."

We conclude with a challenge from the matchless Hooker—which, as has been well remarked, has remained two hundred years unanswered—"We require you to find out but one church upon the face of the whole earth that hath not been ordered by episcopal regiment since the time that the blessed apostles were here conversant." And though departures from it, (says bishop Doane,) since the time of which he spoke have been but too frequent and too great, "episcopal regiment" is still maintained as Christ's ordinance for the perpetuation and government of his church, and is received as such by eleven twelfths of the whole Christian world.

ANTI-EPISCOPAL ARGUMENT.

It is now generally conceded, that there is no distinction made in the New Testament between bishops and elders or presbyters.* The terms are used interchangeably.

* In a celebrated work, "The Institution of the Christian Man," approved expressly by archbishop Cranmer, bishops Jewell, Miller, and Stillingfleet, and the main body of the English clergy, together with the king and parliament, it is declared, "In the New Testament there is no mention of any other degrees but deacons or ministers, and presbyters or bishops." The celebrated Hooker, the ablest statesman, lawyer, and divine of his age, and the ablest defender of the episcopal system in all churches that has been, without holding any one certain form to be necessary in them all. And the general principles are such as do not particularly describe any one; but sundry forms of discipline may be

Bishop Onderdonk, in his "Episcopacy tested by Scripture," says "the name bishop, which now designates the highest grade in the ministry, is not appropriated to this office in Scripture. That name is given to the middle order or presbyters, (elders,) and all that we read in the New Testament concerning bishops is to be regarded as pertaining to the middle grade." The ground assumed now by those who contend for the authority of prelatical bishops is, that the apostles (to whom they say bishops have succeeded) were a superior order of officers in the primitive church; presbyters or elders a second grade; and deacons a third. To maintain this ground, it must be shown, 1. That the peculiarity of the apostles' office was, that they exclusively ordained, administered discipline or rule, and exercised an oversight of the churches, these being the peculiar powers now claimed by bishops; 2. That they transmitted their office and powers to others; 3. That there has been an uninterrupted succession of such officers to the present bishops. Failing to establish either of these points, it is clear, is fatal to their cause. But,

1. The commission in Matt. 28: 19, 20 is plainly given to all ministers, to the end of the world, and conveys the same authority to all.

The very same duties are assigned to all ministers in the New Testament. Episcopalians deny this in reference to ordination and discipline. In 1 Tim. 3: 2, 4 and 5, "a bishop must be one that ruleth well his own house;" otherwise "how shall he take care of the church?" 1 Tim. 5: 17, "let the elders who rule well be counted worthy of double honor," &c. Here ruling is as expressly assigned to elders as bishops; and this is the only place where ruling is expressly assigned to a bishop.

Ordination (see article ORDINATION) is spoken of as having been exercised both by the apostles, Acts 6: 13. 3: 14: 23, and by the presbyters,* 1 Tim. 4: 14. The only case in which ordination can possibly be ascribed to any person who was a bishop in the modern sense, is 1 Tim. 5: 22, and this depends wholly on the supposition that Timothy was such a bishop, which cannot be proved. It is a proper exhortation to a presbyter, and is often used at modern ordinations. Timothy was himself ordained by the presbytery, and of course was no more than a common presbyter.

But on the power of ordination, as well as of discipline, the Scriptures lay very little stress. Ordaining is mentioned but nine times, and in all cases but two, incidentally; ruling six times, and without a hint of its peculiar consequence. Preaching (the duty of presbyters) is exhibited as the great and important duty of a minister, and ordination and ruling powers as altogether inferior. In 1 Tim. 5: 17, superior honor is given to those who preach, on account of the superiority of their employment. Of course the peculiar powers claimed for bishops (the alleged superior officers) are far below those assigned to presbyters (the inferior officers!)

It is important also to observe, particularly, 1st. The manner in which ministers are spoken of in Mark 10:

equally consistent with the general axioms of Scripture." Dr. Keywolds, professor of divinity at Oxford, Eng., declares that all who labored for five hundred years before his time, thought that "all pastors, whether entitled bishops or priests, have equal power and authority by the word of God" and this he declares to be the common judgment of the reformed churches in Switzerland, Savoy, France, Germany, Hungary, Poland, Netherlands, Scotland and England, embracing the Oxford, Protestant world. Dr. Holland, king's professor of divinity at Oxford, says, "that to affirm the office of bishop to be different from that of presbyter is false and contrary to Scripture, the fathers, and to the doctrines of the church of England." Bishop Burnet acknowledges the same thing. The London Christian Observer, the leading Episcopal periodical in England, said in 1804, "Episcopalians found no merits of their cause upon any express injunction or delineation of ecclesiastical government in the Scriptures, for there is none."

* In 1 Tim. 4: 14 is a clear case of presbyterian, or congregational ordination. "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (or assembly of elders.) Here the presbytery laid on their hands and bore agency in the transaction. It vain will Episcopalians say the imposition of hands always denotes conferring some gift. But, say they, from Paul was derived the virtue of the act, ("by the putting on of my hands," 2 Tim. 1: 6.) That Paul assisted there is no doubt; but that he took any superior part, there is no proof. One text is as strong as the other, and the only mode of reconciling the two is to understand Paul and the presbytery to have had an equal and joint agency in the transaction, as to the use of the word "with" in one case and "by" in the other, there cannot be shown to be any essential difference in the meaning or force.

42, 45 and the parallel passage; and our Lord's reproach of James and John when they sought an office of superior power and dignity. See also Matt. 23: 6-12. 2d. Whenever the officers of the church are mentioned together, no more than two classes are ever spoken of, and Peter and John certainly styled themselves explicitly elders; thus, so far as ministerial power and rank are concerned, putting themselves on a par with all other ministers. No bishop would do it at the present day. In 1 Tim. 3, where Paul instructs Timothy in the qualifications of ecclesiastical officers more extensively than is done in any other part of the New Testament, we find no officers mentioned but bishops or elders, and deacons. 3d. Notice the circumstances recorded in Acts 15.

11. Moreover, (1.) there is no command in the New Testament to the apostles to transmit the peculiarities of their office. (2.) There is no intimation that it would be so transmitted, no directions (as in the case of other officers) as to the qualifications and duties of such officers, and no exhortation to ministers or churches to submit to them. (3.) It was impossible that the peculiarity of the office could be transmitted. (See APOSTLE.) (4.) It cannot be proved, though often affirmed, that Timothy and Titus were prelatical bishops.*

111. But admitting all that is claimed on these points by the advocates of episcopacy, there is not the slightest reason to believe that the superior office (of bishops) has been uninterruptedly transmitted to the present incumbents. The chief ground relied on to prove the succession is the testimony of the fathers. But this testimony is not deserving of the credit sometimes given to it. For, (1.) those who have testified on this subject have given erroneous testimony on other subjects.† (2.) The works of several of the fathers have been corrupted and partially lost. Mosheim says of Ignatius' writings, (often appealed to in this controversy,) "the authenticity of the epistle to Polycarp is extremely doubtful, and the question concerning all his epistles involved in much obscurity and many difficulties." (3.) The testimony of the fathers does not establish the distinction in the clergy contended for;‡ but Irenæus, the best witness, particularly testifies that ministerial power is presbyterian, not episcopal. (4.) The succession, if traced at all, must be through the church of Rome,§ a precarious and uncomfortable ground of Christian confidence. That any powers of a divine nature passed through such impure hands, will be slowly admitted by a man of piety. (5.) The ordination of English bishops cannot be traced up to the church of Rome.¶

* That Timothy was ever sole and permanent bishop or diocesan of Ephesus, is nowhere declared in the New Testament. The subscription at the close of 2 Tim. is admitted on all hands not to have been inspired, and is of no authority. The same remarks apply to the case of Titus. But Dr. Hoadley asks, "Why were Timothy and Titus commanded to ordain elders?" It does not appear that this was the chief reason of Timothy's being at Ephesus. Neither he or Titus had any stated residence in what are claimed to have been their dioceses. Both made a temporary visit to the respective places, and there exercised the various duties of a presbyter. † Irenæus testifies that Linus was made bishop of Rome by Paul and Peter; and after him Anacletus; and after him Clement. Tertullian says, that Clement was first bishop of Rome, after the death of Peter and Paul. He also says that Peter was first bishop of Antioch. Again, that Euodias was first bishop of Antioch. Jerome says that Peter sat at Rome twenty-five years, till the death of Nero. Again, the Ignatius was third bishop of Antioch after Peter. This shows that, except as to facts passing under their own eyes, the fathers are not to be relied on; they received traditionary accounts so loosely.

‡ The bishop of whom Ignatius speaks, was pastor of a single church, and performed all the ordinary duties of a minister. He exhorts Polycarp to preach, to see that widows were not neglected, and to inspect every marriage. He speaks of the bishops of the church in Magnesia in the plural number. Jerome says "a presbyter is the same as bishop, and originally the churches were governed by the joint council of the presbyters." Again, "the bishops know that they are greater than presbyters, rather by custom than by real appointment of the Lord." Tertullian says, "elders preside in the government of the church." Eusebius says, "the elders is used by the apostles, in speaking of the government of the church." Jerome. "The presbyters of Alexandria ordained their bishop for more than two hundred years." These ext. acts might be enlarged.

§ There were in the church of Rome at one time four pontiffs, who all denounced each other as usurpers. It is not agreed who were the first seven bishops of Rome. Eusebius himself acknowledges it is no easy matter to tell who succeeded the apostles. Contested elections in nearly every considerable city, and decrees of councils rendering null all those ordinances where any simoniacal contract existed, render it doubtful who were true bishops, and impossible to prove that any person on earth is a legal or lineal successor to the apostles.

¶ Doddridge refers to Jones' and Bada's Ecclesiastical History to

That a distinction in the ministry was introduced early after the apostolic age is admitted. But it appears to have been of human origin, and to have taken place gradually. BISSELL, (JOSIAH,) a generous philanthropist of this country, was the son of deacon Josiah Bissell. About the year 1814 or 1815, he was one of a number of young men, who removed from Pittsfield, Mass., to the new town of Rochester, N. Y. The increase in the value of the land which he had purchased made him rich; but his wealth he very liberally employed in promoting the various benevolent operations of the age. He expended many thousands of dollars. Were his example followed by the rich, the face of the world would soon be renewed. At great expense, he was the principal promoter of the "Pioneer" line of stages, so called, which did not run on Sunday, and which was established for the sole purpose of preventing the desecration of that holy day. His piety was ardent; his courage unshaken by the calumnies and revilings of men who preferred gain to godliness. As he had lived for Christ, he died in the triumphs of faith, early in April, 1831, aged forty years. When told that he would soon die, he said, "Why should I be afraid to die? The Lord knows, I have loved his cause more than all things else; I have wronged no man; I possess no man's goods; I am at peace with all men; I have peace, and trust, and confidence; I am ready, willing, yea, anxious to depart." When told the next day, that he was better, he said, "I desire to go; my face is set." "Tell my children to choose the Lord Jesus Christ for their portion, and to serve him better than I have done. Say to the church,—Go on gloriously. Say to impenitent sinners,—If they wish to know the value of religion, look at a dying bed."—Allen.

BITE. Angry to contend with and injure others is called by St. Paul a biting of them; it is learned from the old serpent, it manifests malice, and spreads a destructive infection. Gal. 5: 25. (See BACKBITING.) Divine judgments are sometimes compared to the bite of a serpent, to indicate their suddenness, sharpness, and destructive power. Eccl. 10: 8. Jer. 8: 17. Hab. 2: 7. For the like reason, wine, when for a long time used to excess, bites like a serpent, and stings like an adder. Prov. 23: 32.

BITHYNIA; (1 Pet. 1: 1.) a province of Asia Minor, in the northern part of that peninsula; on the shore of the Euxine, having Phrygia and Galatia to the south. It is famous as being one of the provinces to which the apostle Peter addressed his first epistle; also, as having been under the government of Pliny, who describes the manners and characters of the Christians there, about A. D. 106; also for the holding the most celebrated council of the Christian church in the city of Nice, its metropolis, about A. D. 325. It should seem to be, with some justice, considered as a province taught by Peter; and we read (Acts 16: 7) that when Paul attempted to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered him not. It is directly opposite to Constantinople.—Calmet.

BITTERNESS, WATERS OF. (See ADULTERY.)

BITTER HERBS. (merurim.) Exod. 12: 8, and Num. 9: 11. The Jews were commanded to eat their passover with a salad of bitter herbs; but whether one particular plant was intended, or any kind of bitter herbs, has been made a question. By the Septuagint it is rendered epikridon; by Jerome, "cim lactucis agrestibus"; and by the Gr. Venet. epi pikrisin. Dr. Geddes remarks, that "it is highly probable that the succory or wild lettuce is meant."

substantiate the fact, "that in the year 663, the successors to Austria the monk being almost extinct in England, by for the greater part of the bishops were of Scottish origin, by Aidan and Finan, who came out of the Cildes monastery, and were nothing more than presbyters; though when the northern princes were converted by them, they made them bishops." Baxter says, remarking on the testimony of Bede, "You will find that the English had a succession of bishops by the Scottish presbyters' ordination, and there is no mention in Bede of any scruple of its lawfulness of the course."

The Mishna in Pesachim, cap. 2, reckons five species of these bitter herbs: 1. Chazareth, taken for lettuce; 2. Ulsin, supposed to be endive or succory; 3. Tamea, probably tansy; 4. Charubbinin, which Bochart thought might be the nettle, but Scheuchzer shows to be the camomile; 5. Meror, the sow-thistle, or dent-de-lion, or wild lettuce. Mr. Forskal says, "the Jews in Sana and in Egypt eat the lettuce with the paschal lamb." He also remarks, that moru is centaury, of which the young stems are eaten in February and March.—Watson.

BITTERN; a singular bird, about the size of the common heron, but differing from it greatly in the color of its plumage. The crown of the head is black, with a black spot also on each side about the angle of the mouth; the back and upper part are elegantly variegated with different colors, black, brown, and gray, in beautiful arrangement. This species of bird is common only in fen countries, where it is met with skulking about the reeds and sedge; and its usual posture is with the head and neck erect, and the beak pointed directly upwards. It permits persons to approach near to it, without rising. It flies principally towards the dusk of the evening, and then rises in a very singular manner, by a spiral ascent, till quite out of sight. It makes a curious noise when among the reeds, and a very different, though sufficiently singular one, as it rises on the wing in the night. See Wilson's Ornithology.

Isaiah, foretelling the destruction of Babylon, says, "I will make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water." Isa. 14: 23. And Zephaniah prophesying against Nineveh, says, "The flocks shall lie down in the midst of her; all the beasts of the nations, both the cormorant and the bittern, shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voice shall sing in the windows." Zeph. 2: 14.—Jones.

BLACKBURNE, (FRANCIS,) a theologian, was born at Richmond, in Yorkshire, in 1705, and was educated at Cambridge. He was a friend to religious liberty, and hostile to confessions of faith. On this subject he was deeply involved in controversy. The most celebrated of his performances on it is the Confessional, which appeared in 1776. His works have been collected in six volumes octavo. He died in 1787.—Davenport.

BLACKLOCK, (THOMAS,) a divine and poet, was born at Annan, in Dumfries, in 1721, and lost his sight by the small pox, when he was only six months old. To amuse and instruct him, his father and friend used to read to him, and by this means he acquired a fund of information, and even some knowledge of Latin. At the age of twelve, he began to versify, and his devotion to the muses was continued through life. Considering his circumstances, his poems have great merit. He studied at the university of Edinburgh for ten years, and his progress in the sciences was very considerable. He was ordained minister of Kircudbright, but, being opposed by the parishioners, he retired on an annuity, and received students at Edinburgh as boarders, and assisted them in their studies. Besides his poems, he is the author of some theological works, and an article on the education of the blind; the latter was printed in the Encyclopædia Britannica. He died in July, 1791, regretted by all his friends.—Davenport.

BLACKMAN, (ADAM,) first minister of Stratford, Conn., was a preacher in Leicestershire and Derbyshire, England. After he came to this country, he preached a short time at Scituate, and then at Guilford; in 1640, he was settled at Stratford, where he died in 1665. His successors were Israel Chauncey, Timothy Cutler, Hezekiah Gould, Israel Wetmore, and recently Mr. Dutton, afterwards professor at Yale. Notwithstanding his name, Mather represents him as for his holiness "purer than snow, whiter than milk." With almost the same name as Melancthon, he was a Melancthon among the reformers of New Haven, but with less occasion, than the German, to complain, that "old Adam was too hard for his young namesake." Mr. Hooker so much admired the plainness and simplicity of his preaching, that he said, if he could have his choice, he should choose to live and die under his ministry. His son, Benjamin, a graduate of Harvard college in 1668, preached for a time at Malden, but left that place in 1678, and afterwards at Scarborough. In 1683, he was a repre sentative of Saco, in which town he was a large landholder, and owner of all the mill privileges on the east side of the river. He probably died in Boston.—Magnalia, iii. 94; Folsom's Hist. Saco, 164.

BLACKSTONE, (SIR WILLIAM,) an eminent and religious lawyer, was the third son of a silk mercer, and was born in London, in 1723. After having been for several years at the Charter house, he completed his education at Pembroke college, Oxford, and at both seminaries displayed superior talent. Having chosen the profession of the law, and entered the Middle Temple, in 1741, he wrote his elegant valectictory poem, the Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse. He remained in comparative obscurity till 1753, when he began to deliver, at Oxford, his lectures on the English laws; which, in 1765 and the four following years, he published, with the title of Commentaries on the Laws of England. In consequence of these lectures, he was elected Vinerian professor of law in the university, and obtained a great accession of business. In 1761, he sat in parliament as member for Hindon, and was made king's counsel, and solicitor-general to the queen. In 1770, he was offered the place of solicitor-general, but declined it, and was made a judge of the king's bench, whence he was soon after transferred to the common pleas. He died in 1780. Blackstone was the first who wrote on the dry and repulsive subject of English law, in such a manner as not to excite disgust in a reader of taste. Like almost all lawyers, he leans to the side of prerogative; nor is there much more of enlargement in his principles of religious liberty. For this reason he was exposed to attack from Priestley, Junius, and Bentham.—Davenport.

BLAIR, (ROBERT,) a divine and poet, was born at Edinburgh, in 1699, and educated at that university. He was minister of Athelstanford, in East Lothian, where he died in 1747. His poem of the Grave is popular, and deservedly so, and has obtained him a place among our standard poets.—Davenport.

BLAIR, (DR. HUGH,) was born at Edinburgh in 1718, and was the son of a merchant. He was educated at the university of his native city, and was licensed to preach in 1741, when he became minister of Colesie, in Fife. In 1743, he was appointed minister of the Canongate, Edinburgh; in 1754, he was removed to Lady Yester's; and in 1759 to the High Church, where he continued during the remainder of his life. A professorship of rhetoric and belles lettres having been founded by his majesty, in 1762, Dr. Blair was appointed professor; and here originated his Lectures on Composition, which he published in 1783. The first volume of his Sermons was published in 1777, and acquired such a rapid popularity, that he not only obtained a large sum of money for the succeeding volumes, but was rewarded with a pension of two hundred pounds per annum. Dr. Blair died at Edinburgh, in 1800. In his sermons, his style is elegant, and he enforces the moral duties with great felicity of language and argument. His lectures still remain a standard work.—Davenport.

BLAIR, (JAMES,) first president of William and Mary college, Virginia, and a learned divine, was born and educated in Scotland, where he obtained a benefice in the episcopal church. On account of the unsettled state of religion, which then existed in that kingdom, he quitted his preferments and went into England near the end of the reign of Charles II. The bishop of London prevailed on him to go to Virginia as a missionary, about the year 1685; and in that colony, by his exemplary conduct and unwearied labors in the work of the ministry, he much promoted religion, and gained to himself esteem and reputation.

Perceiving that the want of schools and seminaries for literary and religious instruction would in a great degree defeat the exertions which were making, in order to propagate the gospel, he formed the design of establishing a college at Williamsburg. This object he effected, and he was its first president. After a life of near sixty years in the ministry, he died in a good old age, August 1, 1743, and went to enjoy the glory for which he was destined. He published our Savior's Divine Sermon on the Mount explained, and the Practice of it recommended, in divers Sermons and Discourses, 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1742. This work is spoken of with high approbation by Dr. Doddridge, and by Dr. Williams in his Christian Preacher.—Introduction to the above work; Miller's Retr. ii. 335, 336; New and Gen. Eng. Dict.; Burnet's Hist. Own Times, ii. 129, 130, folio; Keith, 168; Beverley; Allen.

BLAIR, (SAMUEL,) a learned minister in Pennsylvania, was a native of Ireland. He came to America very early in life, and was one of Mr. Tennent's pupils in his academy at Neshaminy. About the year 1745, he himself opened an academy at Fog's manor, Chester county, with particular reference to the study of theology as a science. He also took the pastoral charge of the church in this place.

Mr. Blair was one of the most learned and able, as well as pious, excellent, and venerable men of his day. He was a profound divine, and a most solemn and impressive preacher. To his pupils he was himself an excellent model of pulpit eloquence. In his life he gave them an admirable example of Christian meekness, of ministerial diligence, of candor, and catholicism, without a dereliction of principle. He was eminently serviceable to the part of the country where he lived, not only as a minister of the gospel, but as a teacher of human knowledge. From his academy, that school of the prophets, as it was frequently called, there issued forth many excellent pupils, who did honor to their instructor, both as scholars and Christian ministers. Among the distinguished characters, who received their classical and theological education at this seminary, were his nephew, Alexander Cumming, Samuel Davies, Dr. Rodgers of New York, and James Finley, Hugh Henry, and a number of other respectable clergymen.—Allen; Miller's Retr. ii. 343; Mass. Miss. Mag. iii. 362; Davies' Life.

BLAIR, (JOHN,) one of the associate judges of the Supreme court of the United States, died at Williamsburg in Virginia, August 31, 1800, aged sixty-eight. He was an amiable, accomplished, and truly virtuous man. He discharged with ability and integrity the duties of a number of the highest and most important public trusts; and in these, as well as in the relations of private life, his conduct was upright and so blameless, that he seldom or never lost a friend, or made him an enemy. Even calumny, which assailed Washington, shrunk from his friend, the unassuming and pious Blair. Through life he in a remarkable manner experienced the truth of our Savior's declaration, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth;" and at death he illustrated the force of the exclamation, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."—Claypole's Adv. Sept. 12, 1800; Marshall, v. 216; Allen.

BLAKE, (ROBERT,) one of the most celebrated of British admirals, was born at Bridgewater, in 1599, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford. By the interest of the Puritans, he was elected member for Bridgewater, in 1640. In the struggle between Charles I. and his people, he espoused the cause of liberty, and distinguished himself by his gallant defence of Taunton, and other exploits. In 1649, he was put in command of the fleet. His first achievement was the destruction of prince Rupert's squadron, at Malaga. In 1652 and 1653, he fought four desperate engagements with the Dutch fleet, under Van Tromp, in two of which the enemy were defeated with great loss. The next theatre of Blake's glory was the Mediterranean, to which he sailed in 1654, and where he destroyed the Tunisian castles of Goletta and Porto Ferino, and intercepted the Spanish plate fleet. Having received intelligence that another plate fleet was lying at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, he sailed thither, forced his way into the harbor, burned the ships, and came out without having suffered any loss. His health was now entirely broken, and he bent his course homeward, but expired, August 27, 1657, while the fleet was entering Plymouth Sound. Admiral Blake was not merely a man of courage and talent; he was pious, just, and singularly disinterested.—Davenport.

BLAME. That certain actions are wrong, and deserve blame, is generally admitted; but in settling the application of blame, there has been not a little discussion among philosophers. The question lies at the foundation of morals. In treating it, three inquiries are necessary: Who is the agent? What rule had he to direct him? In what circumstances was he placed?

For in the first place, we never attribute blame to any merely physical agent, but only to a moral agent. When a house is set on fire, we attach no blame to the firebrand, but only to the incendiary. Nor is even a moral agent subject to blame, unless complete in his faculties; the idiot and the lunatic are therefore free. In the next place, a complete moral agent, under given circumstances, we compare with some rule. Different views of blame arise from applying different rules as the standard of judgment. This is evident among the heathen, in the absence of divine revelation. And in Christian communities, the difference springs from not understanding the revealed rule of right. God has given us the true standard in his word. Conformity to this standard is virtue; want of such conformity is vice, or in other words, sin. Every deviation from it, or defect in coming up to it, resulting from choice or inclination, is worthy of blame. An action or emotion of the soul is not blameworthy, unless it flows from design or evil disposition. Evil disposition is in fact essential to blame. If we find this in a moral agent, we find all that is necessary to lay the foundation for blame. The evil lies in the nature of the disposition, not in its cause. Hence the folly and futility of common excuses, founded on natural propensities or peculiar circumstances of temptation. Hence the criminality of men, who attempt to excuse themselves for the same things they blame in others. Rom. 2: 1—10. Some place all blame in actions; but our Lord has taught us to place it chiefly on wrong affections, (Matt. 6: 1—34. Mark 7: 20—23.) and reason echoes to his voice; for all actions take their moral character and coloring from the disposition. Circumstances do indeed modify the hues of guilt, giving it a softer or a sterner shade; and blame is graduated accordingly. But the original ground of blame is found in voluntary deviation from the divine rule of rectitude. Who can understand his errors? Ps. 19: 12.

BLANCHE OF CASTILE, daughter of Alphonso IX. king of Castile, and Eleanor of England, wife of Lewis VIII. and mother of Lewis IX. king of France, was born 1185, and died 1253. She was the second of eleven children, and educated by her mother, a wise and virtuous princess, with great care. When about fifteen or sixteen years of age, she became the wife of prince Lewis, son of Philip Augustus of France. During the reign of Philip, Lewis and Blanche were much at court, where the beauty and fine qualities of the latter made her equally loved and admired. In 1223, she mounted the throne; and by her conduct in this high station justified the choice of her husband. They had nine sons and two daughters. After her husband's death, from the absence or flight of the nobility, many of whom refused, on various pretences, to attend her son's coronation, she found herself in a species of solitude; but putting her trust in Heaven, she exerted her utmost powers in spite of discouragement. This extraordinary woman, who to unrivalled beauty, wit, eloquence, and address, joined the undaunted spirit of a hero, and the foresight and prudence of the most enlightened politician, having assumed the regency, soon gave a form to the government, and confided the education of her son to the constable de Montmorenci, the greatest statesman and warrior in France. All those she placed about the prince and her other children, were remarkable for their knowledge and piety. The wisdom and energy of her administration crushed the spirit of rebellion, and gave peace to her distracted country. When her son Lewis, in 1248, undertook an expedition to the Holy Land, she remonstrated against it; for, though pious, she was elevated above the political errors of her age. When delivering the sovereign authority into his hands, she said, "I would rather a thousand times consent to lose you, all royal as you are, and more dear to me than all the world contains, than know you to commit a fault which may deprive you of the protection of Heaven."—Betham.

BLANDINA; a Christian martyr of Lyons, who suffered in the second century, in the severe persecution under Marcus Antoninus, (or Aurelius.) Though of so weak and delicate a constitution, that her friends feared she would not be able to sustain the tortures with the rest of her fellow-sufferers, they were all deceived. She was tortured in different ways, from morning till night, and while her body was torn and mangled, she only said, "I am a Christian, and no evil is committed among us." Being afterwards thrust, with others, into a horrid dungeon, their feet distended in a wooden trunk, till many died, she appears to have aided in confirming and comforting her companions. They were at length led out into the amphitheatre, and exposed to wild beasts. Blandina, suspended to a stake in the form of a cross, was engaged in earnest prayer, and greatly encouraged her fellow-sufferers by her meek and undaunted behavior. None of the beasts at that time touching her, she was reserved for a future trial.

On the last day of the spectacles, Blandina was again brought from the prison, with Pontius, a Christian youth of fifteen. They were ordered to swear by the idols; and the mob, perceiving that all their menaces availed nothing, became incensed, and aggravated their tortures by all possible methods. Pontius, after a magnanimous exercise of patience, died under his sufferings. And Blandina, last of all, who had exhorted her now lifeless friends, as a mother her children, soon followed them to the presence of the Lord; rejoicing in the triumph which his grace had won in their fidelity, even unto death. Even her enemies confessed that no woman among them had ever suffered so much.

These sufferers of Lyons disclaimed the name of martyrs as too glorious for them; but they showed a constancy, mildness, and charity truly apostolical. They reproached not those who fell away from the faith, but prayed to God for them; and many who had shrunk back like Peter, now returned with penitent hearts, and voluntarily declared that they were Christians.—Betham; Milner.

BLASPHEMY, blasphemia, properly denotes calumny, detraction, reproachful or abusive language, against whomsoever it is vented. That blasphemia and its conjugates are very often applied, says Dr. Campbell, to reproaches not aimed against God, is evident from the following passages: Matt. 12: 31, 32. 27: 39. Mark 15: 29. Luke 22: 65. 23: 39. Rom. 3: 8. 14: 16. 1 Cor. 4: 13. 10: 30. Eph. 4: 31. 1 Tim. 6: 4. Titus 3: 2. 1 Peter 4: 14. Jude 9, 10. Acts 6: 11, 13. 2 Peter 2: 10, 11; in the much greater part of which the English translators, sensible that they could admit no such application, have not used the words blaspheme or blasphemy, but rail, revile, speak evil, &c. In one of the passages quoted, a reproachful charge brought even against the devil, is called krisis blasphemias, (Jude 9.) and rendered by them, "railing accusation." The import of the word blasphemia, is maledictio, in the largest acceptation; comprehending all sorts of verbal abuse, imprecation, reviling, and calumny. And let it be observed, that when such abuse is mentioned as uttered against God, there is properly no change made in the signification of the word: the change is only in the application; that is, in the reference to a different object. The idea conveyed in the explanation now given is always included, against whomsoever the crime be committed. In this manner, every term is understood that is applicable to both God and man. Thus, the meaning of the word disobey is the same, whether we speak of disobeying God or of disobeying man. The same may be said of believe, honor, fear, &c. As therefore, the sense of the term is the same, though differently applied, what is essential to constitute the crime of detraction in the one case, is essential also in the other. But it is essential to this crime, as commonly understood, when committed by one man against another, that there be in the injurious person the will or disposition to detract from the person abused. Mere mistake in regard to character, especially when the mistake is not conceived by him who entertains it to lessen the character, nay, is supposed, however erroneously, to exalt it, is never construed by any into the crime of defamation. Now, as blasphemy is in its essence the same crime, but immensely aggravated by being committed against an object infinitely superior to man, what is fundamental to the very existence of the crime will be found in this, as in every other species which comes under the general name. There can be no blasphemy, therefore, where there is not an impious purpose to derogate from the divine Majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. The blasphemer is no other than the calumniator of Almighty God. To constitute the crime, it is as necessary that this species of calumny be intentional. He must be one, therefore, who by his impious talk endeavors to inspire others with the same irreverence towards the Deity, or perhaps abhorrence of him, which he indulges in himself. And though, for the honor of human nature, it is to be hoped that very few arrive at this enormous guilt, it ought not to be dissembled, that the habitual profanation of the name and attributes of God, by common swearing, is but too manifest an approach towards it. There is not an entire coincidence: the latter of these vices may be considered as resulting solely from the defect of what is good in principle and disposition; the former, from the acquisition of what is evil in the extreme: but there is a close connexion between them, and an insensible gradation from the one to the other. To accustom one's self to treat the Sovereign of the universe with irreverent familiarity, is the first step; malignity to arraign his attributes, and revile his providence, is the last. The first divine law published against it, "He that blasphemeth the name of the Lord," (or Jehovah, as it is in the Hebrew), "shall be put to death," (Lev. 24: 16.) when considered along with the incident that occasioned it, suggests a very atrocious offence in words, no less than abuse or imprecations vented against the Deity. And if we add to this the only other memorable instance in sacred history, namely, that of Rabshakeh, it will lead us to conclude that it is solely a malignant attempt, in words, to lessen men's reverence of the true God, and, by vilifying his perfections, to prevent their placing confidence in him, which is called in Scripture blasphemy, when the word is employed to denote a sin committed directly against God. This was manifestly the attempt of Rabshakeh, when he said, "Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the Lord," (the word is Jehovah), "saying, Jehovah will surely deliver us. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria? Where are the gods of Hamath and Arpad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Iva? Have they delivered Samaria out of my hand? Who are they, among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, that Jehovah should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand?" 2 Kings 18: 30, 33—35.—Watson.

BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST. It will naturally occur to inquire, what that is, in particular, which our Lord denominates "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit." Matt. 12: 31, 32. Mark 3: 28, 29. Luke 12: 10. But without entering minutely into the discussion of this question, it may suffice here to observe, that this blasphemy is certainly not of the constructive kind, but direct, manifest, and malignant. First, it is mentioned as comprehended under the same genus with abuse against men, and contradistinguished only by the object. Secondly, it is further explained by being called speaking against in both cases: "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man,"—"Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost." The expressions are the same, in effect, in all the evangelists who mention it, and imply such an opposition as is both intentional and malevolent. This cannot have been the case of all who disbelieved the mission of Jesus, and even decried his miracles; many of whom, we have reason to think, were afterwards converted by the apostles. But it was the wretched case of some who, instigated by worldly ambition and avarice, slandered what they knew to be the cause of God; and, against conviction, reviled his work as the operation of evil spirits. This view of the sin against the Holy Ghost is confirmed by the circumstances under which our Lord spoke. (See UNPARDONABLE SIN.)—Watson.

BLESILLA; daughter of Paula, a celebrated Roman lady, and sister of Eustochium; died at Rome in 389, aged twenty. She was a woman of great sensibility, piety, and learning. She was very beautiful, and in early life much addicted to dress; but becoming more deeply impressed with religious ideas, she gave herself up to study and prayer. On the death of her husband, though so young, she refused to enter into any other engagement, and is much extolled by St. Jerome, for her memory and eloquence. She knew perfectly the Greek and Latin languages, and had conquered so well the difficulties of the Hebrew, as to speak it with facility.—Betham.

BLEMISH; whatever renders a person or thing imperfect or unlovely. The Jewish law required the priests to be free from blemishes of person. Lev. 21: 17—23. 22: 20—24. Scandalous professors are blemishes to the church of God, (2 Peter 2: 13. Jude 12.) and therefore ought to be put away from it, in the exercise of a godly discipline.

BLESS, BLESSING. There are three points of view in which the acts of blessing may be considered. The first is, when men are said to bless God, as in Psalm 103: 1, 2. We are then not to suppose that the divine Being, who is over all, and, in himself, blessed for evermore, is capable of receiving any augmentation of his happiness, from all the creatures which he has made: such a supposition, as it would imply something of imperfection in the divine nature, must ever be rejected with abhorrence; and, therefore, when the creatures bless the adorable Creator, they only ascribe to him that praise and dominion, and honor, and glory, and blessing, which it is equally the duty and joy of his creatures to render. But when God is said to bless his people, (Gen. 1: 22. Eph. 1: 3.) the meaning is, that he confers benefits upon them, either temporal or spiritual, and so communicates to them some portion of that blessedness which, in infinite fulness, dwells in himself. James 1: 17. Psalm 104: 24, 28. Luke 1: 9—13. In the third place, men are said to bless their fellow-creatures. From the time that God entered into covenant with Abraham, and promised extraordinary blessings to his posterity; it appears to have been customary for the father of each family, in the direct line, or line of promise, previous to his death, to call his children around him, and to inform them, according to the knowledge which it pleased God then to give him, how, and in what manner, the divine blessing conferred upon Abraham was to descend among them. Upon these occasions, the patriarchs enjoyed a divine illumination; and under its influence, their benediction was deemed a prophetic oracle foretelling events with the utmost certainty, and extending to the remotest period of time. Thus Jacob blessed his sons, (Gen. 49:) and Moses, the children of Israel. Deut. 33:. When Melchisedek blessed Abraham, the act of benediction included in it not merely the pronouncing solemn good wishes, but also a petitionary address to God that he would be pleased to ratify the benediction by his concurrence with what was prayed for. Thus Moses instructed Aaron, and his descendants, to bless the congregation, "In this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee pace." Num. 4: 23. David says, "I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord." Ps. 116: 13. This phrase appears to be taken from the practice of the Jews in their thank-offerings, in which a feast was made of the remainder of their sacrifices, and the offerers, together with the priests, did eat and drink before the Lord; when, among other rites, the master of the feast took a cup of wine in his hand and solemnly blessed God for it, and for the mercies which were then acknowledged, and gave it to all the guests, every one of whom drank in his turn. To this custom it is supposed our blessed Lord alludes in the institution of the cup, which also is called, (1 Cor. 10: 16.) "the cup of blessing." At the family feasts also, and especially that of the passover, both wine and bread were in this solemn and religious manner distributed, and God was blessed, and his mercies acknowledged. They blessed God for their present refreshment, for their deliverance out of Egypt, for the covenant of circumcision, and for the law given by Moses; and prayed that God would be merciful to his people Israel, that he would send the prophet Elijah, and that he would render them worthy of the kingdom of the Messiah. See also 1 Chron. 16: 2, 3. In the Mosaic law, the manner of blessing is appointed by the lifting up of hands. Our Lord lifted up his hands, and blessed his disciples. It is probable that this action was constantly used on such occasions. The palm of the hand held up was precatory; and the palm turned outwards or downwards was benedictory. (See BENEDICTION, and LORD'S SUPPER.)—Watson.

BLINDFOLDING. This is the treatment which Christ received from his enemies. It refers to a sport which was common among children, called mainda, in which it was the manner first to blindfold, then to strike, and to ask who gave the blow, and not to let the person go till he had named the right man who had struck him. It was used in reproach of our blessed Lord as a prophet, or divine instructor, and to expose him to ridicule. Luke 22: 63, 64.—Watson.

BLINDNESS, is often used in Scripture to express ignorance, or a want of discernment in divine things, as well as the being destitute of natural sight. (See Isa. 42: 18, 19. 6: 10. Matt. 15: 14.) "Blindness of heart" is the want of understanding arising from the influence of vicious passions. "Hardness of heart" is stubbornness of will, and destitution of moral feeling. Moses says, "Thou shalt not put a stumbling-block before the blind," (Lev. 19: 14.) which may be understood literally; or figuratively, as if Moses recommended that charity and instruction should be shown to them who want light and counsel, or to those who are in danger of going wrong through their ignorance. Moses says also, "Cursed be he who maketh the blind to wander out of his way," (Deut. 27: 18.) which may also be taken in the same manner. An ignorant or erring teacher is compared by our Lord to a blind man leading a blind man;—a strong representation of the presumption of him that professes to teach the way of salvation without due qualifications, and of the danger of that implicit faith which is often placed by the people in the authority of man, to the neglect of the Holy Scriptures.

Blindness, as a disease of the organ of vision, may be produced by drying up the natural humors of the eyes, through which the rays of light pass; and this may be the effect of old age, which produces dimness and at length blindness; or it may be the consequence of great heat, applied to the eyes, and in this manner one of the kings of England is said to have been blinded, by the holding of a heated brass basin before his eyes, which gradually exhaled their moisture. If the eyes are dried up, they must be hardened. Or, blindness may proceed from a cataract, or thick skin, growing over a part of the eye, and preventing the passage of the rays of light to the interior, the proper seat of vision; this might anciently be thought to give the appearance of hardness to the eye; and we ourselves call such an appearance a WALL-EYE.—The reader may recollect other instances.

Mr. Taylor wishes by these considerations to account for the seeming contrariety, which appears sometimes between the margin and the text in our translation, (and in other translations also,) which renders the same word blindness and hardness; for it is by no means unusual, for young persons especially, to discover the strong distinction between the terms blindness and hardness; while the cause of their adoption to express the same distemper, entirely escapes them. So we read, (Mark 3: 5.) "Being grieved for the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." So (Rom. 11: 25.) "Blindness—hardness—in part hath happened to Israel." Eph. 4: 18. "Because of the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." 2 Cor. 3: 14. "Their minds were blinded—hardened: and elsewhere. Now, if in these and other places, the disorder alluded to were a blindness occasioned by desiccation of the visual agents, or any of their parts, whether arising from causes already suggested, or from any other, then we readily perceive by what means the two ideas of blindness and hardness might originate from the same word; and that, in fact, both renderings may be correct, since by one we are led to the cause, hardness; and by the other to the effect, blindness.

There is another sense in which our English word set is used, in reference to the eyes; which, for aught we know, may be derived metaphorically from the state of plaster drying or hardened; that is, when it describes a stiff, immobile condition; a fixed, staring, effectless exertion of looking: but, the brain being in a state incompetent to profit by the sensations it receives from the optic nerves, (if indeed it do receive those sensations,) the party can hardly be said to see; and, it is questionable, whether the optic nerve itself be in a state to convey sensations to the brain, or the retina to receive that depiction of objects upon it, which is the sine qua non of vision. It is generally understood, (or ought to be,) that the phrase "make this people's heart fat," alludes to the effect of full feeding, of greedy gratification of the appetite, whereby a quantity of fat seats itself on the heart, and there increases, till it overburdens that important source of activity. In like manner, this setting of the eyes is the effect of that drowsy disposition which attends excess.

This investigation removes objections which have been raised from the commission given by God to the prophet. Some have said, God commands the prophet to do a certain thing to this people, and then punishes the people: nay, this appears stronger still, where the passage is quoted, as, (John 12: 40.) He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts; which seems to be contradictory to Matt. 13: 15. where the people themselves are said to have closed their own eyes: and so Acts 28: 27. These seeming contradictions are very easily reconciled, by taking the phraseology in its true import: (1.) "Set the eyes of this people"—prophecy such flaming times, such abundant jollity, that the people, devoting themselves to gormandizing, may be inebriated with the very idea; and still more with the enjoyment itself, when it arrives. (2.) God, by giving plenty and abundance, affords the means of the people's abusing his goodness, and becoming both over-fat with food, and intoxicated with drink; and thus, his very beneficence may be said to make their heart fat, and their eyes heavy: while, (3.) at the same time, the people by their own act, their over-feeding, become unweildy—indolent—bloated—over-fat at heart; and, moreover, so stupefied by liquor and strong drink, that their eyes and ears may be useless to them: with wide open eyes, "staring, they may stare, but not perceive; and listening, they may hear, but not understand;" and in this lethargic state they will continue; preferring it to a more sedate, rational condition, and refusing to forbear from prolonging the causes of it, lest at any sober interval they should see truly with their eyes, and hear accurately with their ears; in consequence of which they should be shocked at themselves, be converted, be changed from such misconduct, and I should heal them; should cure these delusory effects of their surfeits and dissoluteness. Compare Isa. 5: 11. 28: 7. Where is now the contradiction between these different representations of the same event?—Is it not an occurrence of daily notoriety, that God gives, but the sinner abuses his gifts to his own injury, of body and mind? No person who has witnessed the progress of intoxication, will deny that whatever efforts the party makes to see, those efforts are fruitless; his eyes goggle, wand'r, decline all manner of ways, notwithstanding this set-ness of their internal parts:—in fact, the muscles which move the eye may act, after a sort, while the eye itself is incapable of accurate vision, because incapable of transmitting correct images of external objects.

This may also hint a reason why our Lord spoke in parables; that is, the people were too much stupified to see the plain and simple truth; but their attention might possibly be gained by a tale, or be caught by an inference.—Watson; Calmet.

BLOOD. Besides its proper sense, the fluid of the veins of men and animals, the term in Scripture is used, 1. For life. "God will require the blood of a man," he will punish murder in what manner soever committed. "His blood be upon us," let the guilt of his death be imputed to us. "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth;" the murder committed on him crieth for vengeance. "The avenger of blood;" he who is to avenge the death of his relative. Numb. 35: 24, 27. 2. Blood means relationship, or consanguinity. 3. Flesh and blood are placed in opposition to a superior nature: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven." Matt. 16: 17. 4. They are also opposed to the glorified body: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. 15: 50. 5. They are opposed also to evil spirits: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood," against visible enemies composed of flesh and blood, "but against principalities and powers," &c. Eph. 6: 12. 6. Wine is called the pure blood of the grape: "Judah shall wash his garments in the blood of the grape." Gen. 49: 11. Deut. 32: 14. 7. The priests were established by God to judge between blood and blood; that is, in criminal matters, and where the life of man is at stake;—to determine whether the murder be casual, or voluntary; whether a crime deserve death, or admit of remission, &c. 8. In its most eminent sense, blood is used for the sacrificial death of Christ; whose blood or death is the price of our salvation. His blood has "purchased the church." Acts 20: 28. "We are justified by his blood." Rom. 5: 9. "We have redemption through his blood." Eph. 1: 7, &c. (See ATONEMENT.)

That singular and emphatic prohibition of blood for food from the earliest times, which we find in the holy Scriptures, deserves particular attention. God expressly forbade the eating of blood alone, or of blood mixed with the flesh of animals, as when any creature was suffocated, or strangled, or killed without drawing its blood from the carcass. Exod. 9: 4. Lev. 17: 10—14. (See ANIMAL.)

This restraint, than which nothing can be more express, was also, under the new covenant, enjoined upon believing Gentiles, as "a burden," which it seemed necessary to the Holy Spirit to impose upon them." Acts 15: 28, 29. For this prohibition, no moral reason seems capable of being offered; nor does it clearly appear that blood is an unwholesome aliment, which some think was the physical reason of its being inhibited; and if, in fact, blood is detestable as food, there seems no greater reason why this should be pointed out by special revelation to man, to guard him against injury, than many other unwholesome aliments. There is little force in the remark, that the eating of blood produces a ferocious disposition; for those nations that eat strangled things, or blood cooked with other aliments, do not exhibit more ferocity than others. The true reason was, no doubt, a sacrificial one.

Let any one attempt to discover any reason for the prohibition of blood to Noah, in the mere circumstance that it is "the life," and he will find it impossible. It is no reason at all, moral or instituted, except that as it was LIFE SUBSTITUTED FOR LIFE, the life of the animal in sacrifice for the life of man, and that, therefore, blood had a sacred appropriation. See ABEL.—Watson.

BLOT; a sinful stain; a reproach. Job 31: 7. Prov. 9: 7. To blot out living things, or one's name or remembrance, is to destroy, abolish. Gen. 7: 4. Deut. 9: 14, and 25: 19, and 29: 20. Col. 2: 14. To blot out sin, is fully and finally to forgive it. Isa. 44: 22. God's blotting men out of his book, is to deny them his providential favors, and cut them off by an untimely death. Ps. 39: 28. Exod. 32: 32, 33. His not blotting their name out of the book of life imports his clearly manifesting their eternal election. Rev. 3: 5.—Brown.

BLOW; a stroke; a heavy judgment inflicted by the rod of God's anger. Ps. 39: 10. Jer. 14: 7. To blow, as wind doth. The blowing of the Holy Ghost is his mysterious exertion of his power to convince, purify, refresh, and comfort his people. Song 4: 16. John 3: 8.—Brown.

BOANERGÉS. This word is neither Hebrew nor Syriac, and some have thought that the transcribers have not exactly copied it, and that the word was beneréen, which expresses the sound of the Hebrew of the phrase, "sons of thunder." The name Boanerges, therefore, given to James and John, imports that they should be eminent instruments in accomplishing a wondrous change, and should, like an earthquake or thunder, mightily bear down all opposition, by their inspired preaching and miraculous powers. That it does not relate to their manner of preaching is certain; for that clearly appears to have been calmly argumentative, and sweetly persuasive—the very reverse of what is usually called a thundering ministry.—Watson.

BOAR, wild. This animal, which is the original of all the varieties of the hog kind, is by no means so stupid nor so filthy a beast as that we have reduced to tameness. He is something smaller than the domestic hog, and does not so vary in his color, being always found of an iron gray, inclining to black; his snout is much larger than that of the tame animal, and the ears are shorter, rounder, and black; of which color are also the feet and the tail. But the tusks are larger than in the tame breed; they bend upwards circularly, and are exceedingly sharp at the points.

The wild boar roots up the ground in a different manner from the common hog; the one turns up the earth in little spots here and there; the other ploughs it up like a furrow, and does irreparable damage in the cultivated lands of the farmer, destroying the roots of the vine and other plants. From this we may see the propriety with which the psalmist represents the subversion of the Jewish commonwealth, under the allegory of a vine, destroyed by a boar: "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. Why hast thou broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the woods doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it." Psalm 80: 8—13. If this psalm was written, as is supposed, during the Babylonian captivity, the propriety of the allegory becomes more apparent. Not satisfied with devouring the plants and fruit which have been carefully raised by the skill and attention of the husbandman, the ferocious boar lacerates and breaks with his powerful tusks the roots and branches of the surrounding vines, and tramples them beneath his feet. The reader will easily apply this to the conduct pursued by the Chaldeans towards the Jewish state, whose desolation is thus pathetically bewailed by the prophet: "The Lord hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: he hath called an assembly against me to crush my young men: the Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press." Lam. 1: 15.

The boar is exceedingly fond of marshes, fens, and reedy places; a disposition which is probably referred to in Ps. 68: 30, "Rebuke the company of the spearmen,"—or, as it is literally, "the beast of the reeds," or canes.—Abbott's Script. Nat. History.

BOAST. The saints boast of or in God, or glory in Christ, when they rejoice in, highly value, and commend him, and loudly publish the great things he has done for them. Ps. 34: 2. Isa. 45: 25. Glory not, and lie not against the truth; do not proudly and deceitfully pretend to have true wisdom and zeal for God when you have it not. Jam. 3: 14.—Brown.

BOAZ; the name of one of those brazen pillars which Solomon erected in the porch of the temple, 1 Kings 7: 21. The other, called Jachin, was on the right hand of the entrance, Boaz on the left. Boaz signifies strength, firmness. They were together thirty-five cubits high: as in 2 Chron. 3: 15; i. e. each separately was seventeen cubits and a half: 1 Kings 7: 15. and Jer. 52: 21. say eighteen cubits, in round numbers. Jeremiah says the thickness of these columns was four fingers, for they were hollow; the circumference of them was twelve cubits, or four cubits diameter; the chapter of each was in all five cubits high.

These chapters, in different parts of Scripture, are said to be of different heights, of three, four, or five cubits; because they were composed of different ornaments or members, which were sometimes considered as omitted, sometimes as included. The body of the chapter was of three cubits, the ornaments with which it was joined to the shaft of the pillar, were of one cubit: these make four cubits; the row which was at the top of the chapter was also of one cubit; in all five cubits.—Calmet.

BOCHART, (SAMUEL;) a learned French Protestant divine and general scholar, born at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1599. His father was a Protestant minister, and his mother was the sister of Peter du Moulin. His studies were prosecuted under Thomas Dempster, at Paris, and afterwards at Sedan and Saumur. He made a very early progress in learning, particularly in the Greek language, of which we have a proof in the verses he composed in praise of his first master. Having gone through a course of philosophy, and studied theology under Camero, he followed the latter to London, where, however, he made but a short stay, for, about the end of 1621, he was at Leyden, applying himself to the study of the Arabic, under Erpenius. When Bochart returned to France, he was chosen minister of Caen, where he distinguished himself by public disputations with father Veron, a very famous controvertist. The dispute was held in the castle of Caen, in the presence of a great number of Catholics and Protestants. Bochart came off with honor and reputation, which was not a little increased on the publication of his Phaleg and Canaan, which are the titles of the two parts of his "Geographia Sacra," 1646. In 1652, the queen of Sweden invited him to Stockholm, where she gave him many proofs of her esteem and regard. At his return into France, he continued his ordinary exercises, and was one of the members of the Academy of Caen, which consisted of all the learned men of that place, whither several of the sons of the English gentry resorted for education; and among others, the earl of Roscommon, afterwards an eminent poet. One of his most learned works, and by which he acquired great fame, was his "Hierozicon," which treats of the natural history of the Scripture, particularly the animals, and which was printed in London in 1663. He died of apoplexy, while engaged in the academy in a public discussion with his friend Huet, May 16, 1667, at the age of sixty-eight.

Besides what we have mentioned, Bochart wrote a treatise on the Terrestrial Paradise, on the Plants and Precious Stones mentioned in Scripture, and some other pieces; but he left them unfinished. As many of his dissertations as could be collected were published in the edition of his works printed in Holland, 1692. The learned Rosenmueller published his Hierozicon in three volumes, quarto, Leipzig, 1793—1799, much enlarged and improved.—Bayle and Moreri; Jones's Chr. Biog.

BOCHIM, the place of mourners, or of weepings; a place near Shiloh, where the Hebrews celebrated their solemn feasts. Here the angel of the covenant appeared to them, and denounced the sinfulness of their idolatry, which caused bitter weeping among the people; whence the place had its name, Judg. 2: 10.—Calmet.

BODE, (CHRISTOPHER AUGUSTUS,) a learned German orientalist, was born at Wernigerode, in 1723, and acquired, by his own exertions, the Arabic, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Ethiopian, rabbinical Hebrew, Armenian, Turkish, and Coptic languages. He was professor of philosophy in the university of Helmstadt. He died in 1796. His principal works consist of translations of the Scriptures from the oriental languages.—Davenport.

BODY; a real substance; an organized system; generally the animal frame of man, as distinguished from his spiritual nature. Paul also speaks of a spiritual body, in opposition to the animal, 1 Cor. 15: 44. The body which we animate, and which returns to the earth, is an animal body; but that which will rise hereafter, will be spiritual, neither gross, heavy, frail, mortal, nor subject to the wants which oppress the present body.

Body is opposed to shadow, or figure, Col. 2: 17. The ceremonies of the law are figures and shadows realized in Christ and the Christian religion.

A regularly organized community, like the Christian church, is called a body. 1 Cor. 10: 17.

"The body of sin," Rom. 6: 6, called also "the body of this death," Rom. 7: 24, is the system and habit of sin in which Christians lived before conversion, and which afterwards is viewed as a loathsome burden. By an extension of the same figure, the disposition to sin is called "the old man." As the latter is "crucified with Christ," by faith through the Holy Spirit; so the former is "put off" in baptism, "that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

"Where the body is, there the eagles assemble," (Matt. 24: 28,) is a sort of proverb used by our Savior. In Job 29: 30, it is said that the eagle—viewing its prey from a distance—as soon as there is a dead body—it immediately resorts thither. Our Savior compares the wicked to a dead body, by God in his wrath given up to birds and beasts of prey; wherever they are, there will be likewise the judgments of God to seize and condemn them. Corpus, in good Latin authors, is sometimes used to signify a carcass, or dead body. (See EAGLE.) In this passage, there seems to be an allusion to the body of the Jews, preyed on by the Roman eagles: the eagle being the standard of that people.—Calmet.

BODY OF DIVINITY. See THEOLOGY.

BOERHAAVE, (HERMAN,) one of the most eminent of modern physicians, was born, in 1668, at Voorhout, near Leyden. His father, the minister of Voorhout, educated him for his own profession, and he made an honorable progress in his studies. But, on the death of his parent, who left him slenderly provided for, he obtained a subsistence by mathematical lectures, and at length devoted himself to the medical profession. He took the degree of M. D. at the university of Harderwick, in 1693. At first, his success was limited; but at length he became professor of physical botany at Leyden, and his lectures at once enhanced the fame of the university and established his own. In 1714, he became rector of the university. Patients thronged to him from all quarters, wealth consequently flowed in upon him, and he confessedly stood at the head of modern physicians. From his multifarious knowledge, Boerhaave has been called the Voltaire of science. But unlike Voltaire, Boerhaave was a decided Christian. His daily habits were those of a man who walks with God. And in the agonies of his last sickness, he served: He that loves God ought to think nothing desirab but what is most pleasing to Supreme Goodness. He died September 23, 1738. His works are numerous; among the principal may be mentioned, Institutiones Medicæ; Aphorismi de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis; Index Plantarum; and Elementa Chimiæ.—Davenport.

BOETHIUS, a Latin statesman, philosopher, and writer, was of a noble Roman family, and was born in 455. He was thrice consul, and was for many years a favorite of Theodoric, king of the Goths. His zeal for orthodoxy, however, at length excited the anger of Theodoric, who was an Arian. Boethius was unjustly charged with treason, his property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison, where he was beheaded, in 526. While a captive, he wrote his famous Consolations of Philosophy; a work which has been translated by two of the most illustrious of the British sovereigns, Alfred and Elizabeth. The whole of his compositions occupy two folio volumes.—Davenport.

BOGOMILI, or BOGARIMITÆ; a sect of heretics which arose about the year 1179. They held that the use of churches, of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and all prayers except the Lord's prayer, ought to be abolished; that the baptism of Catholics is imperfect; that the per sons of the Trinity are unequal, and that they often made themselves visible to those of their sect.—Hend. Buck.

BOGUE, (DAVID, D. D.) many years president of a dissenting academy at Gosport, and one of the founders of the London Missionary society, was a native of North Britain, and born February 18, 1758. Being intended by his parents for the clerical profession, young Bogue was sent in the year 1762, when only twelve years of age, to the university of Edinburgh, where he pursued his studies during a period of nine years. On quitting the university, in 1771, he received the degree of master of arts, and was soon after licensed to preach in the kirk of Scotland. His ordination took place, at Gosport, June 18, 1777, the only minister officiating on the occasion being Dr. Henry Hunter, of the Scots' church, London Wall; and from which it may be inferred that his own church was at that time upon the Presbyterian plan.

In 1784, he visited the continent of Europe, "wandering through France and Flanders," where the aspect of things, in regard to religion, threw him into melancholy.

In 1785, his congregation had increased to such a degree, that he and his friends were encouraged to build a new place of worship, which was opened, May 22, with two sermons preached by Dr. Hunter, of London. He now prosecuted his ministry with considerable success; and in 1789, in consequence of a visit which he paid to some friends in London, and particularly through the zeal and liberality of George Welch, Esq., an opulent banker of London, he was induced to open a seminary for the education of young men for the ministry, on a more extended scale than heretofore; and to qualify himself for the various departments of this office was an herculean labor. At first, he had no assistant; but in a little time he obtained the co-operation of Mr. Weston, a man of solid parts, and with his aid, the academy went on prosperously. After some years, Mr. Weston removed to Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, and was succeeded in the academy by Mr. Bennett, in conjunction with whom our author wrote the "History of the Dissenters." Soon after this, the seminary at Gosport was much enlarged by the liberal proposal of Robert Haldane, Esq., of Edinburgh, who sent ten additional students to the seminary at Gosport, for whose education he engaged to pay the annual sum of ten pounds each, for three years. But the character of the seminary received its greatest revolution from the rise of the London Missionary society. That body soon learned the necessity of preparing its agents for their arduous work; and as Mr. Bogue had been very instrumental in founding the society, it was resolved he should be the tutor of its missionaries, who, from that period, formed the majority of the students at Gosport.

The Baptist Mission to India had been recently set on foot, and this, no doubt, operated as an additional impetus to missionary exertions on the part of Mr. Bogue and his friends. Accordingly, in the month of September, 1795, the affair of missions was taken up in good earnest: sermons were preached at different places by various ministers. Mr. Haweis, Mr. Burder, Mr. Greathead, Mr. Rowland Hill, and by Mr. Bogue, who took for his text, Hag. : 2. "This people say, the time is not come; and the time that the Lord's house should be built." This discourse had such a powerful effect upon the audience, that it paved the way for the formation of the London Missionary society: twenty-five directors were chosen, among whom was Mr. Bogue; a treasurer and secretaries were appointed, and the society put in train.

In 1796, an application was made to Mr. Bogue, by his friend, Robert Haldane, Esq. to become a missionary in person. This latter gentleman had formed the project of quitting his native country, like the good bishop Berkeley, and in company with Mr. Ewing and Mr. Innes, both of whom had lately resigned their stations in the church of Scotland, of proceeding to Bengal, to preach the Gospel among the Hindoos. A further object which Mr. Haldane had in view, was to form a seminary in India for the instruction of others, who might diffuse the light of the Gospel to the widest extent; and to furnish the necessary funds for this grand and benevolent enterprise, Mr. Haldane disposed of his fine estate at Airdrie, near Glasgow. To this proposal Mr. Bogue gave his consent; and on Deember 9, 1796, accompanied Mr. Haldane to London, to wait on Mr. Dundas, then president of the board of control for Indian affairs; the government, however, refused to sanction the project, and the scheme failed, mainly through the influence of the East India company. From this time, Mr. Bogue bent all his efforts to promote the interests of the Missionary society; and to effect this, he was instant in season and out of season. He traversed the British islands in every direction, to make known the Missionary society, and stimulate exertions in its behalf, in doing which he was "in labors more abundant." But we must now attend him chiefly in his career as an author; and passing by some of the earlier and minor productions of his pen, we may mention his "Essay on the Divine Authority of the New Testament," which, though composed in English, was translated into French, Italian, German, and Spanish, a circumstance that shows the high estimation in which the work was held. It forms a comprehensive treatise on the divinity of the Christian religion. Another of Mr. Bogue's works is a volume of discourses on the subject of the millennium. His "History of the Dissenters," in four volumes, octavo, written in conjunction with Dr. Bennett, has already been adverted to. It is his greatest undertaking in point of extent, and was projected as a continuation of Neal's History of the Puritans. The work, however, has not been a favorite with the public, having dragged heavily through the first edition. It certainly comprises a mass of interesting and valuable materials, which will be found highly useful when the subject shall be taken up by some master mind, who, to the mere inductive application of historical facts, shall possess the faculty of compression, and imbue the whole with the philosophy of history. Mr. Bogue died at Brighton, on the 25th of October, 1825, in his seventy-sixth year.

In his bodily frame, Mr. Bogue was muscular, and rather athletic; his constitution sound and vigorous; inasmuch that he scarcely knew, in his own person, what sickness or infirmity meant. His life was one of almost herculean labor; but as a preacher he was not very popular. His learning and talents, though not of the highest order, were certainly above mediocrity; and it was his unwearied study to render himself useful in his day and generation. In praise of his disinterestedness, it deserves to be recorded, that on one occasion he refused to accept the sum of two hundred pounds, voted him by the Missionary society, as an expression of the sense they entertained of his services in its behalf.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BOHAN, (a stone;) a Reubenite, who had a stone erected to his honor, on the frontier between Judah and Benjamin, to commemorate his exploits in the conquest of Canaan, Josh. 15: 6. 18: 17.—Calmet.

BOHEMIAN BRETHERN; the name of a Christian sect, which arose in Bohemia, about the middle of the fifteenth century, from the remains of the Hussites. Dissatisfied with the advances made towards popery, by which the Calixtines had made themselves the ruling party in Bohemia, they refused to receive the compacts or articles of agreement between that party and the council of Basle (November 30, 1433); and began about 1457, under the direction of a clergyman of the name of Michael Bradatz, to form themselves into separate parishes, to hold meetings of their own, and to distinguish themselves from the rest of the Hussites by the name of Brothers, or Brothers' Union; but they were often confounded by their opponents with the Waldenses and Picards, and, on account of their seclusion, were called Cavern-hunters. Amidst the hardships and sufferings which they suffered from the Calixtines and the Catholics, without offering any resistance, their numbers increased so much, through their constancy in belief, and the purity of their morals, that in the year 1500, their parishes amounted to two hundred, most of which had chapels belonging to them. The peculiarities of their religious belief are exhibited in their confessions of faith, especially their opinions in regard to the Lord's supper. They rejected the idea of transubstantiation, and admitted only a mystical spiritual presence of Christ in the eucharist. On all points they professed to take the Scriptures as the ground of their doctrines, and for this, but more especially for the constitution and discipline of their churches, they received the approbation of the reformers of the sixteenth century. This constitution they endeavored to model according to the accounts which they could collect respecting the primitive churches. They aimed at the restoration of the primitive purity of Christianity, by the exclusion of the vicious from their communion; by the careful separation of the sexes; and by the distribution of their members into three classes:—the beginners, the proficient, and the perfect. Their strict system of superintendence, extending even to the minute details of domestic life, contributed much towards promoting this object. To carry on their system, they had a multitude of officers, of different degrees, as bishops, seniors and conseniors, presbyters or preachers, deacons, ædiles, and acolytes, among whom the management of the ecclesiastical, moral, and civil affairs of the community were judiciously distributed. Their first bishop received his ordination from a Waldensian bishop, though their churches held no communion with the Waldenses in Bohemia. They were destined, however, to experience a like fate with that oppressed sect. When, in conformity to their principle not to perform military service, they refused to take up arms in the Smalcaldic war against the Protestants, Ferdinand took their chapels from them; and, in 1548, one thousand of their society retired into Poland and Prussia, where they at first settled at Marienwerder. The agreement which they entered into at Sentomir, April 14, 1570, with the Polish Lutherans and Calvinistic churches, and, still more, the dissenters' peace act of the Polish convention, 1572, obtained toleration for them in Poland, where they united more closely with the Calvinists under the persecutions of the Swedish Sigismund, and have continued in this connection to the present day. Their brethren who remained in Moravia and Bohemia, recovered a certain degree of liberty under Maximilian II., and had their chief residence at Fülneck, in Moravia, and hence have been called Moravian Brethren. The issue of the thirty years' war, which terminated so unfortunately for the Protestants, occasioned the entire destruction of their churches, and their last bishop, Comenius, who had rendered important services in the education of youth, was obliged to flee. From this time they made frequent emigrations, the most important of which took place in 1712, and occasioned the establishment of the New Brethren's church by count Zinzendorf.

Though the Old Bohemian Brethren must be regarded as now extinct, this society deserves ever to be had in remembrance, as one of the principal guardians of Christian truth and piety, in times just emerging from the barbarism of the dark ages; as a promoter of a purity of discipline and morals, which the reformers of the sixteenth century failed to establish in their churches; and as the parent of the widely-extended association of the United Brethren, whose constitution has been modelled after theirs.—*Hend. BOILEAU, (JAMES), an elder brother of the celebrated poet, born at Paris, in 1635, was a doctor of the Sorbonne, a canon, and dean and grand vicar of Sens. He died in 1716. He is the author of several theological and other works in the Latin language, the most celebrated of which is the Historia Flagellantium. James Boileau, like his rother, was caustic and witty. Being asked why he always wrote in Latin, he replied, "For fear the bishops would read me, in which case I should be persecuted." The Jesuits he designated as men "who lengthened the reed, and abridged the decalogue."—Davenport.

BOLINGBROKE, (HENRY ST. JOHN), celebrated for his political career, his talents and eloquent writings, and for his hostility to Christianity, was born at Battersea, (Eng.) 1672, and died 1751. In his religious system, he acknowledges a God, but is for reducing all his attributes to wisdom and power; blaming divines for distinguishing between his physical and moral attributes; and asserting that we cannot ascribe justice and goodness to God according to our ideas of them, nor argue with any certainty about them; that it is absurd to deduce moral obligations from the moral attributes of God, or to pretend to imitate him on those attributes. He resolves all morality into self-love as its first principle, and final centre; as many others have done, although, as has been acutely observed, "this is the same thing as for every individual to treat himself as the Supreme Being." In the details of morality he is equally lax, and his bad temper and dissipated habits but too unhappily confirmed the bad tendency of his principles.

Christianity is honored, not injured, by such assailants. Rarely have finer powers been more fatally abused. "His argument," it has been said, "is of that elevated quality that deals in lofty language and privileged assertion; and of that intrepid character, that fears not, as occasion may demand, to beat down the very positions, which when, other occasions demanded, it had been found convenient to maintain." See his Philosophical Works and Letters on History.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.; Fuller's Works; Magee on Atonement.

BOLIVAR, (SIMON), the great captain of South America, was born in the city of Caraccas, in 1783, and died in 1830, at San Pedro Alejandrino, a country seat about a league from Santa Martha. His body was embalmed and laid in state for three days; the people flocking in crowds to look upon the remains of their liberator. Four days previous to his death, he issued a decree to the citizens of Colombia, which concluded in the following words: "Colombians—I leave you—but my last prayers are offered up for the tranquillity of Colombia—and if my death will contribute to this desirable end, by a discontinuance of party feeling, and consolidate the union, I shall descend with feelings of contentment into the tomb which will soon be prepared for me."—Davenport.

BOLLANDUS, (JOHN), a Jesuit, born in the Netherlands, in 1596, was chosen by his fraternity to carry into effect Rosswede's plan of the Acta Sanctorum, or Lives of the Saints. He completed five folio volumes, the first part of which he published in 1643. Since his decease, in 1663, the work has been continued, by Henschenius and others, to the extent of fifty-three volumes, and is still incomplete.—Davenport.

BOLLANISTS; a society of Jesuits in Antwerp, which published, under the title of "Acta Sanctorum," the traditions and legends of the saints. They received this name from John Bolland, who first undertook to digest the materials already accumulated by Heribert Roswey.—Hend. Buck.

BOND; literally a band or chain, Acts 25: 14; metaphorically, oppression, captivity, affliction, Psalm 116: 16. Phil. 1: 7; morally, an obligation of any kind. Numb. 30: 12. Jer. 5: 6. Ezek. 20: 37. The bond of iniquity is the state of sin, wherein by the curse of the law and his own corruption, the unconverted sinner, in all his desires, thoughts, words, and actions, is shut up to the service and wages of unrighteousness. Acts 8: 23. On the other hand, peace with God through Christ, with our own consciences and with one another, is a beautiful bond which unites the affections, designs, exercises, and operations of the several members of the Christian church. Ephes. 4: 3. Charity, that is, Christian love, is called by St. Paul the bond of perfectness, because it completes the Christian character, promotes a close union in church relation, and renders the gifts and graces of all subservient to mutual progress towards perfect holiness, happiness, dignity, usefulness and glory. Col. 3: 14. The bond of the covenant is a confirmed state in the covenant of grace which decrees our salvation, and which binds us under the most deep and lasting obligations to be the Lord's. Ezek. 20: 37.—Brown.

BONDAGE OF CORRUPTION. This phrase of St. Paul, Rom. 8: 21, has been differently understood, as has the whole magnificent passage of which it forms a part. Some, mistaking the connection and scope of the passage, have explained it of moral corruption, and have hence argued the final restoration of all men to holiness and happiness. But the context plainly shows that the apostle is treating exclusively of the future glory which awaits the believer in Christ, in consequence of his adoption as a child of God and joint-heir with Christ. A part of that glory is the deliverance of this visible creation from its present subjection to change, decay and death, in the day that this mortal shall put on immortality. 1 Cor. 15: 50—54. 2 Cor. 5: 4.

BONIFACE, (Sr.) whose real name was Wilfrid, was born at Crediton, in Devonshire, about A. D. 680; travelled, about 716, through many parts of Germany (of which he is called the apostle), to convert the heathens; was consecrated a bishop, at Rome, by Gregory II. in 723; returned to Germany, and reclaimed the Bavarians from paganism, and was, finally, massacred in Friesland, in 755.—Davenport.

BONOSIANIS; the followers of Bonosus, bishop of Sardica, who is said to have been of the same sentiments with the Photinians, which see.—Williams.

BONES; the hard parts of animal bodies which support their form. To be bone of one's bone and flesh of his flesh, Gen. 2: 23, 2 Sam. 5: 1, or a member of his body, of his flesh and of his bones, Eph. 5: 30, is to have the same nature, and to be united in the nearest relation and affection. Iniquities are said to be in men's bones, when their body is polluted by them, or is suffering under the consequences and curse of them. Job 20: 11. Ez. 22: 27. A penitent or troubled spirit is often compared to broken, burnt, pierced, shaking or rotten bones; to represent the acuteness of its distress, the prostration of its powers, the agony of its fears, the depth of its disorders, and the extreme difficulty of its cure. The valley of dry bones in Ezekiel's vision, represents a state of utter helplessness, apart from divine interposition and aid. Ez. 37: 1—17.—Brown.

BONNER, (EDMUND), a prelate, "damned to everlasting fame," under the appellation of "bloody bishop Bonner," was the son of a peasant, at Hanley, in Worcestershire, and was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford. Henry VIII. made him his chaplain, bishop of Hereford, and then of London, and employed him on embassies to France, Germany, and the pope. He was imprisoned and deprived of his bishopric, in the reign of Edward VI.; but was restored by Mary, and signalized himself by his vindictive and persecuting spirit. Queen Elizabeth imprisoned him in the Marshalsea, and he died there, in 1569, after ten years' confinement. Bonner was a man of learning and talent; but so sanguinary, that, in allusion to his excessive complacency, he was quaintly said to have abundance of guts, but no bowels.—Davenport.

BONNET, was a covering for the head, worn by the Jewish priests. Josephus says, that the bonnet worn by the private priests was composed of several rounds of linen cloth, turned in and sewed together, so as to appear like a thick linen crown. The whole was entirely covered with another piece of linen, which came down as low as their forehead, and concealed the deformity of the seams. See Exod. 28: 40. The high-priest's bonnet was not much different from that which has been described. These bonnets appear to have resembled the modern turban of the East.—Watson.

BONZES; priests of the religion of Fo, in Eastern Asia, particularly in China, Burmah, Tonkin, Cochin-China, and Japan. Living together in monasteries, unmarried, they greatly resemble the monks of corrupt Christian churches; the system of their hierarchy also agrees, in many respects, with that of the Catholics. They do penance, and pray for the sins of the laity, who secure them from want by endowments and alms. The female bonzes may be compared to the Christian nuns, as the religion of Fo admits of no priestesses, but allows of the social union of pious virgins and widows, under monastic vows, for the performance of religious exercises. The bonzes are commonly acquainted only with the external forms of worship and the idols, without understanding the meaning of their religious symbols.—Hend. Buck.

BOOK; a writing composed on some point of knowledge by a person intelligent therein, for the instruction or amusement of the reader. The word is formed from the Gothic hoka, or Saxon boc, which comes from the northern buch, or buchais, a beech or service-tree, on the bark of which our ancestors used to write. Book is distinguished from pamphlet, or single paper, by its greater length; and from tome or volume, by its containing the whole writing on the subject. Isidore makes this distinction between liber and codex; that the former denotes a single book, the latter a collection of several; though, according to Scipio Maffei, codex signifies a book in the square form; liber, a book in the roll form. The primary distinction between liber and codex seems to have been derived, as Dr. Heylin has observed, from the different materials used for writing, among the ancients: from the inner side of the bark of a tree, used for this purpose, and called in Latin liber, the name of liber applied to a book was deduced; and from that tablet, formed from the main body of a tree, called caudex, was derived the appellation of codex.

1. Several sorts of materials were formerly used in making books: stone and wood were the first materia employed to engrave such things upon as men were desirous of having transmitted to posterity. Porphyry makes mention of some pillars preserved in Crete, on which the ceremonies observed by the Corybantes in their sacrifices were recorded. The works of Hesiod were originally written on tables of lead, and deposited in the temple of the muses in Bœotia. The moral law of Jehovah was written on tables of stone. The laws of Solon were cut on wood planks. Tables of wood and ivory were common among the ancients: those of wood were very frequently covered with wax, that persons might write on them with more ease, or blot out what they had written. And the instrument used to write with was a piece of iron, called a style; and hence the word "style" came to be taken for the composition the writing. The leaves of the palm tree were afterwards used instead of wooden planks, and the finest and thinnest part of the bark of such trees as the lime, ash, maple, and elm; and especially the tilio, or phillyrea, and Egyptian papyrus. Hence came the word liber, (a book), which signifies the inner bark of the trees. And as these barks were rolled up in order to be removed with greater ease, each roll was called volumen, a volume; a name afterwards given to the like rolls of paper or parchment. From the Egyptian papyrus, the oldest material commonly employed for writing on, the word paper is derived. After this, leather was introduced, especially the skins of goats and sheep. For the king of Pergamus, in collecting his library, was led to the invention of parchment made of those skins. The ancients likewise wrote upon linen. Pliny says, the Parthians, even in his time, wrote upon their clothes; and Livy speaks of certain books made of linen, linte libri, upon which the names of magistrates, and the history of the Roman commonwealth, were written, and preserved in the temple of the goddess Moneta.

2. The materials generally used by the ancients for their books, were liable to be easily destroyed by the damp, when hidden in the earth; and in times of war, devastation, and rapacity, it was necessary to bury in the earth whatever they wished to preserve from the attacks of fraud and violence. With this view, Jeremiah ordered the writings, which he delivered to Baruch, to be put in an earthen vessel, Jer. 32. In the same manner, the ancient Egyptians made use of earthen urns, or pots of a proper shape, for containing whatever they wanted to inter in the earth, and which, without such care, would have been soon destroyed. We need not wonder then, that the prophet Jeremiah should think it necessary to inclose those writings in an earthen pot, which were to be buried in Judea, in some place where they might be found without much difficulty on the return of the Jews from captivity. Accordingly, two different writings, or small rolls of writing, called books in the original Hebrew, were designed to be inclosed in such an earthen vessel; but commentators have been much embarrassed in giving any probable account of the necessity of two writings, one sealed, the other open; or, as the passage has been commonly understood, the one sealed up, the other left open for any one to read; more especially, as both were to be alike buried in the earth and concealed from every eye, and both were to be examined at the return from the captivity. But the word translated open, in reference to the evidence, or book which was open, (1 Sam. 3: 7, 21. Dan. 2: 19, 30. 10: 1.) signifies the revealing of future events to the minds of men by a divine agency; and it is particularly used in the book of Esther, 8: 13, to express a book's making known the decree of an earthly king. Consequently the open book of Jeremiah seems to signify, not its being then lying open or unrolled before him, while the other was sealed up; but the book that had revealed the will of God, to bring back Israel into their own country, and to cause buying and selling of houses and lands again to take place among them. This was a book of prophecy, opening and revealing the future return of Israel, and the other little book, which was ordered to be buried along with it, was the purchase deed.

3. By adverting to the different modes of writing in eastern countries, we obtain a satisfactory interpretation of a passage in the book of Job, 19: 23, 24, and a distinct view of the beautiful gradation which is lost in our translation: "O that my words were now written! O that they were printed (written) in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever!" In the East there is a mode of writing, which is designed to fix words in the memory, but the writing is not intended for duration. Accordingly, we are informed by Dr. Shaw, that children learn to write in Barbary by means of a smooth, thin board, slightly covered with whiting, which may be wiped off or renewed at pleasure. Job expresses his wish not only that his words were written, but also written in a book, from which they should not be blotted out, nay, still further, graven in a rock, the most permanent mode of recording them, and especially if the engraved letters were filled with lead; or the rock was made to receive leaden tablets, the use of which was known among the ancients. So Pliny, "At first, men wrote on the leaves of palm, and the bark of certain trees; but afterwards public documents were preserved on leaden plates, and those of a private nature on wax, or linen."

4. The first books were in the form of blocks and tables, of which we find frequent mention in Scripture, under the appellation sepher, which the Septuagint render axines, that is, square tables: of which form the book of the covenant, book of the law, book, or bill of divorce, book of curses, &c. appear to have been. As flexible matters came to be written on, they found it more convenient to make their books in form of rolls, called by the Greeks kontakia, by the Latins volumina, which appear to have been in use among the ancient Jews as well as the Grecians, Romans, Persians, and even Indians; and of such did the libraries chiefly consist, till some centuries after Christ. The form which obtains among us is the square, composed of separate leaves; which was also known, though little used, among the ancients; having been invented by Aitalus, king of Pergamus, the same who also invented parchment: but it has now been so long in possession, that the oldest manuscripts are found in it. Montfaucon assures us, that of all the ancient Greek manuscripts he has seen, there are but two in the roll form; the rest being made up much after the manner of the modern books. The rolls, or volumes, were composed of several sheets, fastened to each other, and rolled upon a stick, or umbilicus; the whole making a kind of column, or cylinder, which was to be managed by the umbilicus, as a handle; it being reputed a kind of crime to take hold of the roll itself. The outside of the volume was called frons; the ends of the umbilicus were called cornua, "horns;" which were usually carved and adorned likewise with silver, ivory, or even gold and precious stones. Whilst the Egyptian papyrus was in common use, its brittle nature made it proper to roll up what they wrote; and as this had been a customary practice, many continued it when they used other materials, which might very safely have been treated in a different manner. To the form of books belongs the economy of the inside, or the order and arrangement of points and letters into lines and pages, with margins, and other appurtenances. This has undergone many varieties: at first, the letters were only divided into lines, then into separate words; which, by degrees, were noted with accents, and distributed by points and stops into periods, paragraphs, chapters, and other divisions. In some countries, as among the orientals, the lines began from the right, and ran to the left; in others, as in northern and western nations, from the left to the right; others, as the Grecians, followed both directions alternately, going in the one and returning in the other, called boustrophedon, because it was after the manner of oxen turning when at plough. In the Chinese books, the lines ran from top to bottom. Again: the page in some is entire, and uniform; in others, divided into columns; in others, distinguished into texts and notes, either marginal, or at the bottom: usually it is furnished with signatures and catch-words; also with a register to discover whether the book be complete. To these are occasionally added the apparatus of summaries, or side-notes; the embellishments of red, gold, or figured initial letters, head-pieces, tail-pieces, effigies, schemes, maps, and the like. The end of the book, now denoted by finis, was anciently marked with a  $\omega$ , called coronis, and the whole frequently washed with an oil drawn from cedar, or citron chips, strewed between the leaves to preserve it from rotting. There also occur certain formulae at the beginning and end of books; as among the Jews, the word hezek, esto fortis, which we find at the end of the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Ezekiel, &c. to exhort the reader to be courageous, and proceed on to the following book. The conclusions were also often guarded with imprecations against such as should falsify them; of which we have an instance in the Apocalypse. The Mahometans, for the like reason, place the name of God at the beginning of all their books, which cannot fail to procure them protection, on account of the infinite regard which they pay to that name, wherever found. For the like reason it is, that divers of the laws of the ancient emperors begin with the formula, In Nomine Dei. At the end of each book, the Jews also added the number of verses contained in it, and at the end of the Pentateuch the number of sections; that it might be transmitted to posterity entire. The Masorites and Mahometan doctors have gone further, so as to number the several words and letters in each book, chapter, verse, &c. of the Old Testament and the Alkoran. The scarcity and high price of books in former ages, ought to render us the more grateful for the discovery of the great art of printing, as especially by that means the Holy Bible, "the word of truth and gospel of our salvation," is made familiar to all classes.

5. The universal ignorance that prevailed in Europe, from the seventh to the eleventh century, may be ascribed to the scarcity of books during that period, and the difficulty of rendering them more common, concurring with other causes arising from the state of government and manners. The Romans wrote their books either on parchment, or on paper made of the Egyptian papyrus. The latter, being the cheapest, was of course the most commonly used. But after the Saracens conquered Egypt, in the seventh century, the communication between that country and the people settled in Italy, or in other parts of Europe, was almost entirely broken off, and the papyrus was no longer in use among them. They were obliged on that account to write all their books upon parchment; and as the price of that was high, books became extremely rare and of great value. We may judge of the scarcity of materials for writing them from one circumstance. There still remain several manuscripts of the eighth, ninth, and following centuries, written on parchment, from which some former writing had been erased, in order to substitute a new composition in its place. Thus, it is probable, several of the works of the ancients perished. A book of Livy or of Tacitus might be erased, to make room for the legendary tale of a saint, or the superstitious prayers of a missal. Nay, worse instances are recorded, of obliterating copies of the Holy Scriptures to make room for the lucubrations of some of the more modern fathers of the church. Manuscripts thus defaced, the vellum or parchment of which is occupied with some other writings, are called 'palimpsests,' codices rescripti or palimpsesti, from palimpsestos, "that which has been twice scraped." As this want of materials for writing will serve to account for the loss of many of the works of the ancients, and for the small number of manuscripts previous to the eleventh century, many facts prove the scarcity of books at this period. Private persons seldom possessed any books whatever; and even monasteries of note had only one missal. In 1299, John de Pontissara, bishop of Winchester, borrows of his cathedral convent of St. Swithin, at Winchester, "bibham bene glossatam," that is, the Bible, with marginal annotations, in two folio volumes; but gives a bond for the return of it, drawn up with great solemnity. For the bequest of this Bible to the convent, and one hundred marks, the monks founded a daily mass for the soul of the donor. If any person gave a book to a religious house, he believed that so valuable a donation merited eternal salvation, and he offered it on the altar with great ceremony. The prior and convent of Rochester declare, that they will every year pronounce the irrevocable sentence of damnation on him who shall purloin or conceal a Latin translation of Aristotle's Poetics, or even obliterate the title. Sometimes a book was given to a monastery, on condition that the donor should have the use of it for his life; and sometimes to a private person, with the reservation that he who receives it should pray for the soul of his benefactor. In the year 1225, Roger de Insula, dean of York, gave several Latin Bibles to the university of Oxford, on condition that the students who perused them should deposit a cautionary pledge. The library of that university, before the year 1300, consisted only of a few tracts, chained or kept in chests, in the choir of St. Mary's church. The price of books became so high, that persons of a moderate fortune could not afford to purchase them. In the year 1174, Walter, prior of St. Swithin's at Winchester, purchased of the monks of Dorchester, in Oxfordshire, Bede's homilies and St. Austin's psalter for twelve measures of barley and a pall, on which was embroidered in silver the history of St. Birinus converting a Saxon king. About the year 1400, a copy of John of Meun's "Roman de la Rose" was sold before the palace-gate at Paris for forty crowns, or 331 6s. 6d. The countess of Anjou paid, for a copy of the homilies of Haimon, bishop of Halberstadt, two hundred sheep, five quarters of wheat, and the same quantity of rye and millet. Even so late as the year 1471, when Louis XI. of France borrowed the works of Rhasis, the Arabian physician, from the faculty of medicine at Paris, he not only deposited by way of pledge a considerable quantity of plate, but he was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as surety in a deed, binding himself under a great forfeiture to restore it. But when, in the eleventh century, the art of making paper was invented, and more especially after the manufacture became general, the number of manuscripts increased, and the study of the sciences was wonderfully facilitated. Indeed, the invention of the art of making paper, and the invention of the art of printing, are two very memorable events in the history of literature and of human civilization. It is remarkable, that the former preceded the first dawning of letters and improvement in knowledge, towards the close of the eleventh century; and the latter ushered in the light which spread over Europe at the era of the reformation.

6. If the ancient books were large, they were formed of a number of skins, of a number of pieces of linen and cotton cloth, or of papyrus, or parchment, connected together. The leaves were rarely written over on both sides, Ezek. 2: 9. Zech. 5: 1. Books, when written upon very flexible materials, were, as stated above, rolled round a stick; and, if they were very long, round two, from the two extremities. The reader unrolled the book to the place which he wanted, and rolled it up again, when he had read it, Luke 4: 17-20; whence the name megelle, a voluene, or thing rolled up, Psalm 40: 7. Isaiah 34: 4. Ezek. 2: 9. 2 Kings 19: 14. Ezra 6: 2. The leaves thus rolled round the stick, which has been mentioned, and bound with a string, could be easily sealed, Isaiah 29: 11. Dan. 12: 4. Rev. 5: 1. 6: 7. Those books which were inscribed on tablets of wood, lead, brass, or ivory, were connected together by rings at the back, through which a rod was passed to carry them by. The orientals appear to have taken pleasure in giving tropical or enigmatical titles to their books. The titles prefixed to the fifty-sixth, sixtieth, and eightieth psalms appear to be of this description. And there can be no doubt that David's elegy upon Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. 1: 18, is called in Hebrew the bonn, in conformity with this peculiarity of taste.

The book, or flying roll, spoken of in Zech. 5: 1, 2, twenty cubits long, and ten wide, was one of the ancient rolls, composed of many skins, or parchments, glued or sewed together at the end. Though some of these rolls or volumes were very long, yet none, probably, was ever made of such a size as this. This contained the curses and calamities which should befall the Jews. The extreme length and breadth of it shows the excessive number and enormity of their sins, and the extent of their punishment.

Isaiah, describing the effects of God's wrath, says, "The heavens shall be folded up like a book," (scroll,) Isai. 34: 4. He alludes to the way among the ancients, of rolling up books, when they purposed to close them. A volume of several feet in length was suddenly rolled up into a very small compass. Thus the heavens should shrink into themselves, and disappear, as it were, from the eyes of God, when his wrath should be kindled. These ways of speaking are figurative, and very energetic.

7. Book is sometimes used for letters, memoirs, an edict, or contract. In short, the word book, in Hebrew, sepher, is much more extensive than the Latin liber. The letters which Rabshakeh delivered from Sennacherib to Hezekiah are called a book. The English translation, indeed, reads letter; but the Septuagint has biblion; and the Hebrew text, sepherim. The contract, confirmed by Jeremiah for the purchase of a field, is called by the same name, Jer. 32: 10; and also the edict of Ahasuerus in favor of the Jews, Esther 9: 20, though our translators have called it letters. The writing which a man gave to his wife when he divorced her was denominated, in Hebrew, "a book of divorce," Deut. 24.

Books, Writers of. The ancients seldom wrote their treatises with their own hand, but dictated them to their freedmen and slaves. These were either tachygraphoi, amanuenses, notarii, "hasty writers," or kalligraphoi, librarii, "fair writers," or bibliographoi, librarii, "copyists." The office of these last was to transcribe fairly that which the former had written hastily and from dictation; they were those who were obliged to write books and other documents which were intended to be durable. The correctness of the copies was under the care of the emendator, corrector, (ho dokimazon ta gegrammena.) A great part of the books of the New Testament was dictated after this custom. St. Paul noted it as a particular circumstance in the epistle to the Galatians, that he had written it with his own hand, Gal. 6: 11. But he affixed the salutation with his own hand, 2 Thess. 3: 17. 1 Cor. 16: 21. Col. 4: 18. The amanuensis who wrote the epistle to the Romans, has mentioned himself near the conclusion, Rom. 16: 22.

Books, modes of publication. Works could only be multiplied by means of transcripts. Whenever in this way they passed over to others, they were beyond the control of the author, and published. The edition, or publication, by means of the booksellers, was, only at a later period, advantageous to the Christians. The recitatio preceded the publication, which took place often merely among some few friends, and often with great preparations before many persons, who were invited for that purpose. From hence the author became known as the writer, and the world became previously informed of all which they might expect from the work. If the composition pleased them, he was requested to permit its transcription; and thus the work left the hands of the author, and belonged to the publicum. Frequently an individual sent his literary labors to some illustrious man, as a present, strena, munusculum; or he prefixed his name to it, for the sake of giving him a proof of friendship or regard, by means of this express and particular direction of his work. When it was only thus presented or sent to him, and he accepted it, he was considered as the person bound to introduce it to the world, or as the patronus libri, who had pledged himself, as the patronus personæ, to this duty. It now became his office to provide for its publication by means of transcripts, to facilitate as approach ad limina potentiorum to the gates of men or great influence, and to be its defensor.

Thus the works of the first founders of the Christian church made their appearance before their community. Their epistles were read in those congregations to which they were directed; and whoever wished to possess them either took a transcript of them, or caused one to be procured for him. The historical works were made known by the authors in the congregations of the Christians, per recitationem: the object and general interest in them procured for them readers and transcribers. St. Luke dedicated his writings to an illustrious man of the name of Theophilus.—Watson.

BOOK OF JUDGMENT. Daniel says, "Judgment was set, and the books were opened," 7: 10. This is an allusion to what is practised, when a prince calls his servants to account. The accounts are produced, and inquired into. It is possible he might allude also to a custom of the Persians, among whom it was a constant practice every day to write down what had happened, the services done for the king, and the rewards given to those who had performed them; as we see in the history of Ahasuerus and Mordecai. When, therefore, the king sits in judgment, the books are opened, and he compels all his servants to reckon with him; he punishes those who have been failing in their duty, compels those to pay who are indebted to him, and rewards those who have done him services. There will be, in a manner, a similar proceeding at the day of God's final judgment. Rev. 20: 12.—Calmet.

BOOK OF LIFE, or BOOK OF THE LIVING, or BOOK OF THE LORD, Ps. 69: 28. It is very probable, that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are taken from the custom observed generally in the courts of princes, of keeping a list of persons who are in their service, of the provinces which they govern, of the officers of their armies, of the number of their troops, and sometimes even of the names of their soldiers. Thus Moses desires God rather to blot him out of his book, than to reject Israel, Exod. 32: 32. When it is said, that any one is written in the book of life, it means that he particularly belongs to God, is enrolled among the number of his friends and servants. When it is said, "blotted out of the book of life," this signifies, erased from the list of God's friends and servants; as those who are guilty of treachery are struck off the roll of officers belonging to a prince. It is probable, also, that the primitive Christian churches kept lists of their members, in which those recently admitted were enrolled: these would take a title analogous to that of the book of life, or the Lamb's book of life: as this term occurs principally in the Revelation, it seems likely to be derived from such a custom. Rev. 3: 5. 22: 19. Something of the same nature we have, in Isaiah 4: 3, where the prophet alludes to such as were "written among the living in Jerusalem;" that is, enrolled among the citizens of that city of God; to which the Christian church was afterwards compared. In a more exalted sense, the book of life signifies, the book of justification; or the register of those who through grace have been chosen to eternal life in Christ. Luke 10: 20. Phil. 4: 3. Rev. 13: 8. 17: 8. 20: 12, 15. 21: 27.—Calmet.

BOOTH; a tent made of poles, and used as a temporary residence. See TENT.—Calmet.

BOOTH, (ABRAHAM), the well-known champion of Baptist principles, venerable for his learning, piety, and talents, was born at Blackwell, in Derbyshire, in the month of May, 1734. He was the eldest child of a large family; and his father being a farmer, he brought his son up to the business, in which he assisted him, till he had arrived at the age of sixteen. His education therefore, in early years, was very much neglected; he never went even to a common day-school; and the only instruction he received, was in the knowledge of the English alphabet, which his father taught him, after the toils and fatigues of the day. It has been frequently and justly observed, that many who have received the least instruction, have, in the course of a comparatively short space of time, made the most rapid improvement, both in mind and heart, and have become blessings to their friends, and ornaments to society; while others have disgraced both their preceptors and themselves, and only left behind them names dishonored and unworthy. To the former may be added Abraham Booth. His mind, ever active and energetic, was at length roused to exertion, and he determined to cultivate it himself. This resolution, once adopted, never forsook him; and, in a short time, he perfected himself in arithmetic and writing; and while the other members of his family were enjoying their nocturnal repose, he was studying and preparing himself for that future usefulness, for which he was subsequently so distinguished. The bodily fatigues of farming not suiting his health, he learned to work in the stocking-frame; but neither was this application adapted to him. He was destined for a more responsible and important work. His parents were members of the church of England; and, till their attention was arrested by the discourses of some zealous itinerant preachers, who were General Baptists, they constantly attended their parish church. The mind of young Abraham was strongly impressed with their arguments, and, after mature consideration, he consented to be baptized, at Barton, by Mr. Francis Smith. Mr. Booth gave very early marks of piety; and was frequently, when his parents thought he was devoting his time to recreation, overheard in prayer. His friends, impressed with the idea that he possessed talents for usefulness in the church of God, expressed their anxieties for him to enter the ministry; and, after many prayers and much consideration on the importance of the great work on which he was entering, he became a preacher among the General Baptists. He was an active minister of the Gospel; preaching at Melbourne, Barton, Loughborough, Diseworth, and many other surrounding places, where he labored with much success. In 1758, he married Miss Elizabeth Bowman, an amiable and intelligent young woman, by whom he had a large family. These increasing demands on his income induced him to open an academy at Sutton Ashfield, for young gentlemen, in which he was joined by his amiable partner, who received a proportionate number of females.

In 1760, there were distinct churches formed, in consequence of the Baptist connexion having increased; and Mr. Booth was accordingly set apart for the society of Kirby Woodhouse, where he labored for several years, till an event occurred, which made it his painful duty to leave a people to whom he was much attached, and among whom he had labored for many years. His doctrinal sentiments underwent an important change. Hitherto he had held the Arminian doctrine of the inefficacy of divine grace, and wrote a work on "Absolute Predestination," in which he opposed the doctrine of election, which he afterwards warmly vindicated. He now published his "Reign of Grace," being the substance of discourses preached in a room at Sutton Ashfield, after his secession from the General Baptists.

In 1768, he was called to the pastoral office of the church in Prescott street, Goodman's fields, London, and was ordained over them. He now studied intensely, and soon shone as a theologian and a scholar. In 1770, he published a tract, entitled "The Death of Legal Hope the Life of Evangelical Obedience," which has been greatly praised. In 1792, the cries and tears of the persecuted Africans arrested his attention, and he publicly avowed his utter abhorrence of the slave trade; he took an active part in forwarding petitions to the English legislature for its abolition; and he preached an able and judicious discourse, in aid of the society formed for effecting the abolition of that horrid and disgraceful traffic. Mr. Booth now became an author of first-rate celebrity in the Baptist denomination, and of which it may be truly said that he was one of its brightest ornaments. In 1778, he published "An Apology for the Baptists, in which they are vindicated from the imputation of laying an undue stress on the ordinance of Baptism;" namely, when they refuse communion at the Lord's table with unbaptized persons. A powerful effort has indeed been lately made, by an eloquent writer of their own denomination, to overturn the principles of the "Apology," and vindicate the practice of mixed communion; but Mr. Booth has been most ably supported by Mr. Joseph Kiaghorn, of Norwich, and still more recently have the fundamental principles of his essay been vindicated by Mr. J. G. Fuller, of Bristol, son of the late secretary to the Baptist mission, in a small volume, which has yet received no reply from the advocates of mixed communion.

In 1784, in consequence of the appearance of a posthumous publication, on the subject of infant baptism, from the pen of the celebrated Matthew Henry, Mr. Booth gave to the world his "Pedobaptism examined, on the Principles, Concessions, and Reasonings of the most learned Pedobaptists," in which he meets his opponents on their own ground, avails himself of their own weapons, and, with singular dexterity, turns them against themselves. The volume was reviewed by Mr. Badcock, in the Monthly Review for September, 1784, in which he takes occasion to remark in the course of his critique, that "he sets his opponents together by the ears, and leaves them to overthrow the very cause, in defence of which they professed to take the field." The edition was quickly disposed of, and in 1787, our author came forward with a second edition, now greatly enlarged by additional quotations from the writings of the most celebrated Pedobaptists, accompanied by additional illustrations, remarks, and reasonings, comprised in two thick and closely printed volumes. In this performance, the reader will be astonished at the extent of the author's reading and research, his indefatigable industry, and his patient perseverance in the prosecution of his subject; nor less so at his skill in the luminous arrangement of his materials, which are collected from ancient fathers, from historians of every age and country, from the most eminent professors and pious divines. In a word, he seems to have exhausted the controversy on the side of the Baptists. An attempt, however, was made to furnish a reply, by Dr. Williams, afterwards president of the Rotherham dissenting academy, which called up our author again, in 1792, when he published "A defence of Pedobaptism examined; or, Animadversions on Dr. Edward Williams's Anti-pedobaptism examined." It was comprised in a volume of more than five hundred pages, and displays equal ability with the former work. After being many years out of print, a new edition of the whole of these pieces on the baptismal controversy has recently made its appearance (1828) in three volumes, octavo, handsomely printed.

To enumerate all the productions of our author's pen would be to extend this article to too great a length, since almost every year furnished some new proof of his laborious exertions in the cause of pure and undefiled religion; but his "Essay on the Kingdom of Christ," his "Pastoral Cautions," and his "Amen to Social Prayer," may be specified among his minor productions; and they are all of them pieces of uncommon excellence. But his "Glad Tidings to perishing Sinners; or, the Genuine Gospel a complete Warrant for the Ungodly to believe in Jesus Christ," which appeared in 1796, and which was followed by a second edition in 1800, was a publication of greater extent, and will abundantly recompense the cost and pains of perusing it. His last publication was a discourse, delivered at one of the monthly meetings of the Baptist churches in the metropolis, entitled, "Divine Justice essential to the Divine Character," with a copious appendix; and in none of his writings did the author give more solid proofs of an enlightened mind, or of more cogent and powerful reasoning. Mr. Booth died on the 27th of January, 1806, in the seventy-second year of his age, deeply regretted by all who knew him. He possessed a powerful and vigorous mind, cultivated by intense study, enlarged and expanded by reading and reflection, and enriched by a copious uncton from the Spirit of all grace. He was a man of the most inflexible integrity, great sanctity of manners, and exhibited to all around, a pattern of the Christian minister. His works, (excepting those on baptism,) were published, in three octavo volumes, in 1813, with an Essay on his Life and Writings.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

BOOTY; spoils taken in war, Num. 31: 27—32. According to the law of Moses, the booty was to be divided equally between those who were in the battle and those who were in the camp, whatever disparity there might be in the number of each party. The law further required that, out of that part of the spoils which was assigned to the fighting men, the Lord's share should be separated; and for every three hundred men, oxen, asses, sheep, &c. they were to take one for the high-priest, as being the Lord's first-fruits; and out of the other moiety, belonging to the children of Israel, they were to give for every fifty men, oxen, asses, sheep, &c. one to the Levites.—Watson.

BOOZ, or Boaz; one of our Savior's ancestors according to the flesh, son of Salmon and Rahab, a Canaanitess of Jericho, whom Salmon, of the tribe of Judah, married. Some say, there were three of this name, the son, grandson, and great-grandson of Salmon; the last being husband of Ruth, and father of Obed. This they believe to be the only way in which Scripture can be reconciled with itself, since it reckons 366 years between Salmon's marriage, and the birth of David, and yet mentions only three persons between Salmon and David, viz. Booz, Obed, and Jesse. Mr. Taylor, however, prefers the solution of Dr. Alix. The Targuin on Ruth says, that Salmon is styled Saumon the Just; his works and the works of his children were very excellent; Boaz was a righteous person, by whose righteousness the people of Israel were delivered from the hands of their enemies, &c. There were but 366 years from the first of Josphat to the birth of David—for from the Exodus to the temple were 480 years; add to David seventy years, and four years of Solomon—the total is 480 years. He therefore supposes that Salmon might beget Boaz when he was 96 years old; Boaz beget Obed when he was 90 years old; Obed at 90 beget Jesse; and Jesse at 85 beget David. We know that long life often descends in a family; old Parr had a son who lived to be very old: and, what is no less remarkable, old men of such families have had children very late in life, as after the age of a hundred years; of which old Parr himself is one example.—Colmet.

BORDING, (JAMES,) an eminent Christian, was born 1546, and died 1616, aged sixty-nine. "Bording," says Melchior Adam, "was second to none in the study of theology, and he cultivated it with the sublime view of conforming his life to the divine will or doctrine." After a laborious life, finding his health giving way, he retired from public business, and arranged his affairs as one who was soon to depart from this to a better world. He made his will, selected and daily visited the place of his burial, and composed the epitaph which was inscribed on his tomb. For, said he, "if Mirmillo, the gladiator, was anxious to fall in a dignified manner, by how much more does it become a Christian to endeavor, lest, in the closing scene, he dishonor a life, which in all other respects had been most excellent." His wishes were fulfilled in relation to his last hour, and with a mind perfectly collected and serene, he breathed out his soul on the bosom of God his Savior.—Clissord.

BORE, (CATHARINE VON,) a nun of Nimptochen in Germany, afterwards the wife of Luther, was the daughter of a gentleman of fortune. At the commencement of the Reformation, she, with eight other nuns, convinced by Luther's writings of the impropriety of monastic vows, escaped from her convent, in 1523. This bold step was highly praised by Luther, who undertook their justification. Catharine was then but twenty-six, and the charms of youth in these circumstances, led her enemies to censure her without foundation, as having left her convent for a libertine life. Luther, hurt with this report, would have married her to Glacius, minister of Ortamuuden; but she not liking Glacius, he married her himself, in 1526. Luther always delighted in the heroism of his wife. He would not part with her, he afterwards observed, for all the riches of the Venetians. Catharine was tenderly attached to her husband; she was pious, modest, gentle, plain in her attire, and economical in her house, where she displayed all the hospitality of the German noblesse, without their pride. She died in 1552, six years after Luther.—Betham.

BORRELLISTS; a Christian sect in Holland, so named from their founder Borrel, a man of great learning in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues. They reject the use of the sacraments, public prayer, and all other external acts of worship. They assert that all the Christian churches of the world have degenerated from the pure apostolic doctrines, because they have suffered the word of God, which is infallible, to be expounded, or rather corrupted, by doctors who are fallible. They lead a very austere life, and enjoy a great part of their goods in alms.—Hend. Buck.

BORROMEO, (CHARLES,) a cardinal, justly celebrated for his virtues, was of an illustrious Lombard family, and was born, in 1538, at the castle of Arona, in the Milanese. He was created a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, by his uncle pope Pius IV. He was a model of piety and of charity, and a munificent patron of learning. His efforts to reform the monastic orders drew on him the vengeance of a fanatical monk, who attempted, but happily, without success, to assassinate him. Borromeo died in 1584; in 1610, he was canonized; and in 1697, a colossal bronze statue of him, sixty-six feet high, was erected at Arona. His theological works occupy five folio volumes.—Davenport.

BORROW. When our translation states that the Hebrews borrowed things of value from the Egyptians, the Hebrew word signifies merely to ask, and does not imply any promise of returning them. As God is the supreme possessor of all things, might he not transfer the right of the Egyptians to his own people, and require them to demand what he gave them? When the Egyptians had denied them their just wages, might not God, the supreme judge, allot them their wages, and order them to demand it in this manner? Exod. 3: 22, and 12: 35. To borrow money or goods, without earnestly endeavoring to pay in due time, is a mark of a wicked and covetous person. Ps. 37: 21. It is sinful to injure in any way what we have borrowed. Exod. 22: 15.—Braun; Calmet.

BOSOM. The front of the upper part of the body—the breast. The Orientals generally wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry any thing away that their hands would not contain, they used for the purpose a fold in the bosom of their robe. To this custom our Lord alludes—"Good measure shall men give into your bosom," Luke 6: 38. To have one "in our bosom," implies kindness, secrecy, intimacy, Gen. 16: 5. 2 Sam. 12: 8. Christ is in the bosom of the Father; that is, possesses the closest intimacy and perfect knowledge of the Father, John 1: 18. Our Savior is said to carry his lambs in his bosom, which beautifully represents his tender care and watchfulness over them, Isa. 40: 11.—Calmet.

BOSSÉS; the thickest and strongest parts of a buckler, Job 15: 20.—Calmet.

BOSSUET, (JACQUES BENIGNE,) bishop of Meaux, was born September 27, 1627, of respectable parents, at Dijon, the capital of Burgundy, and now of the department of the Côte d'Or. He received his first instructions at the college of Jesuits in that city, where he gave early proofs of superior talents, and by chance got possession of a Bible, which made an indelible impression on him. Being intended for the church, he was sent to Paris, in 1642, to finish his studies at the college of Navarre. After completing his theological course, he received the degree of doctor of the Sorbonne, in 1652, and immediately removed to Metz, where he was first appointed canon of the church, afterwards archdeacon, and at length dean. Here he acquitted himself with great credit, and appears to have devoted himself to his clerical duties without any endeavors to obtain preferment. He labored assiduously in the instruction of his flock; and, though both learned and eloquent, was studious to accommodate his discourses to the capacity of his hearers. He was at length invited to Paris, and preached before the king, and obtained, in 1669, without any solicitation, the bishopric of Condom. But being appointed, in 1670, preceptor to the dauphin, he resigned his bishopric, that he might devote himself more entirely to that important office. When he had completed the education of the prince, Louis XIV. advanced him, as a recompense for his attention and fidelity, to the see of Meaux. He was also made a counsellor of state, and first almoner to the duchess of Burgundy. These offices he held till the 12th of April, 1704, on which day he died, at Paris, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

He wrote much; but his works are chiefly polemical. He took great part in the disputes which were carried on with the Protestants, although he was no advocate for the infallibility of the pope, or his power of deposing kings; both which pretensions he zealously opposed, and refused the cardinal's hat, which was offered him by pope Innocent XI., as an inducement for him to remain silent on those subjects.

His Funeral Orations have been much admired. They are certainly able compositions; and some of them record the praises of worthy and excellent characters; but it is painful to observe so much eloquence wasted on so unworthy an individual as the crafty and implacable Le Tellier. Bossuet was, however, bold in expressing his opinions before his superiors. In a dispute betwixt him and Fenelon, while the king was present, he expressed his opinion with so much warmth, as led the king to say, "What would you have done, if I had taken part with Fenelon against you?"—Bossuet replied, "I would have spoken ten times as loud!" On another occasion, as he had inveighed against theatrical exhibitions, to which Louis was addicted, the monarch took an opportunity to ask him, what he thought of attending them? To which he replied, "For it, there are great examples; against it, strong arguments."

His Universal History, which has ever been considered his principal work, was composed while he was preceptor to the dauphin, and was chiefly intended for the use of that prince. He has so well pointed out, in his introduction, the extensive usefulness of history in general, and of a chronological abridgment of it in particular, that it is unnecessary to say any thing here on these subjects. He was, indeed, the first who produced a true general history, which, like a map, according to his own excellent comparison, collects and arranges, in one great and consistent plan, with perfect symmetry and correctness, the most material events of every nation from the beginning of time, in their due situation, connexion, and order. This, however, is not the sole merit of his work, which derives great part of its value from the skill with which the history of religion is combined with that of the world; and the care which is taken throughout, to show the importance of the former, by the series of events exhibited in the latter. Everywhere he shows the overruling providence of Him, who and shows, in the turbulence of human affairs, the execution of his designs, the performance of his promises, and the fulfilment of those threatenings which he has denounced against tyrants and impious nations. It must, however, be remembered, that M. Bossuet was a Catholic, and indeed a zealous one; of course, he will be expected to speak as a Catholic. As a controversialist, he is distinguished by great logical acuteness, and infinite dexterity in exposing the weak points of an opponent, and concealing his own. These qualities are particularly exhibited in his celebrated "Exposition of the Roman Catholic Faith," addressed principally to Protestants; which, however, was nine years waiting the approbation of the pope, ere it received his "Imprimatur." The points on which he chiefly lays stress, are the antiquity and unity of the Catholic church; the accumulated authorities of fathers, councils, and popes; and the necessity of a final empire in matters of doctrine and discipline. On all these points, however, he was ably answered by the venerable John Claude and other ministers of the French Calvinists, as well as by archbishop Wake, who, in his "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Church of England," exposes much management and artifice in the suppression and alteration of Bossuet's first edition. The late bishop Hurd also, in his valuable "Sermons at Lincoln's Inn, introductory to the Study of the Prophecies," has taken occasion to unravel some of his sophisms, and expose his fallacies. To his credit, however, it must be recorded, that Bossuet was an enemy to persecution, though he does not appear to have exerted his influence in preventing the revocation of the edict of Nantes. On the whole, he was a man of great genius, lofty spirit, and extraordinary vigor of mind. His works were published in 1743, in twenty quarto volumes, and many of them have been often reprinted in various forms.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.; Jones's Chr. Biog.

BOSTON, (THOMAS,) a very pious Scotch divine, was born at Dunse, in 1676, and died minister of Etrick, in 1732. In early youth he was much beloved for his sweetness of temper, progress in learning, and seriousness of conversation. He finished his studies at the university of Edinburg before he was twenty, and received license to preach. He was ordained minister of Shrimpton in 1700. He was a most excellent preacher, and a devoted pastor. His poetical works were numerous, but he is chiefly remembered by his Human Nature in its Fourfold State; a work which has gone through numerous editions.—Davenport; Middleton, iv. 255.

BOSTWICK, (DAVID,) an eminent minister in New York, was of Scotch extraction, and was born about the year 1720. He was first settled at Jamaica on Long Island, where he continued till 1756, when the synod translated him to the Presbyterian society of New York. In this charge he continued till November 12, 1763, when he died, aged forty-three. He was of a mild, catholic disposition, of great piety and zeal; and he confined himself entirely to the proper business of his office. He abhorred the frequent mixture of divinity and politics, and much more the turpitude of making the former subservient to the latter. His thoughts were occupied by things which are above, and he wished to withdraw the minds of his people more from the concerns of this world. He was deeply grieved, when some of his flock became, not fervent Christians, but furious politicians. He preached the Gospel; and as his life corresponded with his preaching, he was respected by good men of all denominations.

A few months before his death, his mind was greatly distressed by apprehensions respecting the interests of his family, when he should be taken from them. But God was pleased to give him such views of his power and goodness, and such cheerful reliance upon the wisdom and rectitude of his government, as restored to him peace and calmness. He was willing to cast himself, and all that was dear to him, upon the providence of his heavenly Father. In this temper he continued to his last moment, when he placidly resigned his soul into the hands of his Savior. Such is the serenity frequently imparted to Christians in the solemn hour of dissolution.

He published a sermon, preached May 25, 1758, entitled, "Self disclaimed, and Christ exalted." It received the warm recommendation of Gilbert Tennent. It is a sermon for ministers, penetrating into the subtle workings and base motives of the human heart, and presenting the most serious truths, in a manner very perspicuous and affectionate. He published also an account of the life, character, and death of president Davies, prefixed to Davies's sermon on the death of George II., 1761. After his decease, there was published from his manuscripts, "A Vindication of the Right of Infants to the Ordinance of Baptism, being the substance of several discourses from Acts 3: 39."—Allen; Middleton's Biog. Evang. iv. 414—418; New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Smith's New York, 193; Pref. to Bostwick's Vindication.

BOTTLE. The difference is so great between the properties of glass bottles, such as are in common use among us, and the bottles made of skin, which were used anciently by most nations, and still are used in the East, that when we read of bottles, without carefully distinguishing in our minds one kind of bottle from the other, mistake is sure to ensue. For instance, (Josh. 9: 4.) the Gibeonites "did work wilily; they took upon their asses wine-bottles, old, and rent, and bound up"—patched. So verse 13, "These bottles of wine were new, and behold they be rent." Surely to common readers this is unintelligible! So Matt. 9: 17, "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles; else, the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish."—"but new wine," says Luke, (5: 38.) "must be put in new bottles, and both are preserved." Now, what idea have English readers of old, and rent, and patched (glass) bottles? Or, of the necessity of new glass bottles for holding new wine? Nor should we forget the figure employed by Job: (32: 19.) "my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst, like new bottles." To render these, and some other passages, clear, we must understand some of the properties of the bottles alluded to.

The accompanying engraving, which is copied from the Antiquities of Herculaneum, (vol. vii. p. 197.) shows, very clearly, the form and nature of an ancient bottle; out of which a young woman is pouring wine into a cup, which in the original is held by Silenus. It appears from this figure, that after the skin has been stripped off the animal, and properly dressed, the places where the legs had been, are closed up; and where the neck was, is the opening left for receiving and discharging the contents of the bottle. This idea is very simple and conspicuous in the figure. No doubt, such bottles, when full, in which state this is represented, differ from the same when empty: being, when full, swollen, round, and firm; when empty, flaccid, weak, and bending.—Cabinet.

BOUDINOT, (ELIAS, L. L. D.,) first president of the American Bible Society, was born in Philadelphia, May 2, 1740. His great-grandfather, Elias, was a Protestant in France, who fled from his country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes; his father, Elias, died in 1770; his mother, Catharine Williams, was of a Welsh family. After a classical education, he studied law under Richard Stockton, whose eldest sister he married. Soon after commencing the practice of law in New Jersey, he rose to distinction. He early espoused the cause of his country. In 1777, congress appointed him commissary general of prisoners; and in the same year he was elected a delegate to congress, of which body he was elected the president, in November, 1782. In that capacity he put his signature to the treaty of peace. He returned to the profession of the law; but was again elected to congress under the new constitution, in 1789, and was continued a member of the house six years. In 1796, Washington appointed him the director of the mint of the United States, as the successor of Rittenhouse: in this office he continued till 1805, when he resigned it, and, retiring from Philadelphia, passed the remainder of his life at Burlington, New Jersey. He lost his wife about the year 1808: he himself died, October 24, 1821, aged eighty-one.

After the establishment, in 1816, of the Am. Bible Society, which he assisted in creating, he was elected its first president; and he made to it the munificent donation of ten thousand dollars. He afterwards contributed liberally towards the erection of its depository. In 1812, he was elected a member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, to which he presented, the next year, a donation of one hundred pounds, sterling. When three Cherokee youths were brought to the foreign mission school in 1818, one of them by his permission took his name, for he was deeply interested in every attempt to meliorate the condition of the American Indians. His house was the seat of hospitality, and his days were spent in the pursuits of biblical literature, in the exercise of the loveliest charities of life, and the performance of the highest Christian duties. He was a trustee of Princeton college, in which he founded, in 1805, the cabinet of natural history, which cost three thousand dollars. He was a member of a Presbyterian church. By the religion which he professed, he was supported and cheered as he went down to the grave. His patience was unexhausted; his faith was strong and triumphant. Exhorting those around him to rest in Jesus Christ as the only ground of trust, and commending his daughter and only child to the care of his friends, he expressed his desire to depart in peace to the bosom of his Father in heaven, and his last prayer was, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

By his last will, Dr. Boudinot bequeathed his large estate principally to charitable uses; 200 dollars for ten poor widows; 200 to the New Jersey Bible society, to purchase spectacles for the aged poor, to enable them to read the Bible; 2,000 dollars to the Moravians at Bethlehem, for the instruction of the Indians; 4,000 acres of land to the society for the benefit of the Jews; to the Magdalen societies of New York and Philadelphia, 500 dollars each; three houses in Philadelphia to the trustees of the general assembly, for the purchase of books for ministers; also, 5,000 dollars to the general assembly, for the support of a missionary in Philadelphia and New York; 4,080 acres of land for theological students at Princeton; 4,000 acres to the college of New Jersey, for the establishment of fellowships; 4,542 acres to the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, with special reference to the benefit of the Indians; 3,270 acres to the hospital at Philadelphia, for the benefit of foreigners; 4,589 acres to the American Bible Society; 13,000 acres to the mayor and corporation of Philadelphia, to supply the poor with wood on low terms; also, after the decease of his daughter, 5,000 dollars to the college, and 5,000 to the theological seminary of Princeton, and 5,000 to the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, and the remainder of his estate to the general assembly of the Presbyterian church.

How benevolent, honorable, and useful is such a charitable disposition of the property which God intrusts to a Christian, compared with the selfish and narrow appropriation of it to the enrichment of family relatives, without any reference to the diffusion of truth and holiness in the earth? For such deeds of charity, the names of Bondinot, and Burr, and Abbott, and Norris, and Phillips, will be held in lasting, most honorable remembrance.

Dr. Boudinot published The Age of Revelation, or the Age of Reason an Age of Infidelity, 1790, also 1801; an oration before the society of the Cincinnati, 1793; Second Advent of the Messiah, 1815; Star in the West; or, an Attempt to discover the long-lost Tribes of Israel, preparatory to their return to their beloved city Jerusalem, octavo, 1816. Like Mr. Adair, he regards the Indians as the lost tribes.—Allen; Panop. xvii. 399; xviii. 25; Green's Disc. 278.

BOUNDS, BOUNDARIES; limits. Moses forbids any one to alter the bounds of his neighbor's inheritance: (Deut. 19: 14.) "Thou shalt not remove thy neighbor's land-mark, which they of old time have set on thine inheritance, which thou dost inherit," &c. All the people curse the man who should remove the bounds planted by their ancestors, Deut. 27: 17. Job (24: 2.) reckons those who are guilty of this crime among thieves and robbers, and oppressors of the poor. Josephus (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8.) has interpreted the law of Moses in a very particular sense. He says, "that it is not lawful to change the limits, either of the land belonging to the Israelites, or that of their neighbors with whom they are at peace; but that they ought to be left as they are, having been so placed by the order of God himself: for the desire which avaricious men have to extend their limits, is the occasion of war and division; and whosoever is capable of removing the boundaries of lands, is not far from a disposition to violate all other laws."

Among the Romans, if a slave, with an evil design, changed any boundary, he was punished with death. Men of condition were sometimes banished, and private persons punished according to the circumstances of their crime, by pecuniary fines, or corporal punishment. The respect of the ancients for boundaries proceeded almost to adoration. Numa Pompilius, king of the Romans, ordained, that offerings should be made to boundaries, with thick milk, cakes, and first-fruits. Ovid says, that a lamb was sacrificed to them, and that they were sprinkled with blood; and Juvenal speaks of cake and pap, which were laid every year upon the sacred bounds.

The Scripture reckons it among the effects of God's omnipotence, to have fixed bounds to the sea, Ps. 104: 9. Job 26: 10. Prov. 8: 29. Jer. 5: 22.—Calmet.

BOURDALOUE, (Louis), a Jesuit, and a French preacher of consummate eloquence, was born at Bourges, in 1632.

The reputation which he acquired by preaching in the country induced his superiors to send him to Paris, where he immediately acquired popularity, and became the favorite preacher of Louis XIV., who sent him into Languedoc, to convert the Protestants. The latter part of his life was spent in visiting the sick and the prisons, and in other works of charity. He died, universally regretted, in 1704. His sermons occupy sixteen volumes, and have often been reprinted.—Davenport.

BOURIGNONISTS; the followers of Antoinette Bourignon, a lady in France, who pretended to particular inspirations. She was born at Lisle, in 1616. At her birth she was so deformed, that it was debated some days in the family whether it was not proper to stifle her as a monster; but her deformity diminishing, she was spared. From her childhood to her old age she had an extraordinary turn of mind. She set up for a reformer, and published a great number of books filled with very singular notions; the most remarkable of which are entitled, "The Light of the World," and "The Testimony of Truth." In her confession of faith, she professes her belief in the Scriptures, the divinity and atonement of Christ. She believed also that man is perfectly free to resist or receive divine grace; that there is no such thing as foreknowledge or election; that God is ever unchangeable love towards all his creatures, and does not inflict any arbitrary punishment; but that the evils they suffer are the natural consequence of sin; that religion consists not in outward forms of worship nor systems of faith, but in an entire resignation to the will of God, and those inward feelings which arise from immediate communion with God. She held many extravagant notions, among which, it is said, she asserted that Adam, before the fall, possessed the principles of both sexes; that in an ecstasy, God represented Adam to her mind in his original state; as also the beauty of the first world, and how he had drawn it from the chaos; and that every thing was bright, transparent, and darted forth life and ineffable glory; that Christ has a twofold manhood—one formed of Adam before the creation of Eve, and another taken from the virgin Mary; that his human nature was corrupted with a principle of rebellion against God's will: with a number of other wild ideas. She dressed like a hermit, and travelled through France, Holland, England, and Scotland. She died at Franeker, in the province of Frise, October 30, 1680. Her principal patrons were Christian Bartholomew, a Jansenist priest at Mechlin, and Peter Pointet, who employed a surprising genius and an uncommon sagacity to dress out the reveries of fanaticism. In his "Divine Economy," he reduced the substance of Bourignon's fancies to a regular form. Dr. Garden of Aberdeen attempted to introduce them into Scotland, and wrote an apology in their favor, or at least labored to spread it. He was condemned and deposed by the general assembly, in 1701. If we may believe Dr. Kippis, she had more disciples in Scotland than in any other country perhaps in the world.—Henderson's Buck.

BOURNE, (Richard), a missionary among the Indians at Marshpee, was one of the first emigrants from England, who settled at Sandwich. Being a religious man, he officiated publicly on the Lord's day, until a minister, Mr. Smith, was settled; he then turned his attention to the Indians at the southward and eastward, and resolved to bring them to an acquaintance with the Gospel. He went to Marshpee, not many miles to the south. The first account of him is in 1658, when he was in that town, assisting in the settlement of a boundary between the Indians and the proprietors of Barnstable. Having obtained a competent knowledge of the Indian language, he entered on the missionary service with activity and ardor. On the 17th of August, 1670, he was ordained pastor of an Indian church at Marshpee, constituted by his own disciples and converts; which solemnity was performed by the famous Eliot and Cotton. He died at Sandwich, about the year 1685, leaving no successor in the ministry but an Indian, named Simon Popmonet. Mr. Bourne is deserving of honorable remembrance, not only for his zealous exertions to make known to the Indians the glad tidings of salvation, but for his regard to their temporal interests. He wisely considered, that it would be in vain to attempt to propagate Christian knowledge among them, unless they had a territory where they might remain in peace, and have a fixed habitation. He therefore, at his own expense, not long after the year 1660, obtained a deed of Marshpee from Quachasset and others, to the South sea Indians, as his people were called. This territory, in the opinion of Mr. Hawley, was perfectly adapted for an Indian town; being situated on the sound, in sight of Martha's Vineyard, cut into necks of land, and well watered. After the death of Mr. Bourne, his son, Shearjashub Bourne, Esq. succeeded him in the Marshpee inheritance, where he lived till his death, in 1719. He procured from the court at Plymouth a ratification of the Indian deeds, so that no parcel of the lands could be bought by any white person or persons without the consent of all the said Indians, not even with the consent of the general court. Thus did the son promote the designs of the father, watching over the interests of the aborigines. A letter of Mr. Bourne, giving an account of the Indians in Plymouth county and upon the cape, is preserved in Gookin—Mathers's Mag. iii. 199; Col. Hist. Soc. i. 172, 196—199, 218; iii. 188—190; viii. 170; Gookin; Morton, 192; Hutchinson, i. 166; Allen.

BOVEY, (CATARINE,) daughter of John Riches, merchant of London, was married to William Bovey, Esq. of Flaxley in Gloucestershire, at the age of fifteen. This lady is not noted either as a linguist or a writer; yet such were her qualities and accomplishments, that she may justly claim a place in the first rank of female worthies. At the age of twenty-two, she was left a widow, without children, and very opulent; and being, likewise, an neeres to her father, these circumstances, added to her illustrious qualities, gained her crowds of admirers: but she chose to remain in a state of widowhood, that she might have no interruption to her improvement in knowledge and religion, and her devotedness to the happiness of the poor. Her domestic expenses were managed with a decency and dignity becoming her fortune; but with a frugality that made her income abound to all proper objects of charity, to the relief of the necessitous, the encouragement of the industrious, and the instruction of the ignorant. She distributed not only with cheerfulness but with joy, being sometimes unable to refrain from tears, on beholding the happiness she had imparted. The word of God was her guide; her closet her delight; and her whole character beautifully developed the power and excellence of Christian principles. She died Jan. 21, 1726, aged fifty-six.—Betham.

BOW. (See ARMS, MILITARY.)

BOWDOIN, (JAMES, LL. D.) governor of Massachusetts, and a philosopher and statesman, was born in Boston, August 18, 1727, and was the son of James Bowdoin, an eminent merchant. He graduated at Harvard college in 1745. During his residence at the university, he was distinguished by his genius and unwearied application to his studies, while his modesty, politeness, and benevolence gave his friends assurance, that his talents would not be prostituted, nor his future eminence employed for the promotion of unworthy ends. When he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, he came in possession of an ample fortune, left him by his father, who died September 4, 1747. He was now in a situation the most threatening to his literary and moral improvement; for one great motive, which impels men to exertion, could have no influence upon him, and his great wealth put it completely in his power to gratify the giddy desires of youth. But his life had hitherto been regular, and he now, with the maturity of wisdom, adopted a system, which was most rational, pleasing, and useful.

He determined to combine with the enjoyments of domestic and social life a course of study, which should enlarge and perfect the powers of his mind. At the age of twenty-two years, he married a daughter of John Erving, and commenced a system of literary and scientific research, to which he adhered through life.

In the year 1753, the citizens of Boston elected him one of their representatives in the general court, where his learning and eloquence soon rendered him conspicuous. He continued in this station until 1756, when he was chosen into the council, in which body he was long known and respected. With uniform ability and patriotism he advocated the cause of his country. In the disputes which laid the foundation of the American revolution, his writings and exertions were eminently useful. In the year 1775, a year most critical and important to America, he was chosen president of the council of Massachusetts, and he continued in that office the greater part of the time till the adoption of the state constitution in 1780. He was president of the convention which formed it; and some of its important articles are the result of his knowledge of government.

In the year 1785, after the resignation of Hancock, he was chosen governor of Massachusetts, and was re-elected the following year. In this office, his wisdom, firmness, and inflexible integrity were conspicuous. He died to Boston, after a distressing sickness of three months, November 6, 1790, aged sixty-three.

Governor Bowdoin was a learned man, and a constant and generous friend of literature. The American academy of arts and sciences, incorporated at Boston, May 4, 1780, at a time when our country was in the deepest distress, was formed under his influence, and was an object of his constant attention. He was chosen its first president, and he continued in that office till his death. He was constituted doctor of laws by the university of Edinburgh, and was elected a member of the Royal societies of London and Dublin. He was deeply convinced of the truth and excellence of Christianity, and it had a constant effect upon his life. As the hour of his departure approached, he expressed his satisfaction in the thought of going to the full enjoyment of God and his Redeemer.

Governor Bowdoin was the author of a poetic "Paraphrase of the Economy of Human Life," dated March 28, 1759. He also published a philosophical discourse, publicly addressed to the American academy of arts and sciences in Boston, November 8, 1780, when he was inducted into the office of president.—*Thacher's Fun. BOY BISHOP, TUE. Anciently, on the 6th of December, it being St. Nicholas's day, the choir boys in cathedral churches chose one of their number to maintain the state and authority of a bishop, for which purpose the boy was habited in rich episcopal robes, wore a mitre on his head, and bore a crozier in his hand; and his fellows, for the time being, assumed the character and dress of priests, yielded him canonical obedience, took possession of the church, and, except mass, performed all the ecclesiastical ceremonies and offices. Though the boy bishop's election was on the 6th of December, yet his office and authority lasted till the 28th, being Innocent's day. Mr. Gregorie found the processional of the boy bishop. By the statutes of the church of Sarum, for the regulation of this extraordinary scene, no one was to interrupt or press upon the boy bishop and the other children during their procession or service in the cathedral, upon pain of anathema. It further appears, that at this cathedral the boy bishop held a kind of visitation, and maintained a corresponding state and prerogative; and he is supposed to have had power to dispose of prebends that fell vacant during his episcopacy. If he died within the month, he was buried like other bishops in his episcopal ornaments, his obsequies were solemnized with great pomp, and a monument was erected in his memory, with his episcopal effigy. About one hundred and fifty years ago, a stone monument to one of these boy bishops was discovered in Salisbury cathedral, under the seats near the pulpit, from whence it was removed to the north part of the nave between the pillars, and covered over with a box of wood, to the great admiration of those who, unacquainted with the anomalous character it designed to commemorate, thought it "almost impossible that a bishop should be so small in person, or a child so great in clothes."

This singular custom, it appears, was observed also at Canterbury, St. Paul's, Colchester, Westminster, Eton York, Beverly, and all the churches that had cathedral worship, in England, and at many places on the continent.—Henderson's Buck; Robinson on Baptism, 151.

BOYLE, (ROBERT,) a philosopher, who ranks with Bacon and with Newton, was the seventh son of the celebrated earl of Cork, and was born at Lismore, in Ireland, January 26, 1626, the year that Bacon died. He was committed to the care of a country nurse, with instructions to bring him up as hardy as if he had been her own son.

"For his father," he tells us, "had a perfect aversion for the fondness of those parents, which made them breed their children so nice and tenderly, that a hot sun or a good shower of rain as much endangers them, as if they were made of butter or of sugar." He thus gained a strong and vigorous constitution; which, however, he afterwards lost in a considerable degree, by its being treated too delicately. When he was about three years old, he lost his mother, who was a most accomplished woman; and whom he regrets on that account, because he did not know her. A second misfortune was, that he learned to stammer, by mocking some children of his own age, of which, though no endeavors were spared, he could never be perfectly cured. Eton has the honor of his early education, which was perfected by private tutors, and lastly at Geneva. After having travelled over various parts of the continent, he settled in England, and devoted himself to science, especially to natural philosophy and to chemistry; and till the close of his existence, he unremittingly persevered in his scientific pursuits. Of the Royal society he was one of the first members; but he declined the office of president, as he did also that of provost of Eton college. Philosophy, however, did not wholly engross his time; much of his leisure was given to theological studies, to the composition of moral and religious works, and to the advancement of religion, for which latter object he expended very considerable sums. Among his pious acts was the founding of a lecture for the defence of natural and revealed religion. As an experimental philosopher, he displayed indefatigable ardor, and uncommon penetration and skill, and he, undoubtedly, opened the way to many modern discoveries. As a man, his character was of the most estimable kind; his manners were singularly mild and courteous, and he possessed piety without bigotry, learning without arrogance, and charity without ostentation. Boyle was never married. He died on the 30th of December, 1691, a week after his favorite sister, lady Ranelagh, to whom he was affectionately attached, and with whom he had lived for the most part of nearly half a century.

"His knowledge," says bishop Burnet, "was of so vast an extent, that if it were not for the variety of vouchers in their several sorts, I should be afraid to say all I know. He carried the study of the Hebrew very far into the rabbinical writings, and the other Oriental tongues. He had read so much of the fathers, that he had formed a clear judgment of all the eminent ones; he had read a vast deal on the Scriptures, had gone very nicely through the various controversies in religion, and was a true master of the whole body of divinity; he entertained so profound a veneration for the Deity, that the very name of God was never mentioned by him without a pause and a visible stop in his discourse; in which Sir Peter Pett, who knew him for almost forty years, affirms, that he was so exact, that he did not remember him once to fail in it. To those who conversed most with him in his inquiries into nature, it was obvious that it was his leading object in that, on which, as he had his own eye constantly fixed, so he took care to put others often in mind of it, viz. to raise in himself and others more exalted thoughts of the greatness and glory, and wisdom and goodness of the Deity. Such was the impression of this upon his own mind, that he concludes the article of his will, which has a reference to the Royal society, in these words: "Wishing them also a happy success in their laudable attempts to discover the true nature of the works of God, and praying that they, and all other searchers into physical truths, may cordially refer their attainments to the glory of the great Author of nature, and to the comfort of mankind." His charities were princely, and of which some notice has been already taken, in his efforts for disseminating the knowledge of the gospel in various parts. He expended seven hundred pounds in printing an edition of the Bible in the native Irish, and having it distributed among those who spoke it.

He contributed largely to an impression of the Bible in Welsh; and during his life, he contributed three hundred pounds annually to advance the design of propagating Christianity in America. His liberality also towards such literary persons as needed his assistance, was extraordinary; and, according to bishop Burnet, who was often his almoner, for several years before his death, he distributed one thousand pounds a year among the French refugees, who had fled from that country to escape persecution, and others who had taken refuge in England from the calamities of Ireland. And in all his charities he adhered as strictly as possible to the injunction of his divine Master, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." The works of this eminent philosopher were collected and printed in five volumes, folio, London, 1744; and a valuable abridgment has been published by Dr. Shaw, in three volumes quarto. See Birch's Life of the Hon. Robert Boyle.—Davenport; Jones.

BOYLE'S LECTURES; a course of eight sermons, preached annually; set on foot by the Hon. Robert Boyle, by a codicil annexed to his will, in 1691, whose design, as expressed by the institutor, is to prove the truth of the Christian religion against infidels, without descending to any controversies among Christians, and to answer new difficulties, scruples, &c. For the support of this lecture he assigned the rent of his house in Crooked Lane, to some learned divine within the precincts of London, to be elected for a term not exceeding three years. But the fund proving precarious, the salary was ill paid; to remedy which inconvenience, archbishop Tension procured a yearly stipend of fifty pounds forever, to be paid quarterly, charged on a farm in the parish of Brill, in the county of Bucks. To this appointment we are indebted for many excellent defences of natural and revealed religion.—Head. Buck.

BOYLSTON, (ZABDIEL, F. R. S.) was born at Brookline, Massachusetts, in 1684. He studied medicine at Boston, and entered into the practice of his profession in that place. In 1721, when the small-pox broke out in Boston, and spread alarm through the whole country, the practice of inoculation was introduced by Dr. Boylston, notwithstanding it was discouraged by the rest of the faculty, and a public ordinance was passed to prohibit it. He persevered in his practice in spite of the most violent opposition, and had the satisfaction of seeing inoculation in general use in New England, for some time before it became common in Great Britain. In 1725, he visited England, where he was received with much attention, and was elected a fellow of the Royal society. Upon his return, he continued at the head of his profession for many years, and accumulated a large fortune. Besides communications to the Royal society, he published two treatises on the small-pox. He died in 1766, in Christian hope.—Davenport; Allen.

BOX TREE, tashur; so called from its flourishing, or perpetual viridity—an evergreen. Isaiah says, "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together." 41: 19. The nature of the box tree might lead us to look for evergreens among the foregoing trees, and perhaps by tracing this idea we might attain to something like satisfaction respecting them, which at present we cannot. A plantation of evergreens in the wilderness is not unlikely to be the import of this passage. The contrast between a perpetual verdure, and sometimes universal brownness, not enlivened by variety of tints, must be very great: nevertheless we must be careful not to group unnaturally associated vegetation.—Calmet.

BOZEZ; the name of a rock which Jonathan climbed up to attack the Philistines. 1 Sam. 14: 4. It was situated between Myron and Michmah, and formed, with a similar rock opposite, called Seveh, a defile or strait.—Calmel.

BOZRAH. (See BEZER.)

BRACELET. A bracelet is commonly worn by the oriental princes, as a badge of power and authority. When the caliph Cayem Bemrillah granted the investiture of certain dominions to an eastern prince, he sent him letters patent, a crown, a chain, and bracelets. This was probably the reason that the Amalekite brought the bracelet which he found on Saul's arm, along with his crown, to David. 2 Sam. 1: 10. It was a royal ornament, and belonged to the regalia of the kingdom. The bracelet, it must be acknowledged, was worn both by men and women of different ranks; but the original word, in the second Book of Samuel, occurs only in two other places, and is quite different from the term which is employed to express the more common ornament known by that name. And besides, this ornament was worn by kings and princes in a different manner from their subjects. It was fastened above the elbow; and was commonly of great value.—Watson.

BRADBURY, (THOMAS), a dissenting minister, born at Wakefield, in 1677, became the successor of Daniel Burgess, and an imitator of that preacher's style of pulpit eloquence. He died in 1759. His sermons possess considerable merit, and his character was much esteemed.—Davenport; Doddridge's Lectures, 25.

BRADFORD, (WILLIAM), second governor of Plymouth colony, and one of the first settlers of New England, was born at Ansterfield, a village in the north of England, in 1588. He was educated in the practice of agriculture. His paternal inheritance was considerable; but he had no better education than such as usually falls to the share of the children of husbandmen. At the age of twelve years, his mind was seriously impressed by divine truth in reading the Scriptures, and an illness of long continuance conspired to preserve him from the follies of youth. His good impressions were confirmed by attending upon the ministry of Mr. Richard Clifton. As he advanced in years, he was stigmatized as a separatist; but such was his firmness, that he cheerfully bore the frowns of his relatives and the scoffs of his neighbors, and connected himself with the church, over which Mr. Clifton and Mr. Robinson presided, fearless of the persecution, which he foresaw this act would draw upon him. Believing that many practices of the established church of England were repugnant to the directions of the word of God, he was fully resolved to prefer the purity of Christian worship to any temporal advantages which might arise from bending his conscience to the opinions of others. Accordingly, at the age of eighteen, he emigrated to Holland, and joined his brethren at Amsterdam.

Mr. Bradford, after a residence of about ten years in Holland, engaged with zeal in the plan of removal to America, which was formed by the English church at Leyden under the care of Mr. Robinson. He accordingly embarked for England, July 22, 1620, and on the sixth of September set sail from Plymouth with the first company. While the ship in November lay in the harbor of Cape Cod, he was one of the foremost in the several hazardous attempts to find a proper place for the seat of the colony. Before a suitable spot was agreed upon, his wife fell into the sea, and was drowned. Soon after the death of governor Carver, at Plymouth, April 5, 1621, Mr. Bradford was elected governor in his place. He was at this time in the thirty-third year of his age, and was most conspicuous for wisdom, fortitude, piety, and benevolence. One of the first acts of his administration was to send an embassy to Massasoit for the purpose of confirming the league with the Indian sachem, of procuring seed corn for the next season, and of exploring the country. It was well for the colony that the friendship of Massasoit was thus secured, for his influence was extensive. In consequence of his regard for the new settlers, nine sachems in September went to Plymouth, and acknowledged themselves loyal subjects of king James. In the same month, a party was sent out to explore the bay of Massachusetts. They landed under a cliff, supposed to be Copp's hill in Boston, where they were received with kindness by Obbatinewa, who gave them a promise of his assistance against the squaw sachem. On their return, they carried with them so good a report of the country, that the people lamented that they had established themselves at Plymouth; but it was not now in their power to remove.

In the beginning of 1622, the colony began to experience a distressing famine, occasioned by the arrival of new settlers, who came unfurnished with provisions. In the height of their distress, a threatening message was received from Canonicus, sachem of Narragansett, expressed by the present of a bundle of arrows, bound with the skin of a serpent. The governor sent back the skin filled with powder and ball. This prompt and ingenious reply terminated the correspondence. The Narragansetts were so terrified, that they even returned the serpent's skin without inspecting its contents. It was however judged necessary to fortify the town; and this work was performed by the people, while they were suffering the extremity of famine. For some time they subsisted entirely upon fish. In this exigency, governor Bradford found the advantage of his friendly intercourse with the Indians. He made several excursions among them, and procured corn and beans, making a fair purchase by means of goods, which were brought by two ships in August, and received by the planters in exchange for beaver. The whole quantity of corn and beans, thus purchased, amounted to twenty-eight hogsheds. But still more important benefits soon resulted from the disposition of governor Bradford to preserve the friendship of the natives. During the illness of Massasoit in the spring of 1623, Mr. Winslow was sent to him with cordials, which contributed to his recovery. In return for this benevolent attention, the grateful sachem disclosed a dangerous conspiracy, then in agitation among the Indians, for the purpose of totally extirpating the English. This plot did not originate in savage malignity, but was occasioned by the injustice and indiscretion of some settlers in the bay of Massachusetts. As the most effectual means of suppressing the conspiracy, Massasoit advised, that the chief conspirators, whom he named, should be seized and put to death. This melancholy work was accordingly performed by captain Standish, and the colony was relieved from apprehension. When the report of this transaction was carried to Holland, Mr. Robinson in his next letter to the governor, expressed his deep concern at the event. "O that you had converted some," said he, "before you had killed any!"

The scarcity which had been experienced by the planters, was in part owing to the impolicy of laboring in common, and putting the fruit of their labor into the public store. To stimulate industry by the prospect of individual acquisition, and thus to promote the general good by removing the restraints upon selfishness, it was agreed in the spring of 1623, that every family should plant for themselves, on such ground as should be assigned them by lot. After this agreement, the governor was not again obliged to traffic with the Indians in order to procure the means of subsistence for the colony. Thus will fail the common-stock projects of Ann Lee, Owen, and other enthusiasts.

Such was the reputation of Mr. Bradford, acquired by his piety, wisdom, and integrity, that he was annually chosen governor, as long as he lived, excepting in the years 1633, 1636, and 1644, when Mr. Winslow was appointed, and the years 1634 and 1638, when Mr. Prince was elected chief magistrate. At these times it was by his own request, that the people did not re-elect him. Governor Winthrop mentions the election of Mr. Winslow in 1633, and adds, "Mr. Bradford having been governor about ten years, and now by importunity got off." What a lesson for the ambitious, who bend their whole influence to gain and secure the high offices of state! Mr. Bradford strongly recommended a rotation in the election of governor. "If this appointment," he pleaded, "was any honor or benefit, others beside himself should partake of it; if it was a burden; others beside himself should help to bear it." But the people were so much attached to him, that for thirty years they placed him at the head of the government, and in the five years when others were chosen, he was first in the list of assistants, which gave him the rank of deputy governor. After an infirm and reaching state of health for a number of months, he was suddenly seized by an acute disease, May 7, 1657. In the night, his mind was so enraptured by contemplations upon religious truth and the hopes of futurity, that he said to his friends in the morning, "The good Spirit of God has given me a pledge of my happiness in another world, and the first fruits of eternal glory." The next day, May 9, 1657, he was removed from the present state of existence, aged sixty-eight, greatly lamented by the people, not only in Plymouth, but in the neighboring colonies.

Though he never enjoyed great literary advantages, governor Bradford was much inclined to literary pursuits. He was familiar with the French and Dutch languages, and attained considerable knowledge of the Latin and Greek; but he more assiduously studied the Hebrew, because, as he said, "he would see with his own eyes the ancient oracles of God in their native beauty." He had read much of history and philosophy; but theology was his favorite study. His life was exemplary and useful. He was watchful against sin, a man of prayer, and conspicuous for holiness.—Allen.

BRADLEY, (JAMES, D. D.) an eminent astronomer and mathematician, was born in 1702, at Shireborn, in Gloucestershire, educated at Baliol college, Oxford, and took orders, but resigned two livings, in order to give himself up wholly to astronomy. He was successively Savilian professor at Oxford, lecturer on astronomy and experimental philosophy, and astronomer royal. The latter office he held, with high reputation, from 1741 till his death, in 1762. In 1751, George II. offered him the rich living of Greenwich, but Bradley declined it as incompatible with his other studies: a pension of two hundred and fifty pounds was, in consequence, conferred on him. Bradley immortalized his name, and extended the bounds of astronomical science, by his discoveries of the aberration of the fixed stars, and the nutation of the earth's axis. A part of his voluminous and valuable observations, made at the royal observatory, was published in 1798. In addition to his merit as a man of science, Dr. Bradley was pious, modest, benevolent, humane, and generous in private life.—Davenport; Encyclop. Americ.; Jones's Christian Biography.

BRADWARDINE, (THOMAS,) denominated the profound doctor, was born at Bradwardine, in Herefordshire, late in the thirteenth century, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. He was the confessor of Edward III., and attended him to France. In 1349, he was made archbishop of Canterbury, but died six weeks subsequently, deeply lamented on account of his genuine piety, his extensive erudition, and humble yet earnest zeal for the instruction of the people committed to his care. Bradwardine was scarcely less eminent as a mathematician than as a theologian. Among his works are Geometria Speculativa. But of all his writings, that which he wrote against the Pelagians is the most celebrated. Its title is, De Causa Dei, Of the Cause of God. The late Dr. Gill, in his Cause of God and Truth, refers to Bradwardine more than once, and calls him a second Augustine. This commendation is great. He did not make a formal opposition to popery as such; but is thought in his opinions to have favored the followers of Lollard, and to have diffused much of that evangelical light, which Wickliffe afterwards imbibed, and reflected more boldly.—Davenport; Mosheim; Teimey.

BRAHMINISM. See HINDOOISM.

BRAINARD, (JOHN G. C.) a poet, was the son of judge Jeremiah G. Brainard, of New London, Conn., and was born about the year 1797. He was graduated in 1815 at Yale college. Brainard studied law, and commenced the practice at Middletown; but not finding the success which he desired, in 1822 he undertook the editorial charge of the Connecticut Mirror at Hartford. Thus was he occupied about seven years, until, being marked as a victim for the consumption, he returned about a year before his death to his father's house. He died September 26, 1828, aged thirty-two.

He was an excellent editor of the paper which he conducted, enriching it with his poetical productions, which have originality, force, and pathos, and with many beautiful prose compositions, and refraining from that personal abuse, which many editors seem to think essential to their vocation. In this respect, his gentlemanly example is worthy of being followed by the editorial corps. He, who addresses himself every week or every day to thousands of readers, sustains a high responsibility. If, destitute of good breeding and good principles, he is determined to attract notice by the personalities, for which there is a greedy appetite in the community; if he yields himself a slave to the party which he espouses, and toils for it by contumelies upon his opponents; if, catching the spirit of an infuriated zealot, and regardless of truth and honor, he scatters abroad his malignant slanders and inflammatory traducements; then, instead of a wise and benevolent teacher and guide, he presents himself as a sower of discord and a minister of evil. In an Utopian commonwealth, or a republic constructed by pure reason and right, if the laws subject the teacher of ten children to an examination and approval before he can commence his labors, they would not allow a heedless youth, without judgment or principle, nor a man of full age, without conscience or honor, to send forth from day to day into the houses of the people, a foul and malignant spirit, to corrupt them by indecencies and blasphemies, and drive them to madness by falsehoods and bitter incitements. Mr. Brainard possessed a kindness of heart and rectitude of mind, which would not allow him to traduce and revile. He could not be the drudge of some patriotic impostor, who, hungry for office, clamorously boasts of seeking the interests of the dear people.

The change experienced by the renovated, pardoned sinner, is described by him in the following lines:

"All sights are fair to the recovered blind;
All sounds are music to the deaf restored;
The lame, made whole, leaps like the sportive hind;
And the sad, bow'd down sinner, with his load
Of shame and sorrow, when he cuts the cord,
And leaves his pack behind, is free again
In the light yoke and burden of his Lord."

In his last illness he said, "This plan of salvation in the gospel is all that I want; it fills me with wonder and gratitude, and makes the prospect of death not only peaceful, but joyous." He published Occasional Pieces of Poetry, 12mo. 1825.—Spec. Amer. Poet. iii. 198—212; Hawes's Serm.; Allen.

BRAINERD, (DAVID,) an eminent preacher and missionary to the Indians, was born at Haddam, Connecticut, April 20, 1718. As his mind was early impressed by the truths of religion, he took delight in reading those books which communicate religious instruction; he called upon the name of God in secret prayer; he studied the Scriptures with great diligence; and he associated with several young persons for mutual encouragement and assistance in the paths of wisdom. But in all this he afterwards considered himself as self-righteous, as completely destitute of true piety, as governed by the fear of future punishment and not by the love of God, as depending for salvation upon his good feelings and his strict life, without a perception of the necessity and the value of the mediation of Christ. At this time he indeed acknowledged, that he deserved nothing for his best works, for the theory of salvation was familiar to him; but while he made the acknowledgment, he did not feel what it implied. He still secretly relied upon the warmth of his affections, upon his sincerity, upon some quality in himself, as the ground of acceptance with God; instead of relying upon the Lord Jesus, through whom alone there is access to the Father. At length, he was brought under a deep sense of his sinfulness, and he perceived, that there was nothing good in himself. This conviction was not a sudden perturbation of mind; it was a permanent impression, made by the view of his own character, when compared with that holy law of God, which he was bound to obey. But the discovery was unwelcome and irritating. He could not readily abandon the hope, which rested upon his religious exercises. He was reluctant to admit, that the principle, whence all his actions proceeded, was entirely corrupt. He was opposed to the strictness of the divine law, which extended to the heart as well as to the life. He murmured against the doctrine, that faith was indispensably necessary to salvation, and that faith was completely the gift of God. He was irritated in not finding any way pointed out, which would lead him to the Savior; in not finding any means prescribed, by which an unrenewed man could of his own strength obtain that, which the highest angel could not give. He was unwilling to believe, that he was dead in trespasses and in sins. But these unpleasant truths were fastened upon his mind, and they could not be shaken off. It pleased God to disclose to him his true character and condition, and to quell the tumult of his soul. He saw that his schemes to save himself were entirely vain, and must forever be ineffectual; he perceived that it was self-interest, which had before led him to pray, and that he had never once prayed from any respect to the glory of God; he felt that he was lost. In this state of mind, while he was walking in a solitary place in the evening of July 12, 1739, meditating upon religious subjects, his mind was illuminated with completely new views of the divine perfections; he perceived a glory in the character of God and in the way of salvation by the crucified Son of the Most High, which was never before discerned; and he was led to depend upon Jesus Christ for righteousness, and to seek the glory of God as his principal object.

In 1739, he became a member of Yale college, where he was distinguished for application and general correctness of conduct. He was expelled from this institution in 1742, in consequence of having said, in the warmth of his religious zeal, that one of the tutors was as devoid of grace as a chair. In the spring of 1742, he began the study of divinity, and at the end of July was licensed to preach. Having received, from the society for propagating Christian knowledge, an appointment as missionary to the Indians, he commenced his labors at Kaunameek, a village of Massachusetts, situated between Stockbridge and Albany. He remained there about twelve months, and on the removal of the Kaunameeks to Stockbridge, he turned his attention towards the Delaware Indians. In 1744, he was ordained at Newark, New Jersey, and fixed his residence near the forks of the Delaware in Pennsylvania, where he remained about a year. From this place, he removed to Crossweksung, in New Jersey, where his efforts among the Indians were crowned with great success. The Spirit of God seemed to bring home effectually to the hearts of the ignorant heathen the truths which he delivered to them with affection and zeal. His Indian interpreter, who had been converted by his preaching, co-operated cheerfully in the good work. It was not uncommon for the whole congregation to be in tears, or to be crying out under a sense of sin. In less than a year, Mr. Brainerd baptized seventy-seven persons, of whom thirty-eight were adults, and gave satisfactory evidence of having been renovated by the power of God; and he beheld, with unspeakable pleasure, between twenty and thirty of his converts seated round the table of the Lord. The Indians were at the time entirely reformed in their lives. They were very humble and devout, and united in Christian affection. The lives of these Indian converts in subsequent years, under John Brainerd and William Tennent, were in general holy and exemplary, furnishing evidence of the sincerity of their faith in the gospel.

In the summer of 1746, Mr. Brainerd visited the Indians on the Susquehanna, and on his return in September, found himself worn out by the hardships of his journey. His health was so much impaired, that he was able to preach but little more. Being advised in the spring of 1747 to travel in New England, he went as far as Boston, and returned in July to Northampton, where, in the family of Jonathan Edwards, he passed the remainder of his days.

Mr. Brainerd was a man of vigorous powers of mind. While he was favored with a quick discernment and ready invention, with a strong memory and natural eloquence, he also possessed in an uncommon degree the penetration, the closeness and force of thought, and the soundness of judgment, which distinguish the man of talents from him, who subsists entirely upon the learning of others.

His knowledge of theology was uncommonly extensive and accurate. President Edwards, whose opinion of Mr. Brainerd was founded upon an intimate acquaintance with him, says, that "he never knew his equal, of his age and standing, for clear, accurate notions of the nature and essence of true religion, and its distinctions from its various false appearances." Mr. Brainerd had no clarity for the religion of those, who, indulging the hope that they were interested in the divine mercy, settled down in a state of security and negligence. He believed, that the good man would be continually making progress towards perfection, and that conversion was not merely a great change in the views of the mind and the affections of the heart, produced by the Spirit of God; but that it was the beginning of a course of holiness, which, through the divine agency, would be pursued through life. In his own character were combined the most ardent and pure love to God, and the most unaffected benevolence to man, an alienation from the vain and perishable pursuits of the world, the most humbling and constant sense of his own iniquity, which was a greater burden to him than all his afflictions, great brokenness of heart before God for the coldness of his love and the imperfection of his Christian virtues, the most earnest breathings of soul after holiness, real delight in the gospel of Jesus Christ, sweet complacency in all his disciples, incessant desires and importunate prayers that men might be brought to the knowledge and the obedience of the truth, and that thus God might be glorified and the kingdom of Christ advanced, great resignation to the will of his heavenly Father, an entire distrust of his own heart, and a universal dependence upon God, the absolute renunciation of every thing for his Redeemer, the most clear and abiding views of the things of the eternal world, a continual warfare against sin, and the most unwearied exertion of all his powers in the service, and in obedience to the commands, of the Most High. He loved his Savior, and wished to make known his precious name among the heathen.

In his last illness, and during the approaches of death, Mr. Brainerd was remarkably resigned and composed. He spoke of that willingness to die, which originates in the desire of escaping pain, and in the hope of obtaining pleasure or distinction in heaven, as very ignoble. The heaven which he seemed to anticipate, consisted in the love and service of God. When he was about to be separated forever from the earth, his desires seemed to be as eager as ever for the progress of the gospel. He spoke much of the prosperity of Zion, of the infinite importance of the work which was committed to the ministers of Jesus Christ, and of the necessity which was imposed upon them, to be constant and earnest in prayer to God for the success of their exertions. Eternity was before him, with all its interests. "Thy sweet to me," said he, "to think of eternity. But Oh, what shall I say to the eternity of the wicked! I cannot mention it, nor think of it. The thought is too dreadful!" In answer to the inquiry, how he did, he said, "I am almost in eternity; I long to be there. My work is done. I have done with all my friends. All the world is now nothing to me. Oh! to be in heaven, to praise and glorify God with his holy angels!" At length, after the trial of his patience by the most excruciating sufferings, his spirit was released from its tabernacle of clay, and entered those mansions, which the Lord Jesus hath prepared for all his faithful disciples, Oct. 9, 1747, aged twenty-nine years.

The exertions of Mr. Brainerd in the Christian cause were of short continuance; but they were intense, and incessant and effectual. One must be either a very good or a very bad man, who can read his life without blushing for himself. If ardent piety and enlarged benevolence, if the supreme love of God and the inextinguishable desire of promoting his glory in the salvation of immortal souls, if persevering resolution in the midst of the most pressing discouragements, if cheerful self-denial and unremitting labor, if humility and zeal for godliness, united with conspicuous talents, render a man worthy of remembrance, the name of Brainerd will not soon be forgotten.

A new edition of his Memoirs was published in 1822, by Serceno Edwards Dwight, including his Journal. President Edwards, his biographer, had omitted the already printed journals, which had been published in two parts; the first, from June 19, to November 4, 1745, entitled Mirabilia Dei inter Indicos; the second from November 24, 1745, to June 19, 1746, with the title, Divine Grace displayed, &c. These journals Mr. Dwight has incorporated.

in a regular chronological series with the rest of the diary, as alone given by Edwards.—Brainerd's Life; his Journal; Edwards' Fun. Sermon; Middleton's Biog. Evang. iv. 262—264; Assembly's Miss. Mag. ii. 449—452; Boston Recorder, 1824, p. 196.

BRAMBLE, (atad), a prickly shrub. Judg. 9: 14, 15. Ps. 58: 9. In the latter place it is translated "thorn." Hiller supposes atad to be the cyonobastus, or sweet-brier. The author of "Scripture illustrated" says, that the bramble seems to be well chosen as the representative of the original; which should be a plant bearing fruit of some kind, being associated, (Judg. 9: 14.) though by opposition, with the vine. The apologue or fable of Jotham has always been admired for its spirit and application. It has also been considered as the oldest fable extant.—Watson.

BRANCH; a title of Messiah: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a BRANCH shall grow out of his roots." Isa. 11: 1. See also Zech. 3: 8. 6: 12. Jer. 23: 5. 33: 15. When Christ is represented as a slender twig, shooting out from the trunk of an old tree lopped to the very root and decayed, and becoming itself a mighty tree, reference is made, 1. To the kingly dignity of Christ, springing up from the decayed house of David; 2. To the exaltation which was to succeed his humbled condition on earth, and to the glory and vigor, of his mediatorial reign.—Watson.

BRANDENBURG, CONFESSION OF; a formulary or confession of faith, drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the confession of Augsburg. See AUGSBURG CONFESSION.—Hend. Buck.

BRANDT, (GERARD), a poet and divine, was born at Amsterdam in 1626, and died there in 1685. He was pastor of a congregation of Remonstrants. His most important works are, a History of the Reformation in the Low Countries, four volumes quarto; a life of De Ruyter; and Latin Poems.—Davenport.

BRASS. The word brass occurs very often in our translation of the Bible; but that is a mixed metal, for the making of which we are indebted to the German metallurgists of the thirteenth century. That the ancients knew not the art of making it, is almost certain. None of their writings even hint at the process. There can be no doubt, that copper is the original metal intended. This is spoken of as known prior to the flood; and to have been discovered, or at least wrought, as was also iron, in the seventh generation from Adam, by Tubal-cain: whence the name Iulcan. The knowledge of these two metals must have been carried over the world afterwards with the spreading colonies of the Noachidæ. Agreeably to this, the ancient histories of the Greeks and Romans speak of Cadmus as the inventor of the metal which by the former is called chalkos, and by the latter æs; and from him had the denomination cadmeæ. According to others, Cadmus discovered a mine, of which he taught the use. The name of the person here spoken of was undoubtedly the same with Ham, or Cam, the son of Noah, who probably learned the art of assaying metals from the family of Tubal-cain, and communicated that knowledge to the people of the colony which he settled.—Watson.

BRAY, (THOMAS, D. D.) ecclesiastical commissary for Maryland and Virginia, was sent out by the bishop of London in 1699, and was indefatigable in his efforts to promote religion in the colonies, and among the Indians and negroes. Libraries were instituted by him both for missionaries and for parishes. He crossed the Atlantic several times, and spent the greater part of his life in these labors. Soliciting the charities of others, he also in his disinterested zeal contributed the whole of his small fortune to the support of his plans. Through his exertions, parish libraries were established in England, and various benevolent societies in London were instituted, particularly the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts. He died February 15, 1730, aged seventy-three.—Allen.

BREACH; a breaking, or place broken. God's breach of promise is not his falsification of his word, but the just interruption of its fulfilment on account of Israel's sin; and it may be remarked, that God never promised that those who came out of Egypt should enter Canaan. Moreover the words may be thus understood: When your children are brought into Canaan, then shall it appear I have made no breach of my promise, as you have falsely charged me. Numb. 14: 34. Moses stood in the breach: Israel's sins had opened the way for the destructive vengeance of God to destroy them utterly, but Moses' powerful intercession prevented it. Psa. 106: 23. The Jews' iniquity was like a breach snelling out in a high wall; it had brought the righteous judgments of God just to the very point of ruining them. Isa. 30: 13.—Brown.

BREAD; a word which in Scripture is taken for food in general. Gen. 3: 19. 18: 5. 28: 20. Exod. 2: 20. Manna is called bread from heaven. Exod. 16: 15.

The ancient Hebrews had several ways of baking bread: they often baked it under the ashes, upon the hearth, upon round copper plates, or in pans or stoves made on purpose. At their departure out of Egypt, they made some of these unleavened loaves for their journey. Exod. 12: 39. Elijah, when fleeing from Jezebel, found at his head a cake, which had been baked on the coals, and a cruse of water. 1 Kings 19: 5. The same prophet desired the widow of Sarepta to make a little bread (cake) for him, and to bake it under the ashes. 1 Kings 17: 13. The Hebrews call this kind of cake huggoth: and Hosea (7: 8.) compares Ephraim to one of them which was not turned, but was baked on one side only. Busbecquius (Constantinop. p. 36.) says, that in Bulgaria this sort of loaf is still very common. They are there called hugaces. As soon as they see a guest coming, the women immediately prepare these unleavened loaves, which are baked under the ashes, and sold to strangers, there being no bakers in this country. See BAKING.

As the Hebrews generally made their bread very thin, and in the form of little flat cakes, or wafers, they did not cut it with a knife, but broke it; which gave rise to that expression so usual in Scripture, of breaking bread, to signify eating, sitting down to table, taking a repast. In the institution of the eucharist, our Savior broke the bread which he had consecrated; whence, to break bread, and breaking of bread, in the New Testament, are used for celebrating the eucharist.

The forms given to bread in different countries, however, are varied according to circumstances, whether it be required to sustain keeping for a longer or a shorter time; that bread which is to be eaten the same day it is made is usually thin, broad, and flat; that which is meant for longer keeping, is larger and more bulky, that its moisture may not too soon evaporate. So far as we recollect, the loaves most generally used among the Jews were round; though the rabbins say the shew-bread was square. We have representations of loaves divided into twelve parts: we cannot affirm, that the loaf used by our Lord at the eucharist was thus divided; but if it were, it shows how conveniently it might be distributed among the disciples, to each a part: and possibly such a compartment of it might be thought to tend towards settling the question, whether Judas partook of it. We think he did not; but that our Lord in some degree complied with a custom mentioned in the article EATING. We conceive, too, that such a divided loaf gives no improper comment on the passage, "We being many are one bread"—many partakers, each having his portion from the same loaf. 1 Cor. 10: 17.

Bread and water are used for sustenance in general. Deut. 9: 9, 18, &c. "Bread of affliction, and water of affliction," (1 Kings 22: 27.) are the same as a little bread and a little water, or prison-bread and prison-water. Prison allowance.

The psalmist speaks of the bread of tears, and the bread of sorrows. Psa. 42: 3. 127: 2. Meaning continual sorrow and tears, instead of food; or which make us lose the desire of eating and drinking. "Bread of wickedness, bread of deceit," is bread acquired by fraudulent and criminal practices. These metaphors are very energetic.

BREAD, DAILY. To show an entire dependence on our heavenly Father's care, we are instructed to pray day by day for our daily bread. Matt. 6: 11. The Greek word epiousios, sufficient, used by the evangelists, may be understood as opposed to pericious, superfluous. Many commentators include in this petition, a prayer for the daily supply for the spiritual wants of the believer by divine grace, as well as a daily supply for his temporal need by divine providence.—Calmet.

BREAD OF THE PRESENCE, or SHEW-BREAD, was bread offered every Sabbath day to God on the golden table placed in the holy place. Exod. 25: 30. The Hebrews affirm, that the loaves were square, having four sides, and covered with leaves of gold. They were twelve in number, in memory of the twelve tribes of Israel, in whose names they were offered. Every loaf was composed of two assarons of flour, which make about five pints one tenth. The loaves had no leaven, were presented hot every Sabbath day, the old loaves being taken away, which were to be eaten by the priests only. With this offering there was salt and incense; and even wine, according to some commentators. Scripture mentions only salt and incense; but it is presumed wine was added, because it was not wanting in other sacrifices and offerings. It is believed that the loaves were placed one upon the other in two piles, of six each; and that between every loaf there were two thin plates of gold, folded back in a semicircle, the whole length of them, to admit air, and to hinder the loaves from growing mouldy. These golden plates, thus turned in, were supported at their extremities by two golden forks which rested upon the ground.

But there is much difference of opinion among commentators as to the manner in which these loaves were placed upon the table.

It is more difficult, however, to ascertain the use of the shew-bread, or what it represented, than almost any other emblem in the Jewish economy. The learned Dr. Cudworth has the following remarks on the subject in his treatise on the Lord's supper: "When God had brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, resolving to manifest himself in a peculiar manner present among them, he thought good to dwell amongst them in a visible and external manner; and therefore, while they were in the wilderness, and sojourned in tents, he would have a tent or tabernacle built, to sojourn with them also. This mystery of the tabernacle was fully understood by the learned Nachmanides, who, in few words, but pregnant, expresseth himself to this purpose: 'The mystery of the tabernacle was this, that it was to be a place for the Shekinah, or habitation of Divinity, to be fixed in;' and this, no doubt, as a special type of God's future dwelling in Christ's human nature, which was the true Shekinah: but when the Jews were come into their land, and had there built them houses, God intended to have a fixed dwelling-house also; and, therefore, his movable tabernacle was to be turned into a standing temple. Now, the tabernacle or temple being thus as a house, for God to dwell in visibly, to make up the notion of dwelling or habitation complete, there must be all things suitable to a house belonging to it.—Calmet.

BREAK. To break with breach on breach, is to afflict with one sore trouble after another. Job 16: 14. The breaking of the heart denotes great inward grief and trouble, or a deep and kindly conviction of, and sorrow for, sin. Acts 2: 13. Luke 4: 18. Isa. 61: 1. To break up our fallow ground, is to study a deep conviction of sin and misery, and care to be reformed by means of God's word. Jer. 4: 3. Hos. 10: 12. The breaking of the day signifies the first appearance of the morning light, (Gen. 32: 25.) the first beginning of the gospel dispensation, and of the state of perfect and everlasting glory. Song 2: 17. Breaking of bread signifies the giving and receiving of the Lord's supper. Acts 2: 42, and 20: 7.—Brown.

BREATHE; to draw natural breath; to live. Josh.

10: 40, and 11: 11. God's breathing imports his powerful and easy formation of man's soul in him. Gen. 2: 7. Christ's breathing on his disciples figured his inspiring them with the noted gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost. John 20: 22. The Spirit's breathing on the dry bones imports his giving zeal, courage, and hope, to the captive Jews at Babylon, his giving spiritual life and activity to his elect, and his quickening the bodies of saints at the last day. Ezek. 37: 9. The saints breathing towards God is prayer, whereby our spiritual life is maintained and manifested, and our weakness and pressure discovered. Lam. 3: 56. Wicked men breathe out slaughter and cruelty; heartily hate their neighbors, chiefly the saints, and take pleasure to threaten and destroy them. Acts 9: 1. Ps. 27: 12.—Brown.

BREAST, bosom. The females in the East are more anxiously desirous than those of northern climates, of a full and swelling breast: in fact, they study embonpoint of appearance, to a degree uncommon among ourselves; and what in the temperate regions of Europe might be called an elegant slenderness of shape, they consider as a meagre appearance of starvation. They indulge these notions to excess. It is necessary to premise this, before we can enter thoroughly into the spirit of the language in Cant. 8: 10.—Calmet.

BREAST-PLATE, MILITARY. (See ARMOR.)

BREAST-PLATE, a piece of embroidery about ten inches square, (Exod. 28: 15) of very rich work, which the high-priest wore on his breast. It was made of two pieces of the same rich embroidered stuff of which the ephod was made, having a front and a lining, and forming a kind of purse, or bag, in which, according to the rabbins, the Urim and Thummim was inclosed. The front of it was set with twelve precious stones, on each of which was engraved the name of one of the tribes. They were placed in four rows, and divided from each other by the little golden squares or partitions in which they were set, according to the following order:

The names given to the stones here are not free from doubt, for we are very imperfectly acquainted with their natural science. The breast-plate was fastened as the four corners; those on the top to each shoulder, by a golden hook, or ring, at the end of a wreathed chain: those below, to the girdle of the ephod, by two strings or ribands, which also had two rings and hooks. This ornament was never to be severed from the priestly garments; and it was called "the memorial," being designed to remind the priest how dear those tribes should be to him, whose names he bore upon his heart. It was also named the "breast-plate of judgment," probably, because by it was discovered the judgment and the will of God; or, because the high-priest who wore it was the fountain of justice, and put on this ornament when he exercised his judicial capacity in matters of great consequence, which concerned the whole nation. Compare URIM and THUMMIM.—Calmet.

BRETHREN, THE TWELVE. (See MARROWMEN.)
BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT; an appellation assumed by a sect which sprung up towards the close of the thirteenth century, and gained many adherents in Italy, France, and Germany. They took their denomination from the words of St. Paul, (Rom. 8: 2, 14.) and maintained that the true children of God were invested with perfect freedom from the jurisdiction of the law. They held that all things flowed by emanation from God; that rational souls were portions of the Deity; that the universe was God; and that by the power of contemplation they were united to the Deity, and acquired hereby a glorious and sublime liberty, both from the sinful lusts and the common instincts of nature, with a variety of other enthusiastic notions. Many edicts were published against them; but they continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century.—Hend. Buck.

BRETHREN AND CLERKS OF THE COMMON LIFE; a denomination assumed by a religious fraternity towards the end of the fifteenth century. They lived under the rule of St. Augustine, and were said to be eminently useful in promoting the cause of religion and learning.—Hend. Buck.

BRETHREN, WHITE, were the followers of a priest from the Alps, about the beginning of the fifteenth century. They and their leader were arrayed in white garments. Their leader carried about a cross like a standard. His apparent sanctity and devotion drew together a number of followers. This deluded enthusiast practised many acts of mortification and penance, and endeavored to persuade the Europeans to renew the holy war. Boniface IX. ordered him to be apprehended, and committed to the flames; upon which his followers dispersed.—Hend. Buck.

BRETHREN, UNITED. (See MORAVIANS.)

BREVIARY; a daily office, or book of divine service, in the Romish church. It is composed of matins, lauds, first, third, sixth, and ninth vespers; and the compline or post-communio: i. e. of seven different hours, on account of that saying of David: "Seven times a day will I praise thee;" whence some authors call the breviary by the name of hora canonica—canonical hours.

The breviary of Rome is general, and may be used in all places: but on the model of this have been built various others, appropriated to each diocese, and each order of religious; the most eminent of which are those of the Benedictines, Bernardines, Carthusians, Carmelites, Dominicans, and Jesuits; that of Cluni, of the church of Lyons, in Spain, of Milan, and the Mozarabic breviary used

The breviary of the Greeks, which they call by the name of horologion, is the same in almost all the churches and monasteries that follow the Greek rites. The Greeks divide the Psalter into twenty parts, called kathismata (sedilia) seats, because they are a kind of pauses or rests. In general, the Greek breviary consists of two parts; the one containing the office for the evening, called mesonichta; the other that of the morning, divided into matins, lauds, first, third, sixth, and ninth vespers, and the compline.

The institution of the breviary not being very ancient, there have been inserted in it the lives of the saints, full of ridiculous and ill-attested stories, which gave occasion to several reformations of it by several councils, particularly those of Trent and Cologne; by several popes, particularly Pius V., Clement VIII., and Urban VII.; as also by several cardinals and bishops; each lopping off some extravagances, and bringing it nearer to the simplicity of the primitive offices.

Originally every person was obliged to recite the breviary every day; but by degrees, the obligation was reduced to the clergy only, who are enjoined, under pain of mortal sin and ecclesiastical censures, to recite it at home when they cannot attend in public.

BREWSTER, (WILLIAM;) one of the first settlers of Plymouth colony, and a ruling elder of the church, was born in England in the year 1560, and was educated at the university of Cambridge, where his mind was impressed with religious truth, and he was renewed by the Spirit of God.

His attention was now chiefly occupied by the interests of religion. His life was exemplary, and it seemed to be his great object to promote the highest good of those around him. He endeavored to excite their zeal for holiness, and to encourage them in the practice of the Christian virtues. As he possessed considerable property, he readily and abundantly contributed towards the support of the gospel. He exerted himself to procure faithful preachers for the parishes in the neighborhood. By degrees, he became disgusted with the impositions of the prelatical party, and their severity towards men of a moderate and peaceable disposition. As he discovered much corruption in the constitution, forms, ceremonies, and discipline of the established church, he thought it his duty to withdraw from its communion, and to establish with others a separate society. This new church, under the pastoral care of the aged Mr. Clifton and Mr. Robinson, met on the Lord's days at Mr. Brewster's house, where they were entertained at his expense, as long as they could assemble without interruption. When at length the resentment of the hierarchy obliged them to seek refuge in a foreign country, he was the most forward to assist in the removal. He was seized with Mr. Bradford in the attempt to go over to Holland in 1607, and was imprisoned at Boston, in Lincolnshire. He was the greatest sufferer of the company, because he had the most property. Having with much difficulty and expense obtained his liberty, he first assisted the poor of the society in their embarkation, and then followed them to Holland.

Such was his reputation in the church at Leyden, that he was chosen a ruling elder, and he accompanied the members of it, who came to New England in 1620. He suffered with them all the hardships, attending their settlement in the wilderness. He partook with them of labor, hunger, and watching; and his Bible and his sword were equally familiar to him. As the church at Plymouth was for several years destitute of a minister, Mr. Brewster, who was venerable for his character and years, frequently officiated as a preacher, though he could never be persuaded to administer the sacraments.

Through his whole life he was remarkably temperate. He drank nothing but water, until within the last five or six years. During the famine, which was experienced in the colony, he was resigned and cheerful. When nothing but oysters and clams were set on his table, he would give thanks, that his family were permitted "to suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand." He was social and pleasant in conversation, of a humble and modest spirit; yet, when occasion required, courageous in administering reproof, though with such tenderness, as usually to give no offence. He was conspicuous for his compassion towards the distressed; and if they were suffering for conscience sake, he judged them, of all others, most deserving of pity and relief. He had a peculiar abhorrence of pride. In the government of the church, he was careful to preserve order and the purity of doctrine and communion, and to suppress contention. He was eminent for piety. In his public prayers he was full and comprehensive, making confession of sin with deep humility, and supplicating with fervor the divine mercy through the merits of Jesus Christ. Yet he avoided a tedious prolixity, lest he should damp the spirit of devotion. In his discourses, he was clear and distinguishing, as well as pathetic; and it pleased God to give him uncommon success, so that many were converted by his ministry. At his death he left what was called an excellent library. It was valued at forty-three pounds in silver, and a catalogue of the books is preserved in the colony records.—Belknap's Amer. Biog. ii. 252—256; Collect. Hist. Soc. iv. 108, 113—117; Morton, 153; Neal's N. E. i. 231; Savage's Winthrop, i. 91; Magnalia, i. 14; Prince, 89.

BRIDAINE, JAMES, a French ecclesiastic, born near Uzès, in 1701, was celebrated for his eloquence, and for his indefatigable zeal in travelling to almost every part of France to preach. In the course of his life, he undertook two hundred and fifty-six journeys through the kingdom, and there was scarcely a village where he did not display his powers. His Spiritual Songs have gone through forty-seven editions. He died in 1767.—Davenport.

BRIDE; a new-married female. In the typical language of Scripture, the love of the Redeemer to the church is energetically alluded to in the expression, "the bride, the Lamb's wife," Rev. 21: 9. See MARRIAGE, and SOLOMON'S SONG.—Calmet.

BRIDEGROOM. See MARRIAGE, and CANTICLES.

BRIDGETINS, or BRIGITINS; an order denominated from St. Bridgit, or Birgit, a Swedish lady, in the fourteenth century. Their rule is nearly that of Augustine. The Brigitins profess great mortification, poverty, and self-denial; and they are not to possess anything they can call their own—not so much as a halfpenny; nor even to touch money on any account. This order spread much through Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands. In England we read of but one monastery of Brigitins, and this built by Henry V. in 1415, opposite to Richmond, now called Sion house; the ancient inhabitants of which, since the dissolution, are settled at Lisbon.—Henderson's Buck.

BRIDLE. Instead of it, a cord drawn through the nose, was sometimes used for leading and commanding camels, mules, &c. The restraints of God's powerful providence are called his bridle and hook. The bridle in the jaws of the people causing them to err, is God's suffering the Assyrians to be directed by their foolish counsels, that they might never finish their intended purpose against Jerusalem. Isa. 37: 29, and 30: 28. The restraints of law, humanity, and modesty are called a bridle: and to let it loose is to act without regard to any of these. Job 30: 11. Blood coming to the horse-bridles, implies the terrible slaughter of the antichristians at the battle of Armageddon, or about that time. Rev. 14: 20.—Brown.

BRIEFS, APOSTOLICAL, are letters which the pope despatches to princes and other magistrates concerning any public affair.—Henderson's Buck.

BRIER. See THORN.

BRIMSTONE, nappavit. Gen. 19: 24. Deut. 29: 23. Job 18: 15. Psal. 11: 6. Isa. 30: 33. 34: 9. Ezek. 38: 22. It is rendered theion by the Septuagint, and is so called in Luke 17: 29. Fire and brimstone are represented in many passages of Scripture as the elements by which God punishes the wicked, both in this life, and another. There is in this a manifest allusion to the overthrow of the cities of the plain of the Jordan, by showers of ignited sulphur, to which the physical appearances of the country bear witness to this day. The soil is bituminous, and might be raised by eruptions into the air, and then inflamed and return in horrid showers of overwhelming fire. This awful catastrophe, therefore, stands as a type of the final and eternal punishment of the wicked in another world. In Job 18: 15, Bildad, describing the calamities which overtake the wicked person, says, "Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation." This may be a general expression, to designate any great destruction: as that in Psal. 11: 6, "Upon the wicked he shall rain fire and brimstone." Moses, among other calamities which he sets forth in case of the people's disobedience, threatens them with the fall of brimstone, salt, and burning like the overthrow of Sodom, &c., Deut. 29: 23. The prophet Isaiah, 34: 9, writes that the anger of the Lord shall be shown by the streams of the land being turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone. See DEAD SEA.—Watson.

BROAD. God is a place of broad rivers to his people; his fulness can never be exhausted; in him they obtain the most delightful pleasure and prospect, and the surest defence; and he is sufficiently capable to destroy and overwhelm all that seek their hurt. Isa. 32: 22. His law is exceeding broad; it extends to every person and circumstance, requires innumerable things to be done, and as many to be hated and avoided. Ps. 119: 96. He sets persons in a broad place, when he gives them great liberty, wealth, power, and prosperity. Job 36: 16. Ps. 18: 19. The way to hell is broad; multitudes of men walk in it, and by sinful courses unnumbered, they get thither at last. Matt. 7: 13.—Brown.

BROCK, (JOHN,) minister of Reading, Massachusetts, was born in England, in 1620, and was distinguished for early piety. He came to this country about the year 1637. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1646, and, after residing there two years longer, engaged in preaching the Gospel, first at Rowley, and then at the isle of Shoals. He continued at this last place till 1662, when he removed to Reading, as successor of Samuel Hough; being ordained November 13, 1662. Here he ministered in holy things till his death, June 18, 1688, aged sixty-seven. He was succeeded by Mr. Pierpont. His wife was the widow of Mr. Hough.

Mr. Brock was an eminent Christian, and a laborious, faithful minister, preaching not only on the Sabbath, but frequently on other days. He established lectures for young persons, and for the members of the church. He often made pastoral visits, and they were rendered very useful by his happy talents in conversation. He was so remarkable for boldness and devotion, that it was said of him by the celebrated Mitchell, "he dwells as near heaven, as any man upon earth." He was full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. Several remarkable stories are related of the efficacy of his prayers, in which he frequently had a particular faith, or an assurance of being heard. When he lived at the isle of Shoals, he persuaded the people to enter into an agreement to spend one day in every month, besides the Sabbaths, in religious worship. On one of these days, the fishermen, who composed his society, desired him to put off the meeting, as the roughness of the weather had for a number of days prevented them from attending to their usual employment. He endeavored in vain to convince them of the impropriety of their request. As most of them were determined to seize the opportunity for making up their lost time, and were more interested in their worldly than in their spiritual concerns, he addressed them thus: "If you are resolved to neglect your duty to God, and will go away, I say unto you, Catch fish if you can; but as for you, who will tarry and worship the Lord Jesus Christ, I will pray unto him for you, that you may catch fish until you are weary." Of thirty-five men, only five remained with the minister. The thirty who went from the meeting, with all their skill, caught through the whole day but four fishes; while the five who attended divine service, afterwards went out and caught five hundred. From this time, the fishermen readily attended all the meetings which Mr. Brock appointed. A poor man, who had been very useful with his boat, in carrying persons who attended public worship over a river, lost his boat in a storm, and lamented his loss to his minister. Mr. Brock said to him, "Go home, honest man; I will mention the matter to the Lord: you will have your boat again to-morrow." The next day, in earnest prayer, the poor man recovered his boat, which was brought up from the bottom by the anchor of a vessel, cast upon it without design. A number of such remarkable correspondences between the events of providence and the prayers of Mr. Brock, caused Mr. John Allen, of Dedham, to say of him, "I scarce ever knew any man so familiar with the great God, as his dear servant Brock."—Mather's Magnalia, iv. 141—143; Coll. Hist. Soc. vii. 251—254; Stone's Fun. Sermon on Prentiss; Fitch's Sermon at the Ordination of Tucke; & Allen.

BRODERED; wrought with various colors of needlework. Exod. 28: 4. Brodered hair is that which is plaited, and put up on crimping pins. 1 Pet. 3: 9.—Brown.

BROMFIELD, (EDWARD,) a young man of uncommon genius, was born in Boston, in 1723. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1742. He lived but a short time to display his virtues and his talents, for he died, August 18, 1746, aged twenty-three years. From his childhood he was very amiable and modest. As he grew up, the powers of his mind were unfolded, and he discovered remarkable ingenuity and penetration, which were strengthened and increased as he became acquainted with mathematical science. His genius first appeared in the use of the pen, by which with admirable exactness he sketched the objects of nature. He made himself so familiar with Weston's short hand, that he was able to take down every word of the professors' lectures at the college, and the sermons which were delivered from the pulpit. He was skillful in projecting maps. As he was well skilled in music, he for exercise and recreation made with his own hands an excellent organ, with two rows of keys and several hundred pipes. The workmanship exceeded anything of the kind which had been imported from England. He took peculiar pleasure in pursuits which related to natural philosophy, for he wished to behold the wisdom of God in his works. He made great improvement in the microscopes which were then used, most accurately grinding the finest glasses, and multiplying the powers of optical instruments. He met with no mechanism which he did not readily improve. But these were only the amusements of Mr. Bromfield. He was engaged in the pursuits of higher and more interesting objects, than those which had reference only to the earth, and could occupy the mind but a few days. Though from childhood he possessed the virtues which endeared him to his acquaintance, yet it was not before he reached the age of seventeen, that he was converted by the influence of the Divine Spirit from his natural state of selfishness and iniquity, to the supreme love of his Maker. From this period, the truths of revelation claimed his intense study, and it was his constant aim to conform his life to the requisitions of the gospel. Nothing interested him so much, as the character of Jesus Christ and the wonders of redemption, which he hoped would excite his admiration in the future world, and constitute his everlasting blessedness. He left behind him a number of manuscripts, which contained his pious meditations, and marked his progress towards perfection. Though his body was feeble, his whole soul was indefatigable. In his eyes there was an expression of intellect, which could not be mistaken. Had his life been spared, his name might have been an honor to his country, and philosophy might have been dignified by a connexion with genuine religion.—Prince's Acc. of Bromfield; Panoplist, ii. 193—197; Allen.

BROOK, is distinguished from a river by its flowing only at particular times; for example, after great rains, or the melting of the snow; whereas a river flows constantly at all seasons. However, this distinction is not always observed in the Scripture; and one is not unfrequently taken for the other.—The great rivers, such as the Euphrates, the Nile, the Jordan, and others, being called brooks. Thus the Euphrates (Isa. 15: 7) is called the brook of willows. It is observed that the Hebrew word, nahal, which signifies a brook, is also the term for a valley, whence the one is often placed for the other, in different translations of the Scriptures. To deal deceitfully "as a brook," and to "pass away as the stream thereof," is to deceive our friend when he most needs and expects our help and comfort, (Job 6: 15;) because brooks, being temporary streams, are dried up in the heats of summer, when the traveller most needs a supply of water on his journey.—Watson.

BROOKE, (LADY ELIZABETH,) daughter of Thomas Culpeper, Esq., of Wigsale, in Sussex, was born at that place, in the month of January, 1601. In infancy she was deprived, by death, of the counsels and advice, assistance and prayers of her mother; but her godmother, Lady Slaney, superintended her early education with great care and kindness. At the age of nineteen, she was married to Sir Robert Brooke, whose fortune was respectable, and whose character was virtuous. In very early life, this lady devoted herself to God and religion, and maintained an unexceptionable character, until she exchanged the trials of earth for the joys of heaven. By many eminent men, she was considered to be one of the most intelligent females. Her knowledge of divinity and the holy Scriptures was very considerable; nor was that knowledge merely practical; it was doctrinal and critical. Though comparatively unacquainted with the Greek and Hebrew tongues, yet her chaplains used often to say, that her conversation was frequently more profitable and pleasant than their own studies; and that whilst they were teaching, they were being instructed. Her investigation of sacred subjects was profound. With the surface of knowledge she was not content. On difficulties she consulted all the learned men with whom she was acquainted; and, by the astonishing rapidity of her reading, and the retentive powers of her mind, she accumulated daily some increase to her stock of knowledge. She was very industrious to preserve all that affected or instructed her in the sermons which she heard; attending to them when delivered, repeating them in her family, writing down the substance of them, and digesting them into questions and answers, or under heads of common places. To the management and regulation of her family, she did not, however, forget to attend. Of their spiritual interests she was habitually regardful; and, not contented with a personal devotion to God, she was anxious that her house also should serve the Lord. In her breast, bigotry and intolerance never found an abode. All the servants of Jesus Christ, of whatever sect or party, she loved as fellow pilgrims and fellow heirs. Her charity was unbounded, and her generosity was very great. Her mind was habitually devotional; and in prayer, reading the Scriptures, and pious meditations, she spent the greater part of her life. Of her it has been justly said—"She had the knowledge of a divine, the faith, boldness, and zeal of a Christian, the wisdom of the serpent, and the innocence of the dove." For further account of this interesting woman, see Burder's Memoirs of Pious Women.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BROOKS, (ELEAZAR,) an American brigadier-general, was born in Concord, Massachusetts, in 1726. Without the advantages of education, he acquired a valuable fund of knowledge. It was his practice in early life to read the most approved books, and then to converse with the most intelligent men respecting them. In 1774, he was chosen a representative to the general court, and continued thirty-seven years in public life, being successively a representative, a member of the senate, and of the council. He took a decided part in the American revolution. At the head of a regiment he was engaged in the battle at White Plains, in 1776, and distinguished himself by his cool, determined bravery. From the year 1801, he secluded himself in the tranquil scenes of domestic life. He died at Lincoln, November 9, 1806, aged eighty years. General Brooks possessed an uncommonly strong and penetrating mind, and his judgment as a statesman was treated with respect. He was diligent and industrious, slow in concerting, but expeditious in performing his plans. He was a firm believer in the doctrines of Christianity, and in his advanced years accepted the office of deacon in the church at Lincoln. This office he ranked above all others which he had sustained in life.—Stearns's Fun. Serm.; Columb. Cent. Nov. 22, 1806; Allen.

BROOKS, (JOHN, LL. D.) governor of Massachusetts, was born at Medford, in 1752. His father was captain Caleb Brooks, a farmer; and his early years were spent in the toils of a farm, with no advantages of education but those of a town school. He was afterwards equally distinguished as a physician, a soldier, and a statesman. In the battle of Saratoga, October 7, at the head of his regiment, he stormed and carried the intrenchments of the German troops. In the battle of Monmouth, he was acting adjutant-general. When the conspiracy at Newburgh, in March, 1783, had well nigh disgraced the army, Washington rode up to Brooks, and requested him to keep his officers within quarters to prevent their attending the insurgent meeting; the reply was, "Sir, I have anticipated your wishes, and my orders are given." With tears in his eyes, Washington took him by the hand and said, "Colonel Brooks, this is just what I expected from you."

From the army, Brooks returned to private life, free from the vices incident to soldiership, rich in honor, esteem, and affection, but without property, and without the means of providing for his family, except by resuming his practice of medicine. By Washington he was appointed marshal of the district and inspector of the revenue; in the war of 1812, he was appointed adjutant-general of Massachusetts by governor Strong, whom he succeeded as chief magistrate, in 1816. For seven years successively he was re-elected; and with great dignity and faithfulness he presided over the affairs of the commonwealth. In 1823, he retired to private life, being succeeded by William Eustis. He died, March 1, 1825, aged seventy-two years.

Governor Brooks held a high rank as a physician. He was scientific and skilful. His manners were dignified, courteous, and benign; and his kind offices were doubled in value by the manner in which he performed them. In the office of chief magistrate, he labored incessantly for the public good. His addresses to the legislature manifested large and liberal views. No one could doubt his integrity and devoted patriotism. He was the governor of the people; not of a party. In his native town, of which he was the pride, the citizens were accustomed to refer their disputes to his arbitrement, so that lawyers could not thrive in Medford. In private life he was most amiable and highly esteemed, the protector and friend of his numerous relatives, and the delight of all his acquaintance. The sweetness of his temper was evinced by the composure and complacency of his countenance. Towards the close of his life, he connected himself with the church in Medford under the pastoral care of Dr. Osgood. A short time before he died, he said, "I see nothing terrible in death. In looking to the future, I have no fears. I know in whom I have believed; and I feel a persuasion, that all the trials appointed me, past or present, will result in my future and eternal happiness. I look back upon my past life with humility. I am sensible of many imperfections that cleave to me. I know, that the present is neither the season nor the place, in which to begin the preparation for death. Our whole life is given us for this great object, and the work of preparation should be early commenced, and be never relaxed till the end of our days. To God I can appeal, that it has been my humble endeavor to serve him in sincerity; and wherein I have failed, I trust in his grace to forgive. I now rest my soul on the mercy of my adorable Creator, through the only mediation of his Son, our Lord. Oh, what a ground of hope is there in that saying of an apostle, that God is, in Christ, reconciling a guilty world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them? In God I have placed my eternal ALL, and into his hands I commit my spirit!" To the Medical society he bequeathed his library. Besides his valuable official communications as chief magistrate, he published a discourse before the Humane society, 1795; discourse on Pneumonia, before the Medical society, 1808.—Thacher's Med. Biog. 197—207; Dixwell's Memoir; Columb. Centinel, May 18, 1825; Allen.

BROTHER. 1. A brother by the same mother, an uterine brother, Matt. 4: 21. 20: 20. 2. A brother, though not by the same mother, Matt. 1: 2. 3. A near kinsman, a cousin, Matt. 13: 55. Mark 6: 3. Observe, that in Matt. 13: 55, James, and Joseph, and Judas, are called the adelphoi, brethren, of Christ, but were most probably only his cousins by his mother's side; for James and Joseph were the sons of Mary, Matt. 27: 56; and James and Judas, the sons of Alphaeus, Luke 6: 15, 16; which Alphaeus is therefore probably the same with Cleophas, the husband of Mary, sister to our Lord's mother, John 19: 25.—Watson.

BROUGHTON, (THOMAS,) a learned divine and literary character, was born in London, in 1704, studied at Eton and Cambridge, and died, vicar of Bedminster, St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, and a prebendary of Salisbury, in 1774. He was one of the principal contributors to the Biographia Britannica, and also wrote several works, among which is a Dictionary of all Religions, two volumes, folio. See HANNAH ADAMS.—Davenport.

BROWN, (JOHN,) of Haddington, a celebrated, though self-educated Scotch divine, was born, in 1722, at Kerpo, in Perthshire, became a minister and divinity professor, and died in 1787. He was a man of eminent piety, and great usefulness. His principal works are, a Body of Divinity, one volume, octavo; the Self-Interpreting Bible, two volumes, quarto; and a Dictionary of the Bible, two volumes, octavo, often referred to in this work.—Davenport.

BROWN, (CHADN,) minister of the first Baptist church, Providence, Rhode Island. He fled thither from persecution in Massachusetts, in 1636, and became, in 1639, one of the members of the Baptist church formed at that time by Roger Williams, when William Wickenden was appointed first elder. With him Mr. Brown was associated in the pastoral care of the church in 1642, and was a devoted and successful minister. He died about 1665; and his colleague in 1669. In 1792, the town of Providence voted to erect a monument to his memory. His descendants, for nearly two centuries, have been among the most distinguished citizens of Rhode Island. His grandson, James Brown, was a minister of the same church; and four of the grandsons of James have been patrons of Brown university;—Nicholas; Joseph, LL. D. who died December, 1785; John, an eminent merchant, who died, September 20, 1803, aged sixty-seven; and Moses. Probably also Elisha was a grandson, who was lieutenant-governor, and died in April, 1862, aged eighty-five.—Coll. Hist. Soc. s. s. ix. 197.—Benedict, i. 477; Allen.

BROWN, (NICHOLAS,) an eminent merchant of Rhode Island, died at Providence, May 29, 1791, aged sixty-one. From early youth his attention had been directed to mercantile pursuits, and by the divine blessing upon his diligence and uprightness he acquired a very ample fortune. But although he was rich, he did not make an idol of his wealth. His heart was liberal, and he listened to every call of humanity or science. The interests of government, of learning, of religion, were dear to him. He loved his country, and rejoiced in her freedom. The public buildings in Providence, sacred to religion and science, are monuments of his liberality. He was an early and constant patron of the college. In his religious principles he was a Baptist, and he was a lover of good men of all denominations. He was not ashamed of the Gospel, nor of the poorest of the true disciples of the Redeemer. His general knowledge and the fruitfulness of his invention furnished him with an inexhaustible fund of entertaining conversation.—Stillman's Fun. Serm.; Providence Gaz.; Allen.

BROWN, (CHARLES BROCKDEN,) a distinguished American writer, was born in Philadelphia, January 17, 1771. After a classical education under Robert Prono, author of the History of Pennsylvania, he was, at the age of eighteen, apprenticed to a lawyer, Alexander Wilcox; but his time was chiefly employed, not in the study of the law, but in various literary pursuits. Timidity and an invincible dislike to the legal profession prevented him from becoming a member of the bar. He devoted himself entirely to literature, and in six years, from 1798 to 1804, published six novels of an original and powerful character. At this period his opinions were unsettled and sceptical; but soon after, he declared himself a firm believer and advocate of Christianity. He now abandoned novel writing, and devoted his powers to more serious and useful pursuits; and his character seems to have undergone a perceptible and pleasing change. He had previously conducted a periodical work, in 1799 and 1800, the Monthly Magazine and American Review; and in 1805, he commenced the Literary Magazine and American Register, avowedly on new principles. He also wrote three political pamphlets. In 1806, he commenced the semi-annual American Register, five volumes of which he lived to publish. He died, Feb. 22, 1810, at the age of thirty-nine.—N. A. Review, June, 1819; Enc. Amer.; Allen; Memoir prefixed to his Works.

BROWN, (FRANCIS, D. D.) president of Dartmouth college, was born at Chester, New Hampshire, January 11, 1784, and graduated, in 1805, at Dartmouth, where he was a tutor from 1806 to 1809. In January, 1810, he was ordained the minister of North Yarmouth, Maine, as the successor of Tristram Gilman, whose daughter he married. Of Bowdoin college he was an overseer and trustee. In 1815, he was appointed president of Dartmouth college. He died of the consumption, July 27, 1820, aged thirty-six. His predecessor was Dr. Wheelock; his successor Dr. Dana. "His talents and learning, amiableness and piety, eminently qualified him for the several stations which he filled, and rendered him highly useful and popular." He published several sermons, among which are the following: at the ordination of Allen Greely, 1810; at a fast on account of the war, 1812; on the evils of war, 1814; before the Maine Missionary society, 1814.—Lord's Lempr.; Allen.

BROWN, (CATHERINE,) a Cherokee, was born about the year 1800, at a place, now called Wills-Valley, in a beautiful plain of tall forest trees, within the chartered limits of Alabama, a few miles west of the Georgia line, and twen-ry-five miles south-east of the Tennessee river. On each side of the valley rose the Raccoon and Lookout mountains. Her parents were half-breeds; they were ignorant of the English language; and the amount of their religion was, that there was a Creator of the world, and also a future state of rewards and punishments.

In 1801, the Moravians commenced a mission at Spring-place in the Cherokee country, about forty or fifty miles east of Wills-Valley; soon afterwards, Rev. Gideon Blackburn made efforts for several years to establish a school among the Cherokees. In 1816, Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, employed by the American board for foreign missions, appeared at a Cherokee council and obtained permission to establish schools. He selected, as the place for the first school, Chickamaugh, now called Brainerd, twenty or thirty miles north of Spring-place, within the limits of Tennessee. Catharine heard of this school, and, though living at a distance of a hundred miles, she became a member of it, in July, 1817, being then seventeen years of age. In three months she learned to read and write. In December, 1817, she cherished the hope, that she had experienced the power of the gospel in her heart. She was baptized, January 25, 1818, and admitted as a member of the church, March 29. In June, 1820, she undertook to teach a school at Creek path, near her father's. For sweetness of temper, meekness, and gentleness, she was unsurpassed. To her parents she was very dutiful and affectionate. A weekly prayer meeting was instituted by her; and she was zealous to instruct her ignorant neighbors in the great truths of the gospel. She formed the purpose of perfecting her education, that her usefulness might be increased. But in the spring of 1823, her health declined, she had a settled consumption, and it became evident that her death was near. She said,—“I feel perfectly resigned to the will of God. I know he will do right with his children. I thank God, that I am entirely in his hands. I feel willing to live, or die, as he thinks best. My only wish is, that he may be glorified.” Having been conveyed about fifty miles, to the house of her friend, Dr. Campbell, she there died, July 18, 1823, aged twenty-three. Let any scoffer at missions contemplate this lovely child of the wilderness, won from the gloom of paganism to the joyous, lofty hopes of Christianity, and triumphing over the king of terrors, and then say, if he can, that the missionary enterprise is idle, and useless, and a waste of money. An interesting memoir of Catharine Brown was compiled by Rufus Anderson, assistant secretary of the American board for foreign missions, and published in 1825.—Anderson's Memoir; Allen.

BROWN, (DAVID,) a Cherokee, was a brother of the preceding, who followed her to the school at Brainerd. In November, 1819, he assisted John Arch in preparing a Cherokee spelling-book, which was printed. At the school, he became convinced of his sinfulness, and embraced the salvation offered in the gospel. Soon after he was admitted to the church, he set out for New England, to attend the foreign mission school at Cornwall, Connecticut, that he might be prepared to preach the gospel. His visits to Boston and other towns had a favorable effect in exciting a missionary zeal. After passing two years at the school, with Elias Boudinot and six other Cherokees, he remained a year at Andover, enjoying many advantages for improvement. In the mean time, his brother, John, had become a convert and made a profession, and died in peace. His parents also, and other members of his family, became pious. He returned to them in 1824, having first delivered, in many of the principal cities and towns, an address on the wrongs, claims, and prospects of the American Indians. In the spring of 1829, he was taken ill, and bled at the lungs. He wrote, June 1st, “On the bed of sickness I have enjoyed sweet communion with my Savior.” He died at Creek-path, September 14, 1829, at the house of Rev. Mr. Potter, giving evidence that he died in the faith of the gospel.—Anderson; Miss. Her.; Allen.

BROWN, (DR. THOMAS,) a man eminent as a metaphysician, moral philosopher, and poet, was born at Kirknabreck, in Scotland, in 1777, and displayed an early acuteness and thirst for knowledge. His first education was received in the vicinity of London, and was completed at the university of Edinburgh. At the age of twenty, he wrote a masterly answer to Darwin's Zoonomia. In 1810, he succeeded

Mr. Stewart, at Edinburgh, as professor of moral philosophy, and soon gained universal admiration as a lecturer, by his eloquence and talents, and affection by his kindness to the students. Dr. Brown was a professed believer in Christianity; and though he too seldom adverts to the Bible in his philosophical lectures, yet his system of metaphysics and morals approaches nearer to the simplicity and purity of the sacred volume, than that of many professed expounders of it. He has thrown more light on the essential distinction of the mind and the body, and on the mental emotions and associations, than perhaps any preceding writer. His brilliant career was unfortunately cut short, by consumption, on the 2d of April, 1820. As an analytical philosopher, his reputation is established by his inquiry into the Relation of Cause and Effect; Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind; and Physiology of the Mind: as a poet, by his poems, in two volumes; Agnes; the Wanderer of Norway; and the Paradise of Coquettes.—Davenport.

BROWNE, (GEORGE, D. D.) archbishop of Dublin. The birthplace of this eminent prelate is uncertain, nor have we any precise account of his parents. But he was the first prelate who embraced the reformation in Ireland. He received the principal part of his education at Hallywell, in Oxford, but was originally a friar of the order of St. Augustine. In 1534, he took the degree of doctor in divinity in some foreign university, but was admitted to the same honor at Oxford and Cambridge. Henry the Eighth became attached to him, for inculcating into the minds of the people of England, the necessity of discarding the doctrine of the invocation of saints, and for enforcing on them the necessity of applying alone to Christ for salvation. To him, that king, in the year 1535, presented the archbishopric of Dublin. In May, 1536, Browne made so admirable a speech on the subject of a bill that was at that time depending, for establishing the king's supremacy over the church of Ireland, that in consequence thereof, the act, with much difficulty, passed. At the time when Henry the Eighth ordered the monasteries in England and Ireland to be destroyed, archbishop Browne immediately ordered, that every vestige of superstitious relics, of which there were many in the two cathedrals of St. Patrick and the Holy Trinity in Dublin, should be removed. Not contented with this direction, he caused the same to be done in the other churches of his diocese, and supplied their places with the creed, the ten commandments, and the Lord's prayer. In 1545, a command having been issued, that the liturgy of king Edward the Sixth should be compiled, it was violently opposed, and only by Browne's party received. Accordingly, on Easter day following, it was read in Christ church, Dublin, in the presence of the mayor and the bailiffs of that city; when the archbishop delivered a judicious, learned, and able sermon against keeping the Bible in the Latin tongue, and the worship of images. In October, 1551, the title of primate of all Ireland was conferred on Browne; which the malignant and persecuting Mary soon deprived him of, on account of his zeal in the reformation. Archbishop Browne died in the year 1556. As to his character, he was a man of considerable natural parts, great industry, and indefatigable application. To truth he was a sincere friend, and would often declare, that he would rather sacrifice his life than resign his principles. None of his works are extant, except his “Sermon on the Liturgy.” See Wood's Hist. and Antiq. Univ. Oxon.; Life and Death of George Browne, Esq.; Cox's Hist. of Ireland; Sir James Warr's Works.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BROWNE, (SIR THOMAS,) a physician and eminent writer, was born in London, in 1605, and educated at Winchester and Oxford. He took his degree at Leyden, and settled at Norwich, where he gained extensive practice. His Religio Medici having been surreptitiously published, he gave to the world a correct edition in 1642, which was soon translated into several languages, and repeatedly reprinted. It was attacked by many writers, some of whom, with equal absurdity and injustice, accused the author of being an infidel, and even an atheist. This work was followed by his celebrated Treatise on Vulgar Errors; and Hydirotaphia, or a Treatise on Urn Burial, published together with the Garden of Cyrus. He died in 1682. Browne was a man of great benevolence, and of extensive erudition. His style is singular and pedantic, but has generally strength, and often felicity of expression.—His son Edward, who was born about 1642, and died in 1708, was president of the College of Physicians, and is the author of an Account, in two volumes quarto, of his own Travels in Austria, Hungary, Thessaly, and Italy.—Davenport.

BROWNE, (SHAMON,) was born at Shepton Mallet, in 1680, and became a dissenting minister, first at Portsmouth, and next in the Old Jewry, in which latter situation he remained till 1723, when his reason was shaken by the loss of his wife and his only son. The monomania which afflicted him was of an extraordinary kind. Though retaining the power of reasoning acutely, he believed that God "had annihilated in him the thinking substance," and that though he seemed to speak rationally, he had "no more notion of what he said than a parrot." Imagining himself no longer a moral agent, he refused to bear a part in any act of worship. While in this state, however, he continued to write forcibly, and, among other things, produced a Defence of the Religion of Nature, and the Christian Revelation, against Tindall's Christianity as old as the Creation. To this he prefixed a dedication to queen Caroline, in which he affectingly expatiated on his soulless state. His friends suppressed this melancholy proof of his singular insanity; but it is preserved in the Adventurer. He died in 1732. He is the author of hymns, sermons, and various controversial and theological pieces.—Davenport.

BROWNISTS; a sect that arose among the Puritans towards the close of the sixteenth century; so named from their leader, Robert Brown. He was educated at Cambridge, and was a man of good parts and some learning. He began to inveigh openly against the ceremonies of the church, at Norwich, in 1580; but, being much opposed by the bishops, he, with his congregation, left England, and settled at Middleburgh, in Zealand, where they obtained leave to worship God in their own way, and form a church according to their own model. They soon, however, began to differ among themselves, so that Brown, growing weary of his office, returned to England in 1589, renounced his principles of separation, and was preferred to the rectory of a church in Northamptonshire. He died in prison in 1639. The revolt of Brown was attended with the dissolution of the church at Middleburgh; but the seeds of Brownism which he had sown in England were so far from being destroyed, that Sir Walter Raleigh, in a speech in 1592, computes no less than twenty thousand of this sect.

The articles of their faith seem to be nearly the same as those of the church of England. The occasion of their separation was not therefore any fault they found with the faith, but only with the discipline and form of government of the churches in England. They equally charged corruption on the Episcopal and Presbyterian forms; nor would they join with any other reformed church, because they were not assured of the sanctity and regeneration of the members that composed it. They condemned the solemn celebration of marriages in the church, maintaining that matrimony, being a political contract, the confirmation thereof ought to come from the civil magistrate; an opinion in which they are not singular. They would not allow the children of such as were not members of the church to be baptized. They rejected all forms of prayer, and held that the Lord's prayer was not to be recited as a prayer, being only given for a rule or model whereon all our prayers are to be formed. Their form of church government was nearly as follows:—When a church was to be gathered, such as desired to be members of it made a confession of their faith in the presence of each other, and signed a covenant, by which they obliged themselves to walk together in the order of the gospel. The whole power of admitting and excluding members, with the decision of all controversies, was lodged in the brotherhood. Their church officers were chosen from among themselves, and separated to their several offices by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands. But they did not allow the priesthood to be any distinct order. As the vote of the brethren made a man a minister, so the same power could discharge him from his office, and reduce him to a mere layman again; and as they maintained the bounds of a church to be no greater than what could meet together in one place, and join in one communion, so the power of these officers was prescribed within the same limits. The minister of one church could not administer the Lord's supper to another, nor baptize the children of any but those of his own society. Any lay-brother was allowed the liberty of giving a word of exhortation to the people; and it was usual for some of them, after sermon, to ask questions, and reason upon the doctrines that had been preached. In a word, every church on their model is a body corporate, having full power to do every thing in itself, without being accountable to any class, synod, convocation, or other jurisdiction whatever. The reader will judge how near the Independent churches are allied to this form of government. See INDEPENDENTS.

The laws were executed with great severity on the Brownists; their books were prohibited by queen Elizabeth; their persons imprisoned, and some hanged. Brown himself declared on his death-bed that he had been in thirty-two different prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. They were so much persecuted, that they resolved at last to quit the country. Accordingly many retired and settled at Amsterdam, where they formed a church, and chose Mr. Johnson their pastor, and after him Mr. Ainsworth, author of the learned Commentary on the Pentateuch. Their church flourished near a hundred years. Among the Brownists, too, were the famous John Robinson, a part of whose congregation from Leyden, in Holland, made the first permanent settlement in North America; and the laborious Canne, the author of the marginal references to the Bible.—Hend. Buck.

BRUCKER, (JOHN JAMES,) a learned Lutheran clergyman, was born at Augsburg, in 1696, and died minister of St. Ulric's, in his native city, in 1770. Of his works, the most valuable and the best known is the History of Philosophy, in six volumes quarto, of which Dr. Enfield published an English abridgment. Brucker was nearly fifty years employed on it; and it displays a degree of erudition, judgment, and impartiality, which is highly honorable to its author.—Davenport.

BRUEN, (MATTHIAS,) a distinguished minister in New York, was born at Newark, New Jersey, April 11, 1793. He dated his renovation of mind by the divine Spirit at the age of eighteen. After graduating at Columbia college, in 1812, he studied theology with Dr. Mason. In 1816, he travelled in Europe with his distinguished preceptor. About the beginning of 1819, being invited to preach in the American chapel of the oratory at Paris, he was ordained in London, and then passed six months at Paris. In 1822, he was employed as a missionary in the city of New York, but refused to receive any compensation. During his labors, he collected the Bleecker street congregation. Of this people he became the stated pastor, and continued such till his death, by inflammation of the bowels, September 6, 1829, aged thirty-six years.

Mr. Bruen engaged earnestly in various benevolent institutions. He was agent and corresponding secretary of the Domestic Missionary Society; and when it was changed into the American Home Missionary Society, he still assisted by his counsels. Bible, Sunday school, tract, and foreign mission societies engaged his efforts; and in the Greek cause he cheerfully co-operated. He was accomplished in manners, in literature, and in the knowledge of mankind. Though he had high and honorable feelings, abhorring every thing mean, yet he had humble views of his own acquisitions, intellectual and moral. All his distinctions he laid at his Master's feet. In the last week of his life, he suffered extreme pain. It was a sudden summons to depart; yet was he calm and resigned. "I die," said he, "in peace and love with all men." Thus, after embracing his wife and two babes, and most impressively addressing his relatives, he fell asleep in Jesus. He published a sermon at Paris on the death of a lady of New York; and Sketches of Italy.—Cox's and Skinner's Serms.; Home Miss. Mag.; East. Record. Nov. 11, 1829; Allen.

BRUISE. The bruise of a soul implies doubts, fears, anguish, inward trouble on account of the prevalence of sin, God's wrath, &c. Matt. 12: 40. 2. God bruised Christ, in inflicting on his soul and body the fearful punishment due to our sin. Isa. 53: 5. 3. Satan bruises Christ's heel, in harassing his humble manhood, and afflicting his members on earth. Gen. 3: 15. Rom. 16: 20. 4. Christ bruises Satan's head, when he crushes his designs, despoils him of his power, triumphs over him on the cross, or in the conquest of his chosen; and when he enables his people to oppose, conquer, and tread his temptations under foot.—The king of Egypt is called a bruised reed, to mark the weak and broken state of his kingdom, and his utter inability to help such as depended on him. 2 Kings 18: 21. Weak saints and their feeble graces, are bruised, or bruised reeds, which Christ will not break; they are trodden down and afflicted by Satan, by false teachers, by the world, by their own lusts, and are in a pained and disjointed case, unable to oppose their spiritual enemies; but Jesus will protect, heal, comfort, and deliver them. Isa. 42: 3. Luke 4: 18.—Brown.

BRULIUS, (PETER), one of the reformers of the sixteenth century. He succeeded Calvin as pastor of the church in Strasburg, on the Rhine, and was much beloved by the people, who were edified by his valuable ministry. There prevailed at this time throughout the Netherlands the most earnest desire to be instructed in the reformed religion; so that in places where the truth was not or dared not to be preached, private invitations were sent to the ministers who resided in towns where the pure gospel was preached openly. Some people in Tournay invited Brulius from Strasburg. Ready to every good word and work, this excellent man complied with their request, and came to Tournay, September, 1544, where he was joyfully received by the friends who invited him. After staying some time, he made an excursion to Lisle, in Flanders, for the same object, and returned to Tournay in October. But the governors of the city, being papist, having heard of his arrival, shut the gates and made strict search for him; so that his friends were obliged to let him over the wall by a rope. Unhappily, on his reaching the ground, a stone fell on him, by which his leg was broken, and his enemies seized him. He was put in prison, and notwithstanding the efforts of the senate of Strasburg, he was put to death, being burned in a slow fire, February 19, 1545, to the grief of all good men.

Brulius in prison and at the stake behaved nobly; nothing could shake his faith, or triumph over his firmness. Among other things, he assured his papal judges "that he neither knew or cared for any other purgatory, than the blood of Christ, which alone remits both the guilt and punishment of sin." The day before he suffered, he wrote to his wife, informing her what he was to undergo, and exhorting her to be satisfied with the consolations of God, concluding that she ought not to grieve on his account, but to rejoice, since this whole dispensation was an honor that his heavenly Father had conferred on him; that Jesus Christ had suffered infinitely more for him; and that the servant's condition ought not to be better than his Lord's. What an admirable comment on the omnipotence of divine grace in the soul!—Middleten.

BRUNTON, (MARY), the daughter of colonel Balfour, was born in Barra island, one of the Orkneys, in 1776, married a minister of the Scotch church in 1796, and died in 1818, equally admired for her talents and beloved for her disposition and virtues. She is the author of Discipline and of Self-Control, two excellent novels; and she left an unfinished tale called Emeline, and some minor pieces, which her husband published.—Davenport.

BRUIS, (PETER DE); a distinguished reformer and martyr of the twelfth century. Mosheim says, after speaking of the Catharists, "A much more rational sect was that which was founded about the year 1110, in Languedoc and Provence by Peter de Bruys, (or Bruis,) who made the most laudable attempts to reform the abuses, and to remove the superstitions that disfigured the beautiful simplicity of the Gospel." During a laborious ministry of about twenty years, he engaged a great number of followers, who were called after him Petrobrussians, or from the principal place of their residence, Vaudois, Valdenses, or Waldenses. Probably he was, strictly speaking, not the founder of the sect, for that people claim a far higher antiquity, but was one of their most distinguished preachers or barbs. This last is, in fact, the Waldensian account of him. To him is ascribed that admirable treatise on Antichrist, an extract from which may be found under the word ANTI-CHRIST, in this volume. De Bruis was burned at St. Giles, in 1130, by an enraged populace, instigated by the clergy, "whose traffic," says Mosheim, "was in danger from the enterprising spirit of this reformer." If we may judge from the above treatise, his piety, judgment, courage, talents, knowledge of the Scriptures, spiritual understanding of the true gospel, zeal, and eloquence, were of a very high order, and would not suffer by comparison with any of the reformers of the sixteenth century; nor will any one who knows how Dr. Mosheim applies the term, think the worse of him, but the higher, for what he calls his "mixture of fanaticism." Happy had it been for the Protestant churches, had such a "mixture" existed in the later reformers, as would have broken the adulterous alliance of church and state, and given to those fettered churches the primitive purity and freedom which De Bruis intrepidly asserted in life and in death. As, among other things, he taught "that no persons are to be baptized before they had the full use of their reason," he is justly claimed by the modern Baptists, as belonging to their fraternity.—Mosheim; Ivimey.

BRYANT, (JACOB), a philologist and antiquary, was born at Plymouth, in 1715, and received his education at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. The duke of Marlborough, to whom he had been tutor, gave him a place in the ordnance department. He settled at Cypenham, in Berkshire, and died Nov. 4, 1804, of a mortification in the leg, occasioned by bruising the skin against a chair. Bryant was an indefatigable and a learned writer, but fond of paradox. He wrote one work to maintain the authenticity of the pseudo Rowley's poems, and another to prove that Troy never existed. His principal production is a New System or Analysis of Ancient Mythology, in three volumes quarto, which was published in 1774 and 1776. It is ingenious and erudite, but often fanciful and erroneous. Among his other compositions are, Observations relative to Ancient History; a Treatise on the Authenticity of the Scriptures; Observations on the Plagues of Egypt; and Dissertations on the Prophecy of Balaam, &c.—Davenport.

BUCER, (MARTIN), was born in 1491, at Scholestadt, a town of Alsace. At the age of seven, he took the religious habit of the order of St. Dominic, and, with the leave of the prior of his convent, went to Hiedelberg to learn logic and philosophy. Having, after this applied himself to the study of divinity, he made it his endeavor to acquire a thorough knowledge of both Greek and Hebrew. About this time, some of the writings of Erasmus came abroad, and Bucer read them with avidity. Soon after, he got possession of several tracts of Luther's, and, comparing the tenets of that reformer with the Scriptures, to which the latter appealed, he began to entertain doubts concerning several points of the religion in which he had been educated. His uncommon learning, and his eloquence, the latter of which was assisted by a strong and musical voice, together with his free censure of the vices of the times, recommended him to Frederic, the elector palatine, who made him one of his chaplains. In 1521, he passed some time with Luther, at Hiedelberg, and discussed many points of doctrine with the great champion of the Reformation; the result of which was, his adopting most of his religious opinions, particularly his doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works. This change in his doctrinal sentiments naturally enlisted him on the side of the reformer, and he proved an efficient coadjutor to him. Some time after this, falling in with the writings of Zuinglius, who differed from Luther on some points of minor importance, particularly with regard to the eucharist, Bucer, after mature consideration, was induced to give the preference to the sentiments of Zuinglius, and sided with him; though he used his utmost endeavors to unite the two parties, both of whom opposed the popish religion.

Bucer is regarded as one of the first authors of the Reformation, at Strasburg, where he taught theology for twenty years, being one of the ministers of the town. He assisted at most of the conferences that were held between the Catholics and the Reformed; and, in 1548, was sent for to Augsburg, to sign that agreement between the two parties which was called the Interim. It did not, however, meet his approbation, and his warm opposition to it exposed him to many difficulties and hardships, the news of which reaching England, where his character stood high, Cranmer, then archbishop of Canterbury, invited him over, which he readily accepted.

In 1549, a handsome apartment was assigned him in the university of Cambridge, and a salary appointed him as a teacher of theology. King Edward the Sixth entertained the highest respect for him; and, on being told that he suffered much from the cold of the climate, sent him a hundred crowns to purchase a German stove. He, nevertheless, survived only two years; for in 1551, he died of a complication of disorders, and was buried at Cambridge with great funeral pomp. Five years after, in the reign of queen Mary, his body was dug up, and publicly burned, and his tomb demolished; but it was afterwards set up again, by order of queen Elizabeth. His character is thus given by bishop Burnet: "Martin Bucer was a very learned, judicious, pious, and moderate person. He was, probably, inferior to none of the reformers in point of learning; but for zeal, for true piety, and a most tender care for preserving unity among the foreign churches, Melancthon and he, without disparaging the rest, may be ranked apart by themselves. He was much opposed by the popish party at Cambridge; who, though they complied with the law, and so kept their places, yet, either in the way of argument, or, as if it had been for dispute sake, set themselves much to disparage him. Nor was he furnished, naturally, with the quickness that is necessary for a disputant, from which they studied to draw advantages; and, therefore, Peter Martyr advised him to avoid all public disputations." His writings were partly in Latin, and partly in German, and exceedingly numerous.—Jones's Christ. Biog.

BUCHANAN, (GEORGE) one of the boasts of Scottish literature, was born, in 1506, at Killairn, in Dumbartonshire, and, after having pursued his studies at Paris and St. Andrew's, and served for a while in the army, he was appointed tutor to the earl of Cassilis, with whom he remained in France during five years. Returning from Paris with the earl, he was made tutor to the natural son of James V. Two satires which he wrote on the monks soon drew down their vengeance upon him, and he was imprisoned, but was fortunate enough to escape. Once more visiting the continent, he successively taught at Paris, at Bordeaux, and at Coimbra, at which latter city the freedom of his opinions again caused his imprisonment. He next spent four years at Paris, as tutor to the marshal de Brislac's son. During this continental residence, he composed his Baptistes and Jepthes, translated the Medea and Alcestes of Euripides, and began his Latin version of the Psalms. In 1560, he returned to his native land and embraced Protestantism. Yet he had the favor of the court, obtained a pension from Mary, was made principal of St.

Leonard's college, at St. Andrews, and was chosen as preceptor to James VI. When subsequently reproached with having made his royal pupil a pedant, Buchanan is said to have replied, that "it was the best he could make of him." Buchanan died poor, in 1582. As an historian, he is elegant and vigorous, but partial and deficient in judgment; as a man, he was unamiable; as a politician, he was too inscrupulous and violent; as a Latin poet, he ranks among the highest of the moderns, especially for his version of the Psalms.—Davenport.

BUCHANAN, (CLAUDIUS) vice-provost of the college of Fort William, in Bengal, was born at Cambuslang, near Glasgow, on March the 12th, 1766. His father, Mr. Alexander Buchanan, was a man of respectable learning, and of excellent character, and was highly esteemed in various parts of Scotland, as a laborious and faithful teacher. His mother, the daughter of Mr. Claudius Somers, was a woman of great piety and superior understanding. By his parents, Buchanan was early trained in religious principles and habits; and the future usefulness of this very excellent man may probably, in some degree, be traced to his early impressions. At the age of seven, Buchanan was sent to the grammar school of Inverary, in Argyleshire, of which his father was master; and under his tuition the son made considerable progress in the knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues. Until the age of thirteen, he continued at Inverary, and in the following year was appointed tutor to the two sons of Mr. Campbell of Dunstanage. For two years he continued in that situation, and evinced much knowledge and information, and a capacity to teach, which in one so young could scarcely be expected. At this time he was under considerable impressions of a religious nature, and frequently spent an hour in devotion amidst the rocks on the sea-shore: but his serious thoughts were dissipated by gay society. In 1787, he went to London. He here attended on the ministry of the pious Mr. Newton, to whom he applied by letter for advice; and, by desire of Mr. Newton, had an interview with him. In him he found an enlightened and experienced guide, a wise and faithful counsellor, and a steady and affectionate friend. Mr. Buchanan, after his conversion, felt a strong desire to become a minister of the gospel, and communicated his wish to Mr. Newton. That desire the good man cherished, introduced him to a philanthropic individual, (Mr. Thornton,) and by his advice and prayers assisted in fitting him for his future duties and trials. Mr. Thornton determined on sending him, at his expense, to the university of Cambridge; and in Michaelmas term, 1791, he was admitted a member of Queen's college. Mr. Buchanan took his degree of bachelor of arts before he left college, and received the unanimous approbation of the professors. On the 20th of September, 1795, he was ordained a deacon at Fulham, by the late bishop Porteus; and in March, 1796, was appointed a chaplain in the East India Company's service.

British India is under great obligations to Mr. Buchanan, for various and important services rendered by him; but, for his zeal, and energy, and perseverance, which, in spite of opposition, he continued to manifest for the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the vernacular tongues of India, the obligations are incalculable. Bigotry, short-sighted and interested, opposed this effort of Christian apostolic zeal; but that opposition was eventually compelled to cede to the force of truth; and in the year 1804, the first version of any of the gospels in Persian and Hindostanee, which were printed in India, issued from the press of the college of Fort William, of which, in 1801, he had been appointed vice-provost and professor of classics, by the marquis of Wellesley. He was also much engaged, at this time, in the institution of a civil fund for widows and orphans. Mr. Buchanan now wrote his celebrated "Memoir of the Expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment for British India," which was extensively read, and generally approved. Early in the year 1806, Mr. Buchanan drew up proposals for a subscription for translating the Holy Scriptures into fifteen oriental languages; and, in consequence of his exertions in their distribution, the college of Fort William, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Glasgow, supported or contributed to the cause. In the month of May in this year, Mr. Buchanan departed from Calcutta on a journey to the coast of Malabar. He visited Jellalore, Cuttack, Juggernaut, Visagapatam, Madras, Pondicherry, Tranquebar, Tanjore, Madura, Ceylon, Travancore, the Syrian churches of Malayala, Cochin; and returned from thence by sea, in March, 1807, to Calcutta.

The knowledge which he attained by that journey was immense, and was only equalled by the fatigues he endured, the privations to which he submitted, and the scenes of superstition and ignorant idolatry which he witnessed. The journey was one of more than five thousand miles. Lord Minto was now appointed to the government of India. Mr. Buchanan thought that some of the measures he had taken were unfavorable to religion, and therefore, in November, 1807, presented his celebrated "Memorial," complaining, 1st, Of the withdrawing the patronage of government from translations of the Holy Scriptures. 2d, Of the suppression of such translations. 3d, Of improper conduct to the venerable missionary Swartz. 4th, Of restraining the Protestant missionaries from the exercise of those functions, and establishing an imprimatur for theological works. To this memorial the Bengal government did not attend; and he therefore transmitted a copy to the East India directors, in England. Buchanan now determined on again visiting the coast of Malabar, and proceeding to Europe; he then preached an affecting and important farewell sermon, and on the 27th of November, 1807, sailed from Calcutta, and visited Ceylon, Cochin, Tellicherry, Goa, and Bombay. At the latter of these places, he promoted, by his exertions and pecuniary assistance, the publication of the gospels into the Malayaline language; and, on the 14th of March, 1808, he sailed from Point de Galle to England. In the month of August, 1808, he arrived in England, and visited Scotland and Bristol; and, at the latter place, on February 26th, 1809, he preached his celebrated sermon for the Church of England Missionary Society, entitled "The Star in the East." He afterwards visited Oxford and Cambridge; presented oriental manuscripts to the latter university, and received, from that university, the degree of doctor in divinity. For some time he was then engaged to preach at Welbeck chapel, London, where he labored with great advantage; and in November, 1809, was married to the daughter of Henry Thompson, Esq. of Kirby Hall, Yorkshire. He afterwards retired to that county; undertook the charge of the parish of Ouseburn; and labored, in season, and out of season, for the salvation of his parishioners. On the 12th of June, he preached the annual sermon before the Church Missionary Society. On the 1st of July, he preached two commencement sermons before the university of Cambridge, for which he received the thanks of many eminent men, and prepared them, at the request of the university, for publication. Those sermons were published with his celebrated "Christian Researches in Asia." Of the latter work, no praise can be excessive. In 1811, Buchanan was again greatly indisposed by a paralytic attack. He proposed, however, to visit Palestine, and announced his determination. In the month of May he visited Buxton, and preached a sermon, which he afterwards published, on "The Healing Waters of Bethesda." In the autumn, he again visited Scotland, and returned through Ireland; but, on his journey, he once more experienced a severe paralytic affection. Notwithstanding the shock, his mind was unimpaired; and he published, in the Christian Observer, in 1812, "A Defence of the Syrian Christians from the Charges of some Danish Missionaries in India;" and continued his exertions, to supply the Syrian Christians with a translation of the Scriptures. In 1812, he once more directed his attention to the organization of a more extensive ecclesiastical establishment for British India. The time approached for the renewal of the charter of the East India Company; and the friends of religion, in England, availed themselves of it, for the purpose of obtaining from the company the recognition of more liberal principles; and Buchanan prepared, for the consideration of the English government, a sketch of an ecclesiastical establishment for British India. During the concluding period of the life of Dr. Buchanan, he was actively engaged in the proceedings in parliament, on the subject of promoting Christianity in India. He published a work, entitled

"Colonial Ecclesiastical Establishment;" and another, "Apology for promoting Christianity in India." The result of his efforts was highly serviceable to the cause of Christianity in India; and the house of commons determined to adopt a line of proceeding, which all wise and good men desired. He finally settled at Broxbourne, in Hertfordshire, for the purpose of superintending a new edition of the Syriac New Testament. The health of Dr. Buchanan now gradually declined; yet he continued his exertions for the cause of God and truth, till, on February the 9th, 1815, after a paralytic seizure, and an illness of a few days, his labors terminated in death. He was interred at Little Ouseburn, in Yorkshire; and over his tomb was placed a plain but expressive monumental inscription. See his Life, written by the Rev. Hugh Pearson, M. A. of St. John's college, Oxford.—Jones' Christ. Biog.

BUCHANITES; a sect of enthusiasts who sprang up at Irvine, in the west of Scotland, about the year 1763. Mr. White, the minister of a relief congregation in that town, having been invited to preach in the neighborhood of Glasgow, a female named Elizabeth Buchan, the wife of a painter, was captivated with his eloquence, and, writing to him, announced that he was the first that had spoken to her heart, and requested permission to pay him a visit at Irvine, that the work of her conversion might be perfected. On her arrival, she was joyfully received by the members of the congregation; engaged without intermission in religious exercises; went from house to house; conducted family worship; answered questions, resolved doubts, explained the Scriptures, and testified that the end of the world was at hand, and that it was the duty of every Christian to abandon the concerns of time, and prepare for the reception of Christ. Mr. White, favoring her and her views, was complained of to the presbytery, by which he was deposed from his ministry. Thus a distinct party was formed, the meetings of which were commonly held at night, and on these occasions the new prophetess indulged in her reveries, styling herself the woman of the twelfth of Revelations, and Mr. White her first-born. Such gross outrage on the common sense of the inhabitants occasioned a popular tumult, to save her from whose fury the magistrate sent her under escort to some distance; after which, with her clerical friend and about forty deluded followers, she wandered up and down the country, singing, and avowing that they were travellers for the New Jerusalem, and the expectants of the immediate coming of Christ. They had a common fund on which they lived, and did not consider it necessary to work, as they believed God would not suffer them to want. Mrs. Buchan died in 1792, and the sect soon after broke up.—Henderson's Buck.

BUCKMINSTER, (JOSEPH, D. D.,) minister of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was born October 14, 1751. Being the delight and hope of his parents, they were desirous that he should become a minister of the gospel. He was graduated at Yale college in 1770, and from 1774 to 1778, was tutor in that seminary. At this period he became temporarily attached to a lady, then of reputation and celebrity, whose character is the basis of one of the productions of Mrs. Foster. He was ordained over the north church in Portsmouth, January 27, 1779, as successor of Dr. Langdon, after whose death Dr. Stiles had supplied the pulpit one or two years. After a ministry of thirty-three years, he died, June 10, 1812.

Dr. Buckminster was an eminently pious man. He left an unsullied reputation, and was greatly beloved and deeply lamented. His mind had been well cultivated. A brilliant imagination, his most distinguishing faculty, gave a richness to his style. He had a heart of sensibility. His voice, strong and musical, expressed the various emotions of his soul. His attitude and gestures were unaffected and impressive, while his countenance itself was eloquent. But his popularity as a preacher is to be ascribed also to the boldness and the energy, with which he proclaimed the great and all-important truths of the gospel. In his preaching, he dwelt much on the iniquity of the human heart, on the character and value of the atonement by the crucified Son of God, and on the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, of faith and repentance, and the holiness, without which there is no admission into heaven. In his own opinion, he began to preach before he was truly a servant of God; and afterwards he ceased to preach for a time, in the persuasion that his motives were selfish and unworthy. But after a long period of distress, light broke in upon his mind. A few years after his settlement, on the anniversary of his ordination, he wrote as follows:—"Blush, O my soul, and be ashamed, that thou hast felt no more of thy own worth, and the worth of thy fellow immortals, the infinite love and compassion of God, thy dear Redeemer, and the excellency of the gospel. Shall God call me, who have been so great and aggravated an offender, to the high and honorable office of publishing the glad tidings of salvation, and of an ambassador for him, to woo and beseech men to be reconciled to him; and shall I be lukewarm and indifferent?" But notwithstanding the talents, the piety, the faithfulness, and the fervent zeal of Dr. Buckminster, no very remarkable effects attended his preaching; showing, that, after all the skilful and diligent toil of the planter, it is God only, who according to his sovereign pleasure giveth the increase. On account of his catholic disposition, Dr. Buckminster possessed the regard of other denominations of Christians besides his own. In the private relations of life, he was faithful, affectionate, and interesting.—Panoplist, viii. 105—111; Adams's Ann. of Portsm. 353—355; Parker's Fin. Serm.; Farmer's Coll. iii. 121; Allen.

BUCKMINSTER, (JOSEPH S.,) a celebrated minister of Boston, was the son of the preceding, and was born May 26, 1784. Under the cultivation of his devoted parents, his talents were early developed. At the age of four years, he began to study the Latin grammar; at the age of twelve, he was ready for admission into college. He graduated at Harvard with distinguished honor in 1800. The next four years were spent partly in the family of his relative, Theodore Lyman, of Waltham, partly as an assistant in the academy at Exeter, and in the prosecution of theological studies. In October, 1804, he began to preach at Brattle street, Boston, where he was ordained as the successor of Dr. Thacher, January 30, 1805. A severe illness immediately followed, which interrupted his labors until March. In the course of this year, the return of the epilepsy, which he had previously experienced, excited his apprehensions, that his mental faculties would be destroyed. He wrote in October—"The repetition of these fits must at length reduce me to idiocy. Can I resign myself to the loss of memory, and of that knowledge, I may have vainly prided myself upon? O God! enable me to bear this thought." A voyage to Europe being recommended, he sailed in May, 1806, and visited England, Holland, Switzerland, and France. In Paris he spent five months; and there, and in London, he collected a valuable library of nearly three thousand volumes. After his return in September, 1807, he was occupied in the ministry about five years, with occasional attacks of the epilepsy, till his death, caused by that disorder, June 9, 1812, aged twenty-eight years.

Mr. Buckminster was a very interesting and eloquent preacher. Though of scarcely the middle size, yet a fine countenance, combining sweetness and intelligence, appropriate and occasionally animated gestures, a brilliant imagination, and a style of winning elegance, caused his hearers to hang with delight upon his lips. Deeply interested in biblical criticism, he superintended the publication of Griesbach's New Testament, and in 1812 was appointed the first professor at Cambridge on the Dexter foundation. In his religious sentiments, as appears from the two volumes of his sermons, published since his death, he differed in some important respects from his father. His literary taste and associations appear to have unfortunately beguiled his noble mind from the simplicity of the gospel, and betrayed him into an indefinite and lax theology. Deeply as this is to be regretted, and radically defective as his sermons are in this respect, yet in others they cannot be read without admiration and profit by the evangelical believer. His views seem not to have sunk to the low standard of the Socinians, for he speaks of "the incarnation" of the Son of God, "the vicegerent of Jehovah," and he saw in his life a "wonderful contrast of powers—divine greatness and mortal debility, ignominy and glory, suffering and triumph, the servant of all and the Lord of all."—Memoir; Mass. Hist. Col. s. t. ii. 271 Christian Spectator, v. 145; Allen.

BUDHISM, or BOODHISM. This religion is spread over the Burman empire, Siam, Ceylon, Japan, Cochinchina, and the greater part of China Proper. It has been contended, that it was also the ancient religion of Hindostan itself, and that the prevailing orahminical superstitions were the invention of later times. It is indeed probable, that all the idolatrous systems of religion, which have ever existed in the world, have had a common origin, and have been modified by the different fancies and corruptions of different nations. The essence of idolatry is every where the same. It is every where "abominable" in its principles and its rites, and every where the cause of indescribable and manifold wretchedness.

It is asserted by Mr. Ward, that two of the six schools of philosophy which once flourished among the Hindoos, taught the same atheistical principles as the disciples of Boodh now maintain; and it is indisputable, that these two sects were numerous before the appearance of Boodh. This personage is said, in Burman books, to have been a son of the king of Benares, and to have been born about the year 600 before Christ. He is supposed to have adopted the atheistical system of these sects, and his principles were espoused and maintained by the successive monarchs of his family, who are charged by the brahmins with the crime of destroying their religion, and substituting atheism. At length, however, the brahmins obtained the ascendancy, and arming themselves with the civil power, they so effectually purified Hindostan from the offensive heresy, that scarcely a vestige of the Boodhist superstition is now to be traced in that country. It found a refuge in Ceylon, and neighboring regions; and the most learned Burmans assert, that it was introduced into that empire, about four hundred and fifty years after the death of Boodh, or (as he is more commonly called) Gaudama.

The Boodhists believe, that, like the Hindoo Vishnu, Boodh has had ten incarnations, which are described in the Jatus, amounting, it is said, to five hundred and fifty books. The following summary statement of the principles of Boodhism is copied from the valuable work of Mr. Ward on the History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindoos:

"The Boodhists do not believe in a First Cause; they consider matter as eternal; that every portion of animated existence has in itself its own rise, tendency and destiny; that the condition of creatures on earth is regulated by works of merit and demerit: that works of merit not only raise individuals to happiness, but as they prevail, raise the world itself to prosperity; while on the other hand, when vice is predominant, the world degenerates till the universe itself is dissolved. They suppose, however, that there is always some superior deity, who has attained to this elevation by religious merit; but they do not regard him as the governor of the world. To the present grand period, comprehending all the time included in a kalpa, they assign five deities, four of whom have already appeared, including Gaudama or Boodh, whose exaltation continues five thousand years, two thousand three hundred and fifty-six of which had expired A. D. 1814. After the expiration of the five thousand years, another saint will obtain the ascendancy, and be deified. Six hundred millions of saints are said to be canonized with each deity, though it is admitted that Boodh took only twenty-four thousand devotees to heaven with him.

"The lowest state of existence is in hell; the next, is that in the forms of brutes: both these are states of punishment. The next ascent is to that of man, which is probationary. The next includes many degrees of honor and happiness, up to demi-gods, &c. which are states of reward for works of merit. The ascent to superior deity is from the state of man.

"The Boodhists are taught, that there are four superior heavens, which are not destroyed at the end of a kalpa: that below these, there are twelve other heavens, followed by six inferior heavens; after which follows the earth, then the world of snakes, and then thirty-two chief hells; to which are to be added, one hundred and twenty hells of milder torments.

"The highest state of glory is absorption. The person who is unchangeable in his resolution, who has obtained a knowledge of things past, present, and to come, through one kulpu, who can make himself invisible, go where he pleases, and who has attained to complete abstraction, will enjoy absorption.

"The Hindoo idea of absorption is, that the soul is received into the divine essence; but as the Buddhists reject the doctrine of a separate Supreme Spirit, it is difficult to say what are their ideas of absorption. Dr. Buchanan says, (A. Researches, vol. vi. p. 180,) Nigban 'implies, (that is, among the Burmans,) exemption from all the miseries incident to humanity, but by no means annihilation.'

"Those who perform works of merit, are admitted to the heavens of the different gods, or are made kings or great men on earth; and those who are wicked, are born in the forms of different animals, or consigned to different hells. The happiness of these heavens is wholly sensual.

"The Buddhists believe, that at the end of a kulpu, the universe is destroyed. To convey some idea of the extent of this period, the illiterate Cingalese use this comparison; if a man were to ascend a mountain nine miles high, and to renew these journeys once in every hundred years, till the mountain were worn down by his feet to an atom, the time required to do this, would be nothing to the fourth part of a kulpu.

"Boodh, before his exaltation, taught his followers, that after his ascent, the remains of his body, his doctrine, or an assembly of his disciples, were to be held in equal reverence with himself. When a Cingalese, therefore, approaches an image of Boodh, he says, 'I take refuge in Boodh; I take refuge in his doctrine; I take refuge in his followers.'

"There are five commands delivered to the common Buddhists: the first forbids the destruction of animal life; the second forbids theft; the third, adultery; the fourth, falsehood; the fifth, the use of spirituous liquors. There are other commands for the superior classes, or devotees, which forbid dancing, songs, music, festivals, perfumes, elegant dresses, elevated seats, &c. Among works of the highest merit, one is the feeding of a hungry, infirm tiger with a person's own flesh.

"The temples erected in honor of Boodh, in the Burman empire, are of various sizes and forms, as quadrangular, pentagonal, hexagonal, heptagonal, or octagonal. Those of a round spiral form can be erected only by the king, or by persons high in office. An elevated spot is preferred for the erection of these edifices; but where such an elevation cannot be found, the building is erected upon the second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth terrace.

"When the author asked a Boodhist, why, since the object of their worship was neither creator nor preserver, they honored him as God, he was answered, that it was an act of homage to exalted merit.

"The priests worship at the temples daily, or ought to do so. The worship consists in presenting flowers, incense, rice, betel-nuts, &c., repeating certain prayers. The priest cleanses the temple, preserves the lights, and receives the offerings. A worshipper may present his own offerings, if he is acquainted with the formulas. The five commands are repeated by a priest twice a day to the people, who stand up and repeat them after him.

"Boodh, as seen in many temples, appears seated upon a throne placed on elephants, or encreased by a hydra, or in the habit of a king, accompanied by his attendants. In most of the modern images, however, he is represented in a sitting posture, with his legs folded, his right hand resting upon his right thigh, and his left upon his lap: a yellow cloth is cast over his left shoulder, which envelopes his right arm. His hair is generally in a curling state, like that of an African; his ears are long, as though distended by heavy ear-rings. The image is generally placed in the centre of the temple, under a small arch prepared for the purpose, or under a small porch of wood, neatly gilded. Images of celestial attendants, male and female, are frequently placed in front of the image.

"It appears evident from their writings, that the ancient religion of the Burmans consisted principally in religious austerities. When a person becomes initiated into the priesthood, he immediately renounces the secular state, lives on alms, and abstains from food after the sun has passed the meridian. The ancient writings of the Burmans mention an order of female priests; but it is likely that these were only female mendicants.

"Priests are forbidden to marry; they are to live by mendicity; are to possess only three garments, a begging dish, a girdle, a razor, a needle, and a cloth to strain the water which they drink, that they may not devour insects.

"The priests reside in houses which are built and offered to them as works of merit. There are numerous colleges, which are built in the style of a palace, by persons of wealth, and in which boys are taught.

"The priests are the school-masters, and teach gratuitously as a work of merit, the children being maintained at home by their parents. If a priest finds a pupil to be of quick parts, he persuades the parents to make him a priest; but if a boy wishes to embrace a secular life after he has been some time in the college, he is at liberty to do so.

"The Burman feasts are held at the full and change of the moon. At these times, all public business is suspended; and the people pay their homage to Gaudama, at the temples, presenting to the image rice, fruits, flowers, candles, &c. Aged people often fast during the whole day. Some visit the colleges, and hear the priests read portions of the Boodhist writings.

"According to the religion of Boodh, there are no distinctions of cast. The Burmans burn their dead with many ceremonies, especially the bodies of the priests." (Ward's View of the History, Literature and Religion of the Hindoos, vol. ii. pp. 387—393.)

The religion of Boodh, then, is, in effect, atheism; and the highest reward of piety, the object of earnest desire and unwearied pursuit, is annihilation. How wretched a system is this; how devoid of adequate motives to virtue; and how vacant of consolation! O how must every humane heart, and much more every Christian, desire, that the pure and glorious gospel may shed its light upon this gross darkness.—Knolly's Memoir of Mrs. Judson.

BUDSO; a form of idolatrous worship, introduced into Japan, from China and Siam. Its author is supposed to have been Budha, whom the Indian brahmins conceive to be their god Vishnu, who, they say, made his ninth appearance in the world, under the form of a man so named.—Williams.

BUDNEANS; a sect in Poland, who disclaimed the worship of Christ, and ran into many wild hypotheses. Budæus, the founder, was publicly excommunicated in 1584, with all his disciples; but afterwards he was admitted to the communion of the Socinians.—Henderson's Buck.

BUELL, (SAMUEL, D. D.) an eminent Presbyterian minister on Long island, was born at Coventry, in Connecticut, September 1, 1716. In the seventeenth year of his age, it pleased his merciful Father in heaven to renew his heart, and teach him those truths which are necessary to salvation. He was graduated at Yale college in 1741. While in this seminary, his application to his studies was intense, and his proficiency was such as rewarded his toils. It was here that he first became acquainted with David Brainerd, with whom he was very intimate till death separated them. Their friendship was the union of hearts, attached to the same Redeemer, having the same exalted views, and animated by the same spirit.

It was his intention to spend a number of years with Mr. Edwards, of Northampton, in theological studies; but the extensive revival of religion at this period rendering the zealous preaching of the truth peculiarly important, he immediately commenced those benevolent labors, which occupied and delighted him through the remainder of his life. After being licensed, he preached about two years in different parts of New England; and such was the pathos and energy of his manner, that almost every assembly was melted into tears. In November, 1743, he was ordained as an itinerant preacher, in which capacity he was indefatigable and very successful. He was the instrument of doing much good, of impressing the thoughtless, of reforming the vicious, and of imparting to the selfish and worldly the genuine principles of benevolence and godliness. Carrying with him testimonials from respectable ministers, he was admitted into many pulpits, from which other itinerants were excluded. While he disapproved of the imprudence of some in those days, when religious truth was brought home remarkably to the heart, he no less reprehended the unreasonable opposition of others to the work of God. During this period, his health was much impaired, and a severe fit of sickness brought him to the very entrance of the grave; but it pleased God, who holds the lives of all in his hand, to restore his health and prolong his usefulness for many years.

He was led to East Hampton, on Long island, by a direction of Providence in some respects extraordinary, and was installed pastor of the church in that place, Sept. 19, 1746. For a number of the first years of his ministry, he seemed to labor without effect. His people paid but little attention to the concerns of religion. But in 1764, he witnessed an astonishing change. Almost every individual in the town was deeply impressed, and the interests of eternity received that attention, which their transcendent importance demands. He had the happiness at one time of admitting into his church ninety-nine persons, who, he believed, had been renewed, and enlightened with correct views of the gospel, and inspired with benevolent principles of conduct. In the years 1785 and 1791, also, he was favored, through the influence of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of his hearers, with great success. After a life of eminent usefulness he died, July 19, 1798, aged eighty-one.

Dr. Buell presents a remarkable instance of disinterested exertion for the good of others. He was an example of all the Christian virtues. He was attached to literature and science, and was the father and patron of Clinton academy, in East Hampton. His house was the mansion of hospitality. Possessing a large fund of instructive and entertaining anecdote, his company was pleasing to persons of every age. In no respect was he more distinguished, than for a spirit of devotion. In his last hours, his mind was in perfect peace. He had no desire to remain any longer absent from his Savior. He observed, as the hour of his departure approached, that he felt all his earthly connections to be dissolved. The world, into which he was just entering, absorbed all his thoughts; so that he was unwilling to suffer any interruption of his most cheering contemplations from the last attention of his friends. While they were endeavoring to prolong the dying flame, he would put them aside with one hand, while the other was raised towards heaven, where his eyes and soul were fixed. In this happy state of mind he expired.

He published a narrative of the revival of religion among his people in 1764, and fourteen occasional discourses, which evince the vigor of his mind and the ardor of his piety.—Con. Evan. Mag. ii. 147—151, 179—182; Daggett's Fun. Serm.; Allen.

BUFFER, (CLAUDE), a jesuit, was born in Poland, of French parents, in 1661, and studied at the college of Rouen, where he afterwards held the situation of theological professor. He died in 1737. Buffier was employed in the Memoires de Trevoux, and likewise produced a great number of theological, metaphysical, biographical, and geographical works. Several of them were collected in a folio volume, with the title of a Course of Sciences on new and simple Principles. Though sometimes superficial, he is, on the whole, an elegant and instructive writer.—Davenport.

BUGENHAGIUS, (JOHN), one of the reformers of the sixteenth century, distinguished not more for his talents than for his meekness and humility, was born at Julia, in Pomerania, in 1485. His education was liberal, and his proficiency so great that at the age of twenty he opened a school at Treptow, which he taught with great reputation. Here he received so much light from Erasmus' Lucubrations, that he began to lecture publicly on the Scriptures. He was soon called from his school to the church, and his preaching was attended by multitudes of all ranks. Prince Bogislaus also employed him in writing a history of Pomerania. In 1520, Luther's book on the "Babylonish Captivity" was put into his hands. Having looked over a few leaves, as he sat at dinner with his colleagues, he said, "there never was a more pestilent heretic than the author of that book." But a few days after, having read it with great diligence and attention, his mind was changed, and he made this recantation before them all: "What shall I say of Luther? All the world hath been blind and in Cimmerian darkness; only this one man has found out the truth." It was not long before most of his colleagues were led to form a similar judgment. The new views of Bugenhagen respecting the law and gospel, justification by faith, &c. being publicly preached with great success, the Catholic bishop was enraged, and stirred up a persecution. Upon this, Bugenhagen went to Wittemburg, and formed a personal acquaintance with Luther, in 1521. Here he was soon chosen pastor of the church, in which he labored with much inward happiness through many changes of affairs for thirty years; never leaving the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made him overseer, neither because of the dangers of war or of pestilence; preferring the very homely fare among the people where God had made him useful, to the proffered riches and preferment, both of his own prince and of the king of Denmark. He assisted Luther in his translation of the Bible. He also assisted greatly in reforming the churches in Brunswick, Hildesheim, and Denmark; and finished his devoted and useful life, by a peaceful death, April 20, 1558, in the seventy-third year of his age.—Middleton's Evan. Biog.

BUILD. Besides the proper and literal signification of this word, it is used with reference to children and a numerous posterity. Sarah desires Abraham to take Hagar to wife, that by her she may be builded up, that is, have children to uphold her family. Gen. 16: 2. The midwives who refused obedience to Pharaoh's orders, when he commanded them to put to death all the male children of the Hebrews, were rewarded for it; God built them houses, that is, he gave them a numerous posterity. The prophet Nathan tells David that God would build his house; that is, give him children and successors. 2 Sam. 7: 27. Moses, speaking of the formation of the first woman, says, God built her with the rib of Adam. Gen. 2: 22.—Watson.

BUL; the eighth month of the ecclesiastical year of the Jews, and the second month of the civil year. It answers to October, and consists of twenty-nine days. On the sixth day of this month the Jews fasted, because on that day Nebuchadnezzar put to death the children of Zedekiah in the presence of their unhappy father, whose eyes, after they had been witnesses of this sad spectacle, he ordered to be put out. 2 Kings 25: 7. We find the name of this month mentioned in Scripture but once. 1 Kings 6: 38.—Watson.

BULKLEY, (PETER), first minister of Concord, Massachusetts, was born at Woodhill in Bedfordshire, England, January 31, 1553. He was educated at St. John's, in Cambridge, and was fellow of the college. He had a gentleman's estate left him by his father, Dr. Edward Bulkley, of Woodhill, whom he succeeded in the ministry. For twenty-one years he continued his faithful labors without interruption; but at length, being silenced for non-conformity to some of the ceremonies of the English church, he came to New England in 1635, that he might enjoy liberty of conscience. After residing some time at Cambridge, he began the settlement of Concord in 1636, with a number of planters who had accompanied him from England. He formed, July 5, 1636, the twelfth church which had been established in the colony, and in 1637 was constituted its teacher, and John Jones its pastor. He died in this town, March 9, 1659, aged seventy-six. His first wife was a daughter of Thomas Allen, of Goldington; his second, a daughter of Sir Richard Chitwood. By these he had fourteen children, three of whom were educated for the ministry. Edward, who succeeded him about 1639, died at Chelmsford, January 2, 1696, and was buried at Concord: his son Peter, a graduate of 1660, was agent in England in 1676; was speaker of the house and assistant from 1677 to 1684; and died, May 21, 1688.

Mr. Bulkley was remarkable for his benevolence. He expended a large estate by giving farms to his servants, whom he employed in husbandry. It was his custom when a servant had lived with him a certain number of years, to dismiss him, giving him a piece of land for a farm, and to take another in his place. He was familiar and pleasant in his manners, though while subject to bodily pains he was somewhat irritable, and in preaching was at times considered as severe. So strict was his own virtue, that he could not spare some follies, which were thought too inconsiderable to be noticed. In consequence of his pressing importunately some charitable work, contrary to the wishes of the ruling elder, an unhappy division was produced in the church; but it was healed by the advice of a council, and the abdication of the elder. By means of this troublesome affair, Mr. Bulkeley said he knew more of God, more of himself, and more of men. He was an excellent scholar, and was distinguished for the holiness of his life and his diligent attention to the duties of the ministry. He gave a considerable part of his library to Harvard college.

He published a work entitled, the Gospel Covenant, or the Covenant of Grace opened, &c. London, 1646, 4to. pp. 353. This book was so much esteemed, that it passed through several editions. Mr. Bulkeley also wrote Latin poetry, some specimens of which are preserved by Dr. Mathew in his history of New England.—Mathew's Magna. iii. 96, 98; Neal, i. 321; *Non-conform. BULL; the name applied to the males of all the species of the ox. (Bos, Lat.) See Ox.

BULL, PAPAL; a written letter despatched by order of the pope, from the Roman chancery, and sealed with lead. It is a kind of apostolical rescript, or edict, and is chiefly in use in matters of justice or grace. If the former be the intention of the bull, the lead is hung by a hempen cord; if the latter, by a silken thread. It is this pendant lead, or seal, which is, properly speaking, the bull, and which is impressed on one side with the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other with the name of the pope, and the year of his pontificate. The bull is written in an old round Gothic letter, and is divided into five parts; the narrative of the fact; the conception; the clause; the date; and the salutation, in which the pope styles himself Servus Servorum, the servant of servants. These instruments, besides the lead hanging to them, have a cross, with some text of Scripture, or religious motto, about it. Thus, in those of pope Lucius III., the device was, Adjuva nos, Deus Saluatoris noster; that of Urban III., Ad te, Domine, levavi animam meam; and that of Alexander III., Vias tuas, Domine, demonstra mihi.

Bulls are granted for the consecration of bishops, the promotion to benefices, the celebration of jubilees, &c. Those brought into France are limited by the laws and customs of the land; nor are they admitted till they have been examined, and found to contain nothing contrary to the liberties of the Gallican church. After the death of a pope, no bulls are despatched during the vacancy of the see. Therefore, to prevent any abuses, as soon as the pope is dead, the vice-chancellor of the Roman church takes the seal off the bulls, and, in the presence of several persons, orders the name of the deceased pontiff to be erased, and covers the other side, on which are the faces of St. Peter and St. Paul, with a linen cloth, sealing it with his own seal. The word bull is derived from bullare, to seal letters; or from bulia, a drop or bubble. Some derive it from the Greek bole, council; Pezzon from the Celtic bul, bubble.

BULL IN CENA DOMINI is a particular bull, read every year on the day of the Lord's supper, or Maunday Thursday, in the pope's presence; containing excommunications and anathemas against heretics, and all who disturb or oppose the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the holy see. After the reading of the bull, the pope throws a burning torch into the public place to denote the thunder of this anathema. The council of Tours, in 1510, declared the bull in cena Domini void in regard to France.—Hend. Buck.

BULL, (GEORGE) an eminent prelate and theologian, born at the city of Wells, in 1644, was educated at Tiverton and Oxford, and was ordained at the age of twenty-one. Having passed through the minor dignities of the church, he was made bishop of St. David's, in 1705, and died in 1709. His Harmonia Apostolica was published in 1669; his main work, Defensio Fidei Nicenae, appeared in 1685; and his Judicium Ecclesie Catholice, in 1694. For the latter production he received the thanks of Bossuet, and various French divines. He likewise produced other pieces of less note, and many sermons.

With the increase of his revenue, his charity and hospitality increased even in greater proportion, so that they frequently exceeded his means. The mean idea of making his fortune by church preferment never entered his mind; but, after securing a very slender provision for his family, for whom he esteemed God's blessing the best inheritance, he devoted the remainder to the relief of the necessitous poor, about sixty of whom, every Sunday, either were supplied with meat or received money, at his charge. Widows and orphans were much indebted to his liberality, and he often lightened the sufferings of the prisoner by his timely bounty. On perceiving his dissolution to be approaching, and observing that his medical attendant was reluctant to express his opinion of him, he thus addressed him: "Doctor, you need not be afraid to tell me freely what your opinion of me is; for I thank my good God that I am not afraid to die. It is what I have expected long ago, and I hope I am not unprepared for it now." He spent his last hours in exhorting all around him to devote their lives to the service of God; urging upon them the importance of religion, and the vanity of all earthly things. He was a profoundly learned and pious man, and most exemplary in his conduct. In his opinions he was rather inclined to Arminianism; but he was accounted one of the ablest advocates for the doctrine of the Trinity, of the time in which he lived.—Davenport; *Jones's Christ. BULLINGER, (HENRY) one of the early reformers, was born in the canton of Zurich, at Baumgarten, in 1504. The works of Melancthon converted him to Protestantism, and he became closely connected with Zuingli, to whom he succeeded as pastor of Zurich. He was one of the authors of the Helvetic confession, and assisted Calvin in drawing up the formulary of 1549. Bullinger was a moderate and conscientious man; and it is much to his honor that, on the ground of its being inconsistent with Christianity for any one to hire himself out to slaughter those who had never injured him, he successfully opposed a treaty for supplying France with a body of Swiss mercenaries. He died in 1575. His printed works form ten folio volumes.—Davenport; Middleton.

BULRUSH; gimah. Exodus 2: 3.; Job 8: 11.; Isaiah 18: 2. 35: 7. A plant growing on the banks of the Nile, and in marshy grounds. The stalk rises to the height of six or seven cubits, besides two under water. The stalk is triangular, and terminates in a crown of small filaments resembling hair, which the ancients used to compare to a thyrsus. This reed, the Cyperus papyrus of Linnæus, commonly called "the Egyptian reed," was of the greatest use to the inhabitants of the country where it grew; the pith contained in the stock served them for food, and the woody part for building vessels, figures of which are to be seen on the engraven stones and other monuments of Egyptian antiquity. For this purpose they made it up, like rushes, into bundles; and, by tying these bundles together, gave their vessels the necessary shape and solidity. "The vessels of bulrushes," or papyrus, "that are mentioned in sacred and profane history," says Dr. Shaw, "were no other than large fabrics of the same kind with that of Moses, (Exodus 2: 3.;) which, from the late introduction of plank and stronger materials, are now laid aside." Thus Pliny takes notice of the "naves papyraceas armementaque Nilii," "ships made of papyrus, and the equipments of the Nile;" and he observes, "ex ipsâ quidem papyro navigia texunt;" "of the papyrus itself they construct sailing vessels." Herodotus and Diodorus have recorded the same fact; and among the poets, Lucan, "Conseriptur bibulâ Memphis cymba papyro," "the Memphian" or Egyptian "boat is made of the thirsty papyrus;" where the epithet bibulâ, "drinking," "soaking," "thirsty," is particularly remarkable, as corresponding with great exactness to the nature of the plant, and to its Hebrew name which signifies to soak or drink up. These vegetables require much water for their growth; when, therefore, the river on whose banks they grew was reduced, they perished sooner than other plants. This explains Job 8: 11. where the circumstance is referred to as an image of transient prosperity: "Can the flag grow without water? Whilst it is yet in its greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb."—Watson.

BUNYAN, (JOHN,) the author of the Pilgrim's Progress, an admirable allegory, which enjoys an unexampled but deserved popularity, was of humble birth, being the son of a travelling tinker, and was born, in 1628, at Elstow, in Bedfordshire. For some time he followed his father's occupation, and led a wandering, dissipated life, after which he served in the parliament army, and was at the siege of Leicester, where, being drawn out to stand sentinel, another soldier of his company desiring to take his place, he consented, and thereby, probably, avoided being shot through the head, by a musket ball, which killed his comrade. It is impossible, when reading the account of the first twenty years of his life, as recorded in his "Grace Abounding," not to be forcibly impressed with the truth of the doctrine, now generally received by all Christians, of the special Providence of God. His preservation from drowning, from destruction by an adder, by a musket shot, and from death by various ways, demonstrate that doctrine to be unquestionably true; and the facts which he has communicated, as to his conversion, additionally confirm the veracity of that doctrine. For although some allowances are to be made for his enthusiasm, and, therefore, for the language which he frequently adopted, yet, the facts which he records are unquestionably true; and, if they be true, the inference appears to be obvious.

It appears, however, that he still continued unacquainted with the sinfulness of his nature, and the necessity of faith in Christ, till he met with four poor women, at Bedford, "sitting at a door, in the sun, talking about the things of God—about a new birth—about the work of God in their hearts, as also how they were convinced of their miserable state by nature—of the mercy of God in Jesus Christ—of his word and promises—of the temptations of Satan—and of their wretchedness of heart and unbelief." Bunyan was so affected with the conversation of these good women, that he availed himself of every opportunity to converse with them. His irreligious companions perceived a difference in him, which was to them offensive; and being unable to disturb in him that steady purpose of his mind, to seek for happiness in God alone, they resigned his society. As soon as Mr. Bunyan obtained a good hope, that he was interested in the salvation of Jesus Christ, he communicated the state of his mind to Mr. Gifford, a Baptist dissenting minister, residing at Bedford; attended his preaching, and obtained from it much advantage; and, believing that baptism, by immersion, on a personal profession of faith, was most scriptural, he was so baptized, and admitted a member of the church, A. D. 1653.

In 1656, Mr. Bunyan, conceiving that he was called, by God, to become a preacher of the Gospel, delayed not to comply with that call. The measure excited considerable notice, and exposed him to great persecution. Subsequent to the restoration, his preaching brought him within the gripe of the law, and he was for nearly thirteen years imprisoned in Bedford jail, where he supported himself and his family by tagging laces. His leisure hours were spent in writing the Pilgrim's Progress, and other works, similar in kind, but inferior in merit. He was at last released, through the interposition of Dr. Owen and bishop Barlow, of Lincoln, and he resumed his ministry at Bedford. After his enlargement, he travelled into several parts of England, to visit the dissenting congregations, which procured him the epithet of bishop Bunyan. In king James the Second's reign, when that prince's declaration, in favor of liberty of conscience came, Mr. Bunyan, by the voluntary contributions of his followers, built a large meeting-house at Bedford, and preached constantly to great congregations. He also, annually, visited London, where he was very popular; and assemblies of twelve hundred have been convened in Southwark to hear him, on a dark winter's morning, at seven o'clock, even on week days. In the midst of these and similar exertions, he closed his life; and, at the age of sixty, on the 31st of August, 1688, "he resigned his soul into the hands of his most merciful Redeemer."

He was interred in Bunhill Fields burying-ground, and over his remains a handsome tomb was erected. Of Bunyan it has been said, and with seeming propriety, "that he appeared in countenance to be of a stern and rough temper, but in his conversation mild and affable; not given to loquacity or much discourse in company, unless some urgent occasion required it; observing never to boast of himself or his parts, but rather seem low in his own eyes, and submit himself to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and swearing; being just, in all that lay in his power, to his word; not seeming to revenge injuries; loving to reconcile differences, and making friendship with all. He had a sharp quick eye, accompanied with an excellent discerning of persons, being of good judgment and quick wit."

Of the "Pilgrim's Progress," but one opinion seems to be entertained. Mr. Grainger said, that the Pilgrim's Progress was one of the most ingenious books in the English language; and in this opinion, he states, Mr. Merrick and Dr. Roberts coincided. Dr. Radcliffe termed it "a phoenix in a cage." Lord Kaimes said, "it was composed in a style enlivened, like that of Homer, by a proper mixture of the dramatic and narrative, and upon that account has been translated into most European languages." Dr. Johnson remarked, "that it had great merit, both for invention, imagination, and the conduct of the story; and it had the best evidence of its merit—the general and continued approbation of mankind. Few books," he said, "had had a more extensive sale; and that it was remarkable that it began very much like the poem of Dante, yet there was no translation of Dante when Bunyan wrote." Dr. Franklin said, "Honest John Bunyan is the first man I know of, who has mingled narrative and dialogue together; a mode of writing very engaging to the reader, who, in the most interesting passages, finds himself admitted, as it were, into the company, and present at the conversation." Dean Swift declared, that he "had been better entertained and more informed by a chapter in the Pilgrim's Progress, than by a long discourse upon the will and the intellect, and simple or complex ideas." And Cowper, (in his "Miscellanies," vol. i. p. 283.) has immortalized him in some beautiful lines, which the length of this memoir precludes from being inserted. Still more recently, it has been commended in the strongest terms by the London Quarterly, Edinburg, and North American Reviews; and its author is classed with Milton, as one of the only two great original creative geniuses of the seventeenth century.

In addition to his "Pilgrim's Progress," he wrote two other allegorical pieces: "Solomon's Temple spiritualized," and "The Holy War;" the latter of which has excited a degree of attention nearly equal to that displayed to his "Pilgrim's Progress."

His works form two folio volumes. Bunyan had a talent for repartee. A quaker visited him in Bedford jail, and declared that, by order of the Lord, he had sought for him in half the prisons of England. "If the Lord had sent you," replied Bunyan, "you need not have taken so much trouble to find me out; for the Lord knows that I have been a prisoner in Bedford jail for the last twelve years."

See his own account of himself, entitled "Grace Abounding," &c. His works in folio, and Life prefixed; "Wilson's History of Dissenting Churches;" "Middleton's Evangelical Biography;" "The Life of Mr. John Bunyan, by Joseph Ivimey;"—Davenport; Jones' Christ. Biog.

BURCHET, (JAMES ROBERT, ESQ.,) of Doctors' Commons, London, was born 1765, and died 1810, aged forty-five, after a life of Christian usefulness. In his last illness, he said to a friend, "You and I have spent many happy hours together, and you will naturally be desirous of knowing something of the state of my mind ; but such is the weakness of my body that I shall not be able to say much. I now feel that if the important concerns of religion had not been attended to before, this is not the time ; but blessed be God, Jesus Christ has done all things well ; his salvation is complete ; and I desire to renounce all my own doings, and to throw myself at his feet as a poor sinner, entirely depending upon his atoning blood and righteousness for acceptance with God. You and I have been walking many years together, and devising many plans for the glory of God and the good of souls, and I hope you will long be spared as an instrument to promote his cause ; but O, do let me, as a dying man, recommend to you to look well to all your motives. I now see that the best of plans may be formed, and the best works done, without the best motives. You do not know a hundredth part of what has daily and hourly passed in my mind. Have now such a sense of the infinite holiness of God, that if it were not for the promise of his word, I sometimes think I should be ready to sink in despair. I trust I can say I know in whom I have believed. My mind is very comfortable, my faith is unshaken, the fear of death is taken away. I long to depart and be with Christ. I would not exchange, for ten thousand worlds, the glory I have in prospect."—Clissold.

BURCKHARDT (JOHN LEWIS,) the son of a Swiss colonel, was born at Lausanne, in 1784, and studied at Leipzig and Gottingen. Being of an enterprising disposition, he offered his services to the African Association, to explore Africa. They were accepted ; and, after he had acquired Arabic and a knowledge of physic and surgery at Cambridge, he sailed in 1809. In Syria he remained two years and a half, in the character of a mussulman, and learned the spoken Arabic dialects. His first journey included Nubia, the eastern coast of the Red sea, Mecca, and Medina. He reached Cairo in 1815, and was preparing to penetrate to Timbuctoo, when he died of a dysentery. His valuable Travels have been published.—Davenport.

BURDEN ; a heavy load. The word is commonly used in the prophets for a disastrous prophecy. The burden of Babylon, the burden of Nineveh, of Moab, of Egypt. The Jews asking Jeremiah captiously, What was the burden of the Lord ? he answered them, You are that burden ; you are, as it were, insupportable to the Lord ; he will throw you on the ground, and break you to pieces, and you shall become the reproach of the people, Jer. 23 : 33—40. The burden of the desert of the sea, (Isa. 21 : 1.) is a calamitous prophecy against Babylon, which stood on the Euphrates, and was watered as by a sea ; and which, from being great and populous, as it then was, would soon be reduced to a solitude. See BAByLON.—Cabmet.

BURGH (JAMES,) the author of the Dignity of Human Nature ; Political Disquisitions ; and other works of merit ; was born, in 1714, at Madderty, in Perthshire, and was educated at St. Andrew's. After having been a linen draper, an assistant at a grammar school, and a corrector in Bowyer's printing office, he opened an academy at Stoke Newington, which he conducted for nineteen years. He died in 1775.—Davenport.

BURGHERS, a numerous and respectable class of seceders from the church of Scotland, originally connected with the Associate Presbytery ; but some difference arising about the lawfulness of the Burgess oath, a separation took place in 1739, and those who refused the oath were called Anti-burgbers (which see) ; but as these sects have been lately happily reunited, it is not now necessary to enter into the merits of the dispute. See SECEDEERS.—Wilthams.

BURGESS (DANIEL,) an able but eccentric dissenting divine, was born, in 1645, at Staines, in Middlesex ; was educated at Westminster and Oxford ; resided in Ireland, from 1667 to 1674, as chaplain and school-master ; was imprisoned, under the act of uniformity, after his return to England ; became an exceedingly popular minister, for many years, in London ; and died in 1713. His piety and learning were alloyed by too much of humor and drollery. In one sermon, he declared, that the reason why the descendants of Jacob were named Israelites was, that God would not have his chosen people called Jacobites. In another, he exclaimed, "If you want a cheap suit, you will go to Monmouth street ; if a suit for life, you will go to the court of chancery ; but for an eternally durable suit, you must go to the Lord Jesus, and put on his robe of righteousness."—Davenport.

BURIAL, the interment of a deceased person ; an office held so sacred, that they who neglected it have in all nations been held in abhorrence. As soon as the last breath had fled, the nearest relation, or the dearest friend, gave the lifeless body the parting kiss, the last farewell and sign of affection to the departed relative. This was a custom of immemorial antiquity ; for the patriarch Jacob had no sooner yielded up his spirit, than his beloved Joseph, claiming for once the right of the first-born, "fell upon his face and kissed him." It is probable he first closed his eyes, as God had promised he should do : "Joseph shall put his hands upon thine eyes." The parting kiss being given, the company rent their clothes, which was a custom of great antiquity, and the highest expression of grief in the primitive ages. This ceremony was never omitted by the Hebrews when any mournful event happened, and was performed in the following manner : they took a knife, and holding the blade downwards, gave the upper garment a cut in the right side, and rent it an hand's breadth. For very near relations, all the garments are rent on the right side. After closing the eyes, the next care was to bind up the face, which it was no more lawful to behold. The next care of surviving friends was to wash the body, probably, that the ointments and perfumes with which it was to be wrapped up, might enter more easily into the pores, when opened by warm water. This ablution, which was always esteemed an act of great charity and devotion, was performed by women. Thus the body of Dorcas was washed, and laid in an upper room, till the arrival of the apostle Peter, in the hope that his prayers might restore her to life. After the body was washed, it was shrouded, and swathed with a linen cloth, although, in most places, they only put on a pair of drawers and a white tunic ; and the head was bound about with a napkin. Such were the napkin and grave-clothes in which the Savior was buried.

2. The body was sometimes embalmed, which was performed by the Egyptians after the following method : the brain was removed with a bent iron, and the vacuity filled up with medicaments ; the bowels were also drawn out, and the trunk being stuffed with myrrh, cassia, and other spices, except frankincense, which were proper to exsiccate the humors, it was pickled in nitre, in which it lay for seventy days. After this period, it was wrapped in bandages of fine linen and gums, to make it adhere ; and was then delivered to the relations of the deceased entire ; all its features, and the very hairs of the eyelids, being preserved. In this manner were the kings of Judah embalmed for many ages. But when the funeral obsequies were not long delayed, they used another kind of embalming. They wrapped up the body with sweet spices and odors, without extracting the brain, or removing the bowels. This is the way in which it was proposed to embalm the lifeless body of our Savior, which was prevented by his resurrection. The meaner sort of people seem to have been interred in their grave-clothes, without a coffin. In this manner was the sacred body of our Lord committed to the tomb. The body was sometimes placed upon a bier, which bore some resemblance to a coffin or bed, in order to be carried out to burial. Upon one of these was carried forth the widow's son of Nain, whom our compassionate Lord raised to life, and restored to his mother. We are informed in the history of the kings of Judah, that, Asa being dead, they laid him in the bed, or bier, which was filled with sweet odors. Josephus, the Jewish historian, describing the funeral of Herod the Great, says, his bed was adorned with precious stones ; his body rested under a purple covering ; he had a diadem and a crown of gold upon his head, a sceptre in his hand ; and all his house followed the bed. The bier used by the Turks at Aleppo is a kind of coffin, much in the form of ours, only the lid rises with a ledge in the middle.

3. The Israelites committed the dead to their native dust, and from the Egyptians, probably, borrowed the practice of burning many spices at their funerals. "They buried Asa in his own sepulchres, which he made for himself in the city of David, and laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odors, and divers kinds of spices, prepared by the apothecaries' art; and they made a very great burning for him," 2 Chron. 16: 14. Thus the Old Testament historian entirely justifies the account which the evangelist gives, of the quantity of spices with which the sacred body of Christ was swathed. The Jews object to the quantity used on that occasion, as unnecessarily profuse, and even incredible; but it appears from their own writings, that spices were used at such times in great abundance. In the Talmud it is said, that no less than eighty pounds of spices were consumed at the funeral of rabbi Gamaliel the elder. And at the funeral of Herod, if we may believe the account of their most celebrated historian, the procession was followed by five hundred of his domestics carrying spices. Why then should it be reckoned incredible, that Nicodemus brought of myrrh and aloes about a hundred pounds weight, to embalm the body of Jesus?

4. The funeral procession was attended by professional mourners, eminently skilled in the art of lamentation, whom the friends and relations of the deceased hired, to assist them in expressing their sorrow. They began the ceremony with the stridulous voices of old women, who strove, by their doleful modulations, to extort grief from those that were present. The children in the streets through which they passed, often suspended their sports, to imitate the sounds, and joined with equal sincerity in the lamentations. "But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented," Matt. 9: 17. Music was afterwards introduced to aid the voices of the mourners: the trumpet was used at the funerals of the great, and the small pipe or flute for those of meaner condition. Hired mourners were in use among the Greeks as early as the Trojan war, and probably in ages long before; for in Homer, a choir of mourners were planted around the couch on which the body of Hector was laid out, who sung his funeral dirge with many sighs and tears:—

"A melancholy choir attend around,
With plaintive sighs and music's solemn sound;
Alternately they sing, alternate flow
The obedient tears, melodious in their woe." Pope.

In Egypt, the lower class of people call in women, who play on the tabor; and whose business it is, like the hired mourners in other countries, to sing elegiac airs to the sound of that instrument, which they accompany with the most frightful distortions of their limbs. These women attend the corpse to the grave, intermixed with the female relations and friends of the deceased, who commonly have their hair in the utmost disorder; their heads covered with dust; their faces daubed with indigo, or at least rubbed with mud; and howling like maniacs. Such were the minstrels whom our Lord found in the house of Jairus, making so great a noise round the bed on which the dead body of his daughter lay. The noise and tumult of these retained mourners, and the other attendants, appear to have begun immediately after the person expired. It is evident that this sort of mourning and lamentation was a kind of art among the Jews: "Wailing shall be in the streets; and they shall call such as are skillful of lamentation to wail," Amos 5: 16. Mourners are still hired at the obsequies of Hindoos and Mahometans, as in former times. To the dreadful noise and tumult of the hired mourners, the following passage of Jeremiah indisputably refers, and shows the custom to be derived from a very remote antiquity: "Call for the mourning women that they may come; and send for cunning women, that they may come, and let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters," Jer. 9: 17. The funeral processions of the Jews in Barbary are conducted nearly in the same manner as those in Syria. The corpse is borne by four to the place of burial: in the first rank march the priests, next to them the kindred of the deceased; after whom come those that are invited to the funeral; and all singing in a sort of plaintive song, the forty-ninth Psalm. Hence the prophet, (Amos 8: 3.) warns his people that public calamities were approaching, so numerous and severe, as should make them forget the usual rites of burial, and even to sing one of the songs of Zion over the dust of a departed relative. This appears to be confirmed by a prediction in the eighth chapter: "And the songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day, saith the Lord God; there shall be many dead bodies in every place; they shall cast them forth with silence;" they shall have none to lament and bewail; none to blow the funeral trump or touch the pipe and tabor; none to sing the plaintive dirge, or express their hope of a blessed resurrection, in the strains of inspiration. All shall be silent despair. See SERULCHRES.—Watson.

BURKE, (EDMUND,) whose name fills so large a space in the political and literary annals of Great Britain, was the son of an eminent attorney, and was born at Dublin, January 1, 1730. After having received his early education from Abraham Shackleton, a quaker school-master of Ballymore, he went to Trinity college, Dublin, in 1746, where he remained three years, and pursued an extensive course of study, on a plan of his own. In 1753, he entered as a law student at the Temple, but applied himself almost wholly to literature; his unremitting attention to which at length injured his health. During his illness, he became an inmate in the house of Dr. Nugent, a physician, to whose daughter he was afterwards united. This union he always described as the chief blessing of his life. His first acknowledged work, which was of course published anonymously, was his Vindication of Natural Society; an admirable imitation of lord Bolingbroke's style and manner of reasoning which deceived even some of the best judges. This was followed, in the ensuing year, by his Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful. It completely established his reputation as a man of genius and a fine writer, and brought him acquainted with some of the most eminent personages of the age. His political career did not commence till 1761, when he accompanied the Irish secretary, William Gerard Hamilton, to Ireland. Nor can he be said to have entered fully on that career till 1765, when he became the private secretary and friend of the marquis of Rockingham, then the first lord of the treasury, who brought him into parliament, as member for Wendover. Thenceforth he took a prominent part in the debates of the house of commons. In 1771, without any solicitation on his part, he was elected for Bristol; but this seat he lost at the next election, in consequence of his having displayed too much liberality of principle, with respect to the Catholics and to Ireland. He subsequently sat for Malton. In the mean while, he gave to the public his Observations on Grenville's State of the Nation; a Short Account of a late short Administration; Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents; and his speeches on American Affairs. To the impolitic contest with America he made a strenuous and eloquent resistance as a senator. On the downfall of lord North's ministry, Burke obtained the office of paymaster-general, and a seat in the council; and he availed himself of this opportunity to carry his celebrated reform bill, which he had previously brought forward in vain. The expulsion of the coalition ministry, of course, deprived him of his office. The prosecution of Mr. Hastings, and the opposition to Mr. Pitt's regency bill, were among his next and greatest parliamentary efforts. Though the former of these has drawn down upon him much censure, and even calumny, there can be no doubt that he undertook it as a sacred and imperative duty. This is irrefragably proved by his recently published letters to Dr. Lawrence. When the French revolution took place, he early foresaw the result, and, in 1790, he produced his celebrated Reflections on that event. A breach between him and Mr. Fox was also occasioned by their difference of opinion on this important subject. In 1794, he retired from parliament, and a pension of one thousand two hundred pounds a year was bestowed on him by the government. From the time when his Reflections were published, till his decease, his literary hostility to the doctrines of revolutionary France was continued with unabated vigor. The last work which he gave to the press was Two Letters on a Regicid Peace: the concluding two were posthumous. He died on the 8th of July, 1797. His compositions have been collected in sixteen volumes octavo. In private life, Burke was amiable and benevolent; in public, indefatigable, ardent, and abhorrent of meanness and injustice. It was this latter quality which rendered him a persevering advocate of the Irish Catholics. As an orator, he ranks among the first of modern times; and as a writer, whether we consider the splendor of his diction, the richness and variety of his imagery, or the boundless stores of knowledge which he displays, it must be acknowledged that there are few who equal, and none who transcend him. Burke was a sincere believer in Christianity, and his noble mind was moulded and elevated by its pure and generous sentiments. Unlike some of his greatest contemporaries, he made neither the bottle nor the dice his household deities; he had no taste for pursuits that kill time rather than pass it; "I have no time," said he, "to be idle." His fame is spotless. Although in the judgment of the world, he was the greatest statesman and orator of his own and perhaps of any age, his humility was even more rare and remarkable than his genius. He declined the honor of an interment in the great national receptacle of illustrious men, Westminster abbey, and even forbid it in his will; assigning as his reason, "I have had in my life but too much of noise and compliment." To the approach of death he submitted with a calm and Christian resignation, undisturbed by a murmur, hoping, as he said, to obtain the divine mercy through the intercession of a blessed Redeemer, which (in his own words) "he had long sought with unfeigned humiliation, and to which he looked with a trembling hope." The first clause in his will marks in a manner equally striking his deliberate views and deepest feelings on this great subject, and is a sort of testamentary witness to the world of the truth and value of the Gospel of Christ. "According to the ancient, good, and laudable custom of which my heart and understanding recognise the propriety, I bequeath my soul to God, hoping for his mercy only through the merits of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. My body I desire to be buried in the church at Beaconsfield, near to the bodies of my dearest brother, and my dearest son, in all humility praying that as we have lived in perfect unity together, we may together have a part in the resurrection of the just."

There never was a more beautiful alliance between virtue and talents. All his conceptions were grand, all his sentiments generous. The great leading trait of his character, and that which gave it all its energy and its color, was that strong hatred of vice which is no other than the passionate love of virtue. It breathes in all his writings; it was the guide of all his actions. But even the force of his eloquence was insufficient to transfuse it into the weaker or perverted minds of his contemporaries. Mr. Burke was too superior to the age in which he lived.

—Davenport; Prior's Memoirs of Burke.

BURKITT, (WILLIAM, M. A.) This exemplary divine, and useful commentator, was born at Hitcham, in Suffolk, July 25, 1650. In childhood, he appeared endowed with an excellent memory, which, by the grace of God and a good education, became a sacred repository. Of his conversion he thus speaks: "While I continued at school at Cambridge, it pleased God to visit me with the small pox, but very favorably, and, as I hope, in great mercy laying the foundation of my spiritual health in that sickness; working, as I hope, a prevailing thorough change in the very frame and disposition of my soul. May my soul and all that is within me bless thy name, O Lord, that this sickness should by the blessing of thy Holy Spirit, open my blind eyes, which hath closed the eyes of so many in darkness and death! O happy sickness, that ends in the recovery of the soul to God!"

From the college he came to Bilston Hall in Suffolk, and was chaplain there. He entered upon the ministry very early, after having been ordained by bishop Reynolds, and not long after was settled in Mildred in Suffolk, where he remained twenty-one years, preaching evangelical truth in a clear and lively manner. In 1692, he removed to Dedham in Essex, which was blessed with his labors about eleven years and a half. He died by a malignant fever at the age of fifty-three, deeply lamented by all who knew him.

Mr. Burkitt was a devoted and successful minister. He delighted in his Master's work. His preaching was clear and easy to be understood. To matter the most edifying and heavenly, was added the charm of a sweet and musical voice, which made him a very acceptable preacher. His family religion was indeed such as became the gospel. He was a great redeemer of time; variety and improvement were his chief diversions. Few have been more dead to the world and its vanities. He expended much of his living on poor students of divinity. In his last sickness he was very happy. He blessed God especially that he had finished his Practical Exposition of the New Testament, which he said, he had ushered into the world with many, very many prayers.—Middleton.

BURLEIGH, (MILDRED, LADY,) eldest daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born 1526, and died 1589. Dr. Wotten, in his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning, assures us that "no age was so productive of learned women as the sixteenth century. The fair sex seemed to believe that the Greek and Latin added to their charms; and Plato and Aristotle, untranslated, were frequent ornaments of their closets." Probably this may be ascribed to the noble art of printing, which had just then awakened the minds of people, and furnished them with a vast variety of books to improve their understanding. The utmost care was taken of the education of lady Mildred by her excellent father, and his pains were well repaid; she being as eminent for her great learning and good sense, as for her piety and charity. She took great delight in reading the works of the Greek fathers, Basil, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory, Nazianzen, and others, and even translated one of the works of Chrysostom into English. And when she presented the university library in Cambridge with the great Bible in Hebrew and other languages, she sent it with an epistle in Greek, written with her own hand.

In 1546, she was married to Sir William Cecil, afterwards lord Burleigh, lord high-treasurer of England, and privy counsellor to queen Elizabeth. Her union was long and happy; but all her children died young, excepting two daughters. Five days after the decease of this exemplary woman, her husband wrote his Meditation on the Death of his Lady; in which his sorrow is blended with grateful praises of her zeal for learning; her benefactions to Cambridge, &c.; her widely extended benevolence; and the admirable secrecy, by which during her life-time they were hidden even from him.—Betham.

BURNET, (GILBERT,) the celebrated bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh on the 18th of September, 1643. He received his early instructions from his father, who was eminent for his zeal and piety, and under whose guardianship he made so rapid an advancement in the acquisition of knowledge, that at the age of ten years he perfectly understood the Latin language. At this time, his father sent him to the college of Aberdeen, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Greek language, and went through the usual course of Aristotelian logic and philosophy with great applause. At the early age of fourteen, he took the degree of master of arts; and though so young, applied himself to the study of civil law, though he soon became weary of that study, and turned his mind and exertions to divinity; perused attentively and critically the Old and New Testaments; read the most noted controversial writers in divinity; and to these studies applied fourteen hours during every day. In 1665, Mr. Burnet was ordained priest, by the bishop of Edinburgh, and presented by Sir Robert Fletcher, to the living of Saltoun; and, by his attention to the welfare of his flock, soon gained their affections and well-wishes. He regularly preached twice on every Sabbath day, and once in the week; catechized three times a week; and went round, from house to house, instructing and exhorting the inhabitants. The sick he visited twice a day, and gave as much from his income as remained beyond the sum expended in his bare subsistence. The same year in which he was ordained, he was so disgusted with the conduct of some of the Scotch bishops, who, as he said, were "remiss in their functions, as some did not live within their diocese, and those who did, took no care of them; in fact, that there was a levity and carnal way of living about them, that very much scandalized him;" that he drew up a memorial of the abuses of the Scotch bishops, which exposed him to their spleen. In 1669, he was made professor of divinity at Glasgow, which office he honorably filled. He was unwearied in his attentions to the interests of his pupils, and studied from four in the morning till ten, in order that more time might be allotted to his charge. He continued in his office for four years and a half, exposed, through his liberal moderate principles, to the reproaches and ill-will of the Episcopalian and Presbyterian parties. In this year he published his modest and free Conference between a Conformist and Non-conformist. In 1672, Burnet married lady Margaret Kennedy, (daughter of the earl of Cassilis,) who was as distinguished for her piety as for her extensive knowledge. Shortly after his marriage, he published his "Vindication of the Authority, Constitution, and Laws of the Church and State of Scotland;" which was dedicated to the earl of Lauderdale. This work gained him so much credit, and so greatly increased his reputation, that he was requested to accept of a bishopric, with a promise of the next vacant archbishopric; but he refused them both. Burnet at that time lost the favor of the court, owing to some misrepresentations of the earl of Lauderdale. In 1675, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls chapel; and shortly after this, became a useful and popular preacher at St. Clement's. At this time, by the entreaties of Sir William Jones, he published his "History of the Reformation of the Church of England;" which met with great success, and is allowed by all to be the execution of a masculine pen, and to contain a very comprehensive view of all the events of that important period, from the reign of Henry the Eighth to Elizabeth. On its completion he received the thanks of both houses of parliament: but in the following spring, the court was so much displeased with him, for some of his publications, that he was discharged from his lecture at St. Clement's; and on the death of Charles, he visited Paris, and from thence he went to Italy, Switzerland, Geneva, and Utrecht. On his arrival at that place, he was invited to the Hague, by the prince and princess of Orange. The invitation he accepted, and took an active part in the councils then carrying on in relation to the affairs of England; and his instructions were of service to the prince. This so much disgusted the English court, that a charge of high treason was alleged, and his person was in danger; but the States refused to deliver him up to the malice of his enemies. At this period, Dr. Burnet married Mrs. Mary Scott, a lady as famed for her private virtues as for her noble birth.

In 1683, Dr. Burnet was advanced to the see of Salisbury; yet so disinterested was he, and so little did he esteem worldly grandeur and honors, that he solicited for it in favor of Dr. Lloyd, then bishop of St. Asaph. He went down on his accession to his diocese, and discharged the duties of that office with piety and zeal, and made it a rule, every summer, to make a tour for six or seven weeks, to go through the livings of his diocese, and to watch their progress. During his residence at Salisbury, he constantly preached every Thursday, and in the evening he had a lecture in his own chapel, when he expounded some portion of Scripture. He also instituted a little nursery for students in divinity, which he regularly attended to himself; and to these students he allowed thirty pounds a year. "He was a warm and constant enemy to pluralities, where non-residence was the cause of them." In the year 1692, he published a treatise, entitled "The Pastoral Care;" in which the duties of a minister are scrupulously and with great propriety enforced. In 1698, bishop Burnet was deprived of his second wife; but his large family, united to the tenderness of their ages, inclined him to seek for a prudent, confidential nurse, which he found in the person of Mrs. Berkley, to whom he was united by marriage in the following year: shortly after his marriage, he became tutor to the duke of Gloucester, to whose education, morally and religiously, he paid the utmost attention. About this time he published his "Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England;" and was the first who projected the scheme for the augmentation of poor livings. Thus was the life of this excellent prelate devoted to acts of charity and usefulness; he was learned, yet modest and unassuming; pious, yet cheerful; and he proved religion not to be incompatible with a consistent attention to the concerns of this life. He departed this life on the 17th of March, 1714, at the venerable and patriarchal age of seventy-four, and was interred in the parish church of St. James, Clerkenwell. For further account of this eminent scholar, Christian, and divine, see Life of Burnet, by Thomas Burnet, Esq.; Burnet's History of his Own Times; Kennet's History of England.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

BURNET, (ELIZABETH,) eldest daughter of Sir Richard Blake, was born 1661, and died 1708. At eleven years of age, she began to have a true sense of religion, and read with great application the books which were put into her hands; but was not quite satisfied, aspiring after more sublime notions than what she found in them. On this account, more than ordinary care was taken in her education to make her think less highly of herself. At seventeen, she was married to Robert Berkley, Esq. of Worcester. With him she visited the continent, and resided some time at the Hague; but returned to England about the time of the revolution in 1688.

Her knowledge and virtues attracted many acquaintance. Dr. Stillingfleet was her intimate friend, and used to say that he knew not a more considerable woman in England. Her husband dying in 1693, she applied herself wholly to devotion, reading, acts of charity, and offices of friendship, especially to her late husband's Protestant relations. She also took an active part in founding a hospital for which Mr. Berkley had left a valuable bequest. She also established many schools for the instruction of poor children, and employed her pen in useful compositions.

In 1700, she was married to the celebrated bishop Burnet, and was a mother indeed to his family of children; of which her husband was so sensible that by his will, then made, he left them entirely under her care and authority. Such was her benevolence that she was uneasy at using even a fifth part of her income for herself. Her death, like her life, was that of a calm and happy Christian.—Betham.

BURNING BUSH, that in which the Lord appeared to Moses at the foot of mount Horeb. Exod. 3: 2. Such was the splendor of the Divine Majesty, that its effulgence dazzled his sight, and he was unable to behold it; and in token of his humility, submission and reverence, "Moses hid his face." So did Elijah in after-times. 1 Kings 19: 12. Yea, the very angels cover their faces in the presence of God. Isa. 6: 2. When the Hebrew lawgiver, just before his death, pronounced his blessing upon the chosen tribes, he called to mind this remarkable event, and supplicated in behalf of the posterity of Joseph, "the good will of him that dwelt in the bush," Deut. 33: 16.

These last words of Moses seem to indicate, that there was, in this memorable transaction, something of an allegorical or mystical import, though there are different opinions as to the particular thing that it was designed to shadow forth. Some have thought that Jehovah dwelling in the bush, in a blaze of fire, and the former not being consumed by it, might possibly be intended as an emblem of the manifestation of God in the flesh; that mystery of godliness which was exhibited in the fulness of the times, when "the Word, who was with God, and was God, and by whom all things were created, was made flesh, and tabernacled among men"—the brightness of the Father's glory, and in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily. 1 John 1: 1—14. Col. 1: 15—19; ch. 2: 9. And that this was the truth, reality, and ultimate import of the Shechinah, there can be no reasonable doubt. But others consider that the particular thing intended to be taught the Hebrews by this phenomenon, namely, the bush of thorns or briars, burning yet not consumed, was to intimate to them that God was present with them in their great affliction and tribulations, and, by his providence, so ordering matters that their afflictions did not consume them; agreeably to the words of the prophet: "In all their afflictions he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them." Isa. 63: 9. "This fire, also," says bishop Patrick, "might be intended to show that God would there meet with the Israelites and give them his law in fire and lighting, and yet not consume them."—Jones.

BURNT-OFFERINGS.—See OFFERINGS.

BURR, (JONATHAN, minister of Dorchester, Mass. was born at Redgrave in Suffolk, England, about the year 1604. Being silenced in England with many others for resisting the impositions of the prelatical party, and apprehending that calamities were in store for the nation, he came to New England in 1639, with his wife and three children, willing to forego all worldly advantages, that he might enjoy the ordinances of the gospel in their purity. He was admitted a member of the church in Dorchester under the pastoral care of Richard Mather, December 21. He was in a short time invited to settle as a colleague with Mr. Mather in the ministry. The most experienced Christians in the country found his ministry and his whole deportment breathing much of the spirit of a better world. The eminent Mr. Hooker, once hearing him preach, remarked, "Surely this man will not be long out of heaven, for he preaches, as if he were there already." He died, after a short sickness, August 9, 1641, aged 37 years.

Mr. Burr was esteemed both in England and in this country for his piety and learning. In proportion to the ardor of his piety was the extent of his charity. He sincerely loved his fellow-men, and while their eternal interests pressed with weight on his heart, he entered with lively sympathy into their temporal afflictions. Rarely did he visit the poor without communicating what was comfortable to the body, as well as what was instructive and salutary to the soul. When he was reminded of the importance of having a greater regard to his own interest, he replied, I often think of those words, "he that soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly." For the general interests of religion in the world he felt so lively a concern, that his personal joys and sorrows seemed inconsiderable in comparison. He was bold and zealous in withstanding every thing which brought dishonor on the name of God; but under personal injuries he was exemplarily meek and patient. When informed that any thought meanly of him, his reply was, "I think meanly of myself, and therefore may well be content, that others think meanly of me." When charged with what was faulty, he remarked, "If men see so much evil in me, what does God see?"—Mather's Maga., iii. 78—81; Panoplist, Sept. 1808; Savage's Winthrop, ii. 22; Harris' Hist. of Dorchester in Coll. Hist. Soc. ix. 175—183; Allen.

BURR, (AARON, president of New Jersey college, a descendant of the preceding, was a native of Fairfield in Connecticut, and was born in the year 1714. He was graduated at Yale college in 1735. In 1742, he was invited to take the pastoral charge of the Presbyterian church at Newark in New Jersey. Here he became so eminent as an able and learned divine and an accomplished scholar, that in 1748 he was unanimously elected president of the college, which he was instrumental in founding, as successor to Mr. Dickinson. The college was removed about this time from Elizabethtown to Newark, and in 1757, a short time before the death of Mr. Burr, to Princeton. In 1754 he accompanied Mr. Whitefield to Boston, having a high esteem for the character of that eloquent itinerant preacher, and greatly rejoicing in the success of his labors. After a life of usefulness and honor, devoted to his Master in heaven, he was called into the eternal world, September 24, 1757, in the midst of his days, being in the forty-third year of his age.

President Burr had a slender and delicate frame; yet to encounter fatigue he had a heart of steel. To amazing talents for the despatch of business he joined a constancy of mind, that commonly secured to him success. As long as an enterprise appeared possible, he yielded to no discouragement. When his services were requested by the trustees of the college in soliciting donations for the purchase of a library and philosophical apparatus, and for erecting a building for the accommodation of the students, he engaged with his usual zeal in the undertaking, and every where met with the encouragement, which the design so fully deserved. A place being fixed upon at Princeton for the site of the new building, the superintendance of the work was solely committed to him. Until the spring of 1757, when the college was removed to Newark, he discharged the duties both of president and pastor of a church. Few were more perfect in the art of rendering themselves agreeable in company. He knew the avenues to the human heart, and he possessed the rare power of pleasing without betraying a design to please. As he was free from ostentation and parade, no one would have suspected his learning, unless his subject required him to display it, and then every one was surprised that a person, so well acquainted with books, should yet possess such ease in conversation and such freedom of behavior. He inspired all around him with cheerfulness. His arms were open to good men of every denomination. A sweetness of temper, obliging courtesy and mildness of manners, joined to an engaging candor of sentiment, spread a glory over his reputation, and endeared his person to all his acquaintance.—Allen.

BURR, (JOSEPH, a philanthropist, died at Manchester, Vt., without a family, April 14, 1828, aged 56, bequeathing more than 90,000 dollars to various objects of charity. He bequeathed for foreign missions 17,000 dollars, 15,000 to the Bible society, 12,000 to Middlebury college, 10,000 to the American Home Missionary society, 5,000 to the Tract, Colonization, and Vermont Missionary societies each, 5,000 to the parish in Manchester, 3,000 to an Education society, 1,000 to Dartmouth and Williams colleges each, 10,000 for a public seminary of learning in Manchester. He bequeathed these thousands of dollars, besides bestowing a large amount of property upon his relatives. With a small patrimony he had acquired his estate by his unflinching judgment and prudence. He was the banker of his region. He was honorable and conscientious. With correct religious views and a moral deportment, he yet avowed no hope of a spiritual renovation, until a short time before his death. On his last morning he said, "I think I am waiting for the coming of my Lord."—Mission Herald, xxiv. 226; Jones.

BUSHEL, a Jewish measure, containing about a pint less than a peck.—Matt. 5: 15.

BUTLER, (JOSEPH, BISHOP, the celebrated author of "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature," was the youngest of eight children of Mr. Thomas Butler, residing at Wantage, in Berkshire, and was born in that town in the year 1692. He received his primary education at the free grammar school of Wantage, under the tuition of the Rev. Philip Barton. At that school he received much sound instruction, and became as distinguished for his steady, moral, serious character, as for his genius and learning. His father was a Dissenter; and Mr. Butler, having quitted the grammar school, was sent to a Presbyterian dissenting academy at Tewkesbury. Mr. Butler, at that academy, received from Mr. Jones, the principal tutor, who was a man of extraordinary learning, the greatest attention, and made a progress in the study of theology which was truly surprising. His letters, written at that time to the celebrated Dr. Samuel Clarke, containing his doubts as to the tenable nature of some of the arguments made use of by that divine, in demonstrating the being and attributes of God, displayed a sagacity and depth of thought which excited the notice and even respect of Dr. Clarke. The whole correspondence is now annexed to that incomparable treatise. His mind, at that time, was also much occupied in examining the principles of non-conformity, and in endeavoring to satisfy himself whether he should become a dissenting clergyman or a minister of the established church. The result of that investigation appears to be, that he considered, on the whole, Episcopacy to be preferable; and accordingly, on the 17th of March, 1714, he was admitted a commoner of Oriel college, Oxford. With Mr. Edward Talbot, who was the second son of Dr. Edward Talbot, he formed at college a very intimate acquaintanceship; and through the medium of Mr. Talbot, many of Mr. Butler's subsequent preferences may be traced. It was thus that, in 1718, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, by Sir Joseph Jekyll; and in 1721, he took the degree of bachelor of laws. He continued at the Rolls until 1726, in which year he published, in one volume, octavo, Fifteen Sermons, preached at that chapel. By the continued friendship of Dr. Talbot, then bishop of Durham, he had presented Mr. Butler to the rectory of Haughton, near Darlington, and afterwards to that of Stanhope. At Stanhope he afterwards much resided; and, during seven years, he performed with unremitting assiduity and piety, all the duties of a parish priest. In 1733, he quitted the retirement of Stanhope, to become chaplain to lord Charles Talbot. He at the same time was admitted at Oxford to the degree of doctor of laws, and was shortly afterwards presented by the chaplains with a prebend in the church of Rochester. In 1736, Dr. Butler was appointed clerk of the closet to queen Caroline; and, in the same year, presented a copy of the treatise for which his name has been so long, so extensively, and so justly celebrated. That work, and his uniformly consistent conduct, insured him the respect and esteem of the queen; and, in 1738, he was consecrated to the bishopric of Bristol. In 1740, king George II. promoted him to the deanery of St. Paul's, London; but finding the demands of that dignity to be incompatible with his parish duty at Stanhope, where he had still resided six months of the year, he immediately resigned that rich benefice. In 1750, he was translated to the see of Durham, in consequence of the decease of Dr. Edward Chandler. In the following year he distinguished himself by his charge "On the Importance of External Religion." In consequence of that charge, bishop Butler has been accused of being addicted to superstition, of being inclined to popery, and of dying in the communion of the church of Rome; but such calumnies have been long since refuted by the evidence of facts. Rank and talents, and usefulness and piety, present, however, neither separate nor combined, any impediments to the advances of death; for he had been but a short time seated in his new bishopric, when his health declined; and at Bath, on the 16th of July, 1753, he expired. His corpse was conveyed to Bristol; and there, in the cathedral, was interred all that was mortal of this learned prelate.

Of bishop Butler's Analogy but one opinion has been entertained. It has always been regarded as a work of very superior merit, and as displaying a depth of thought and a profundity of mind, acquired or possessed but by few. It is a standard work on the evidences of Christianity.—Hend. Buck.

BUTTER, is taken in Scripture, as it has been almost perpetually in the East, for cream or liquid butter, Prov. 30: 33. 2 Sam. 17: 29. The ancient way of making butter in Arabia and Palestine was probably nearly the same as is still practised by the Bedoucen Arabs and Moors in Barbary, and which is thus described by Dr. Shaw: "Their method of making butter is by putting the milk or cream into a goat's skin turned inside out, which they suspend from one side of the tent to the other; and then pressing it to and fro in one uniform direction, they quickly separate the unctuous and wheyey parts. In the Levant, they tread upon the skin with their feet, which produces the same effect." The last method of separating the butter from the milk, perhaps may throw light upon a passage in Job of some difficulty: "When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil," Job 31: 6. The method of making butter in the East illustrates the conduct of Jael, the wife of Heber, described in the book of Judges: "And Sisera said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink, for I am thirsty: and she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him." In the song of Deborah, the statement is repeated: "He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish," Judges 4: 19. 5: 25. The word hemah, which our translators rendered butter, properly signifies cream; which is undoubtedly the meaning of it in this passage: for Sisera complained of thirst, and asked a little water to quench it;—a purpose to which butter is but little adapted. Mr. Harmer, indeed, urges the same objection to cream, which, he contends, few people would think a very proper beverage for one that was extremely thirsty; and concludes that it must have been butter-milk which Jael, who had just been churning, gave to Sisera. But the opinion of Dr. Russel is preferable,—that the hemah of the Scriptures is probably the same as the hoymak of the Arabs, which is not, as Harmer supposed, simple cream, but cream produced by simmering fresh sheep's milk for some hours over a slow fire. It could not be butter newly churned, which Jael presented to Sisera, because the Arab butter is apt to be foul, and is commonly passed through a strainer before it is used: and Russel declares, he never saw butter offered to a stranger, but always haymak; nor did he ever observe the orientals drink butter-milk, but always leban, which is coagulated sour milk, diluted with water. It was leban, therefore, which Pococke mistook for butter-milk, with which the Arabs treated him in the Holy Land. A similar conclusion may be drawn concerning the butter and milk which the wife of Heber presented to Sisera: they were forced cream or haymak, and leban, or coagulated sour milk, diluted with water, which is a common and refreshing beverage in those sultry regions. In Isaiah 7: 15, butter and honey are mentioned as food which, in Egypt and other places in the East, is in use to this day. The butter and honey are mixed, and the bread is then dipped in it.—Watson.

BUTTERWORTH, (JOHN.) pastor of the Baptist church in Coventry, and author of the valuable Concordance, was born in Lancashire, (Eng.) Dec. 13, 1727. His parents were deeply pious, and had the singular happiness to see all their five sons become so; four of them became ministers of Baptist churches. When about fifteen years of age, John became a constant hearer of the Methodists, and imbibed their religious sentiments; but left them soon after his conversion, which was in his nineteenth year. His own account of that event, though much abridged, is interesting. "I was frequently under convictions of sin; and though outwardly moral, yet knew that my nature was inclined to all iniquity. I was only restrained through education, frequent converse with professors, and fear of open shame; not from any dislike I had to sin. Yet my conscience was frequently awakened, and I formed many resolutions of living a holy life; but a few days or a week would wear off these impressions, and worldly things occupied my mind; so that the older I grew, the more wicked I became. One night after hearing Mr. John Nelson preach from Matt. 8: 2, I thought all seemed more affected than myself. The hardness of my heart had always been my trouble; because of which all the sermons I had heard were ineffectual. I returned home with a heavy spirit, crying to God that he would take away my heart of stone, and give me a heart of flesh. I then experienced a longing after holiness; a desire to be holy as God is holy. I hoped to live without sin, which I then thought was attainable in this life. I used to govern my thoughts daily, as much as in me lay; and those words impressed my mind, Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled. Still I found unbelief a great burden; laboring hard to believe, but could not; for indeed I was ignorant of the nature of faith. One morning, I was in deep thought on this subject, reasoning with myself why I was still in unbelief, when these words dropped into my mind, By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. This word gift revolved in my mind. A gift, thought I, is not merited; if it were, it would be a debt, and not a gift. I had leaned all along towards the doctrine of merit, and of obtaining grace by good works; but now I saw faith to be an undeserved gift, and that God might bestow it on my vilest neighbors, and leave me in my moral duties without faith. This led me to think there was some truth in the doctrine of election; and that it was not upon foresight of faith and obedience, but of pure sovereignty; and that faith and obedience were the fruits and effects of election, and not causes thereof. My sentiments began to change from Arminianism to Calvinism. I searched the Bible all that day; and the evidence in favor of election shone like the sun, and came forcibly upon me. As I saw it in the Bible, so I saw the doctrine exemplified in the world. I concluded that if ever God would show me favor and give me faith, it would be of mere mercy. I was not left to neglect the worship of God, but I sought him sorrowing. One evening I was reading in the Bible, and cast my eye upon these words of our Lord, (John 6: 47.) Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth in me hath everlasting life. I was struck with the passage—it was as if spoken to me. I did immediately believe that Jesus Christ was a suitable, precious, and almighty Savior; I trusted in him alone for salvation; and therefore in him I had everlasting life. I could not but believe and rejoice. I said, Who can help believing? for I thought it as easy then as I had found it hard before. I was transported with the love of Christ. The Bible was my delight and meditation all the day. I attained more knowledge of Scripture in a month after this, than I have done in years since. I was not satisfied unless I knew every text that related to doctrine or practice, and where it was; and thus I soon attained a general knowledge of the whole Bible."

Soon after this, Mr. Butterworth entered the ministry. In 1751, he accepted the call of the Baptist church in Coventry, was ordained to the pastoral office among them; and there labored until his death in 1803, a period of fifty-two years. He was greatly beloved by the people of his charge, and not undeservedly, for he possessed the main qualifications for pastoral usefulness in great perfection; and while enjoying the love of his family and flock on earth, he held sweet communion with Heaven. In the decline of life, that passage was finely exemplified in him, The path of the just is as the dawning light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. As death advanced, he cheerfully advanced to meet him, and all his letters breathe the spirit of the ripened saint. "We are thankful, (he says, in 1800,) and we have abundant cause to be so; having all the comforts of this life, (which multitudes have not) the means of grace; the exercise of faith in Christ; and in general, comfort of mind and peace of conscience; reconciliation to God, both respecting the way of salvation, and providential dispensations.—I often think that I am one of the richest men in Coventry; for he is not rich who wants more, but he who has enough; and like Jacob and Paul, I have enough! Yea, I have all, and abound.—I have much to bless God for; his comforts delight my soul." In 1803, he wrote to one of his grandsons, "Nothing in the creation is so important as an interest in Christ; if you are favored herewith, you are made forever. This is my consolation under the infirmities of age, that I am going home to a better country, and to a fairer and larger inheritance than ever I had in England." A week afterwards, this good man entered into his eternal rest in the 76th year of his age, coming to the grave as a shock of corn in his season. His excellent Concordance however still lives to instruct and benefit the world. It has met with general approbation for its convenience, copiousness, and accuracy; it being far more full and complete than Brown or Taylor, and less expensive than Cruden.—Memoir of Mr. Butterworth.

BUY.—To buy from men is to obtain right to, and possession of, a thing by giving a price for it. Gen. 41: 2. To buy from Christ is, under a sense of need, and a belief of their excellence and fitness for us, to receive himself and his blessings freely as the eternal portions of our souls, and to forsake whatever stands in opposition thereto. Isa. 55: 1. Rev. 3: 18. Matt. 13: 41. To buy the truth and not sell it, imports the most diligent consideration and embrace of it and cleaving to it, whatever hazard, expense or trouble it costs us. To buy the merchandise of Rome is, at the eternal hazard of our souls, to embrace her abominations; or by money, intercession, or the like, to procure antichristian dignities, offices, relics, pardons. Rev. 18: 11. God bought his chosen people by giving his Son to the death as an infinite ransom for them. 1 Cor. 6: 19. He bought the Hebrew nation in exerting his power and goodness on their behalf, bringing them from Egypt, and loading them with mercies unnumbered, that they might be his peculiar people. Dent. 32: 6. He buys professed Christians in giving them his word; and at much expense of power and goodness delivering them from heathenism, popery or profaneness, that they might serve him. 2 Pet. 2: 4. Christ bought his church by paying the infinite price which the law demanded, and therefore it is his property. Acts 20: 28. 1 Cor. 6: 14. Eph. 1: 14.—Brown.

BUXTORF, (JOHN), an eminent Calvinistic divine, was born in 1534, at Camen, in Westphalia. Being very learned in Hebrew and Chaldaic, in the acquirement of which he obtained the assistance of many learned Jews, he was engaged, by the magistrates of Basil, in the professorship of those languages, which he taught with great success. He died at Basil, in 1629. His works are, Lexicon Chaldaicum, Thalmudicum, et Rabbinicum; The-saurus Lingua Hebraica; Hebrew Bible, with the Rabbinical and Chaldaic Paraphrases, the Massora, &c.; Hebrew and Chaldaic Dictionary; Hebrew Grammar; Synagoga Judaica, a Collection of Modes and Ceremonies; Bibliotheca Rabbinica; Institutio Epistolalis Hebraica; Concordantia Hebraica, &c. &c.—Ency. Amer.

BUXTORF, (JOHN), son of the preceding, was born at Basil, in 1599, and was made professor of the Oriental languages there. He published a Chaldaic and Syriac Lexicon; Tractatus de Punctorum Vocalium et Accentuum in Libris Veteris Testamenti Hebraicis Origine, Antiquitate et Auctoritate; and Anti-Critica, seu Vindicta Veritatis Hebraica; in the two last of which he defended his father's opinions concerning the Hebrew vowel points. He was also the author of Dissertations on the Old and New Testament; Florilegium Hebraicum; Exercitationes Philologicae-criticae, &c. He died at Basil in 1664.—Ency. Amer.

BUZ, son of Nahor and Milcah, and brother of Huz, Gen. 22: 21. Eihni, one of Job's friends, was descended from Buz, son of Nahor. Scripture calls him an Aramean, or Syrian, (Job 32: 2.) where Ram is put for Aram. The prophet Jeremiah (chap. 25: 23.) threatens the Buzites, who dwelt in Arabia Deserta, with God's wrath.—Calmet.

BYZANTINE CHURCH, comprehending all the churches which acknowledge the supremacy of the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople. Of the population included within its pale, reduced as it now nearly is to the limits of Turkey in Europe, Greece, and Palestine, it is not easy to form a correct estimate. The Greek population (properly so called) of the Morea, the islands Livadia, Epirus, Thessaly, and Macedonia, cannot be estimated at more than a million and a half; and those resident in the other provinces of European Turkey, including the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, in Asiatic Turkey and Egypt, would probably be overrated at the same number. Three millions, we are inclined to think, would be a full allowance for the subjects of the universal bishop of the Eastern world.—Hend. Buck.

BYZANTINE RECENSION; the text of the Greek New Testament, as propagated within the limits of the patriarchate of Constantinople. The readings of this recension are those which are most commonly found in the koine Exodis, or common printed Greek text, and are also most numerous in the existing manuscripts which correspond to it, a very considerable additional number of which have recently been discovered and collated by Professor Scholz. The Byzantine text is found in the four Gospels of the Alexandrian manuscript; it was the original from which the Slavonian version was made, and was cited by Chrysostom and by Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria.—Horne's Introduction.

C.

CAB; a Hebrew measure, the sixth part of a seah, or satum; and the eighteenth part of an ephah. A cab contained three pints, one third of our wine measure; or two pints, five sixths of our corn measure.—Calmet.

CABALA, (Heb.) traditions. Among the Jews, it principally means the mystical interpretations of their Scriptures, handed down by tradition. The manner in which Maimonides explains the cabala, or traditions of the Jews, is as follows:—"God not only delivered the law to Moses on mount Sinai, but the explanation of it likewise. When Moses came down from the mount, and entered into his tent, Aaron went to visit him, and Moses acquainted Aaron with the laws he had received from God, together with the explanation of them. After this, Aaron placed himself at the right hand of Moses, and Eleazar and Ithamar, the sons of Aaron, were admitted, to whom Moses repeated what he had just before told to Aaron. These being seated, the one on the right, the other on the left hand of Moses, the seventy elders of Israel, who composed the sanhedrim, came in. Moses again declared the same laws to them, with the interpretations of them, as he had done before to Aaron and his sons. Lastly, all who pleased of the common people were invited to enter, and Moses instructed them likewise in the same manner as the rest. So that Aaron heard four times what Moses had been taught by God upon mount Sinai; Eleazar and Ithamar three times; the seventy elders twice; and the people once. Moses afterwards reduced the laws which he had received into writing, but not the explanations of them: these he thought it sufficient to trust to the memories of the above-mentioned persons, who, being perfectly instructed in them, delivered them to their children, and these again to theirs, from age to age."

The cabala, therefore, is properly the oral law of the Jews, delivered down, by word of mouth, from father to son; and it is to these interpretations of the written law our Savior's censure is applied, when he reproves the Jews for making the commands of God of none effect through their traditions. Mark 7:

Some of the rabbins pretend that the origin of the cabala is to be referred to the angels; that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it; that the angel Japhiel, Schem; the angel Zedekiel, Abraham, &c. But the truth is, these explanations of the law are only the several interpretations and decisions of the rabbins on the law of Moses; in the framing of which they studied principally the combinations of particular words, letters, and numbers, and by that means pretended to discover clearly the true sense of the difficult passages of Scripture.

This is properly called the artificial cabala, to distinguish it from simple tradition; and it is of three sorts. The first, called Gematric, consists in taking letters as figures, and explaining words by the arithmetical value of the letters of which they are composed. For instance, the Hebrew letters of Jabo-Schiloh, (Shiloh shall come,) make up the same arithmetical number as Mashiach (the Messiah;) from whence they conclude that Shiloh signifies the Messiah.

The second kind of artificial cabala, which is called Notaricon, consists in taking each particular letter of a word for an entire diction. For example, of Bereschith, which is the first word of Genesis, composed of the letters B, R, A, S, C, H, J, T, they make—Bara-Rakia-Arez-Schamaim-Jam-Tehomoth, i. e. he created the firmament, the earth, the heavens, the sea, and the deep; or in forming one entire diction out of the initial letters of many: thus, in Atah-Gibbor-Lealam-Adonai (thou art strong forever, O Lord,) they put the initial letters of this sentence together, and form the word Agla, which signifies either, I will reveal, or a drop of dew, and is the cabalistic name of God.

The third kind, called Themura, consists in changing and transposing the letters of a word: thus of the word Bereschith, (the first of the book of Genesis,) they make A-betisri, the first of the month Tisri, and infer from thence that the world was created on the first day of the month Tisri, which answers very nearly to our September.

The cabala, according to the Jews, is a noble and sublime science, conducting men by an easy method to the profoundest truths. Without it, the holy Scriptures could not be distinguished from profane books, wherein we find some miraculous events, and as pure morality as that of the law, if we did not penetrate into the truths locked up under the external cover of the literal sense. As men were grossly deceived, when, dwelling upon the sensible object, they mistook angels for men; so also they fall into error or ignorance, when they insist upon the surface of letters or words, which change with custom, and ascend not up to the ideas of God himself, which are infinitely more noble and spiritual.

Some visionaries, among the Jews, believe that Jesus Christ wrought his miracles by virtue of the mysteries of the cabala. Some learned men are of opinion that Pythagoras and Plato learned the cabalistic art of the Jews in Egypt: others, on the contrary, say the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato furnished the Jews with the cabala. Most of the heretics in the primitive Christian church fell into the vain conceits of the cabala, particularly the Gnostics, Valentinians, and Basilidians.—Hend. Buck.

CABALISTS; those Jewish doctors who profess the study of the cabala. In the opinion of these men, there is not a word, letter, or accent in the law, without some mystery in it. The first cabalistical author that we know of is Simon the son of Joachai, who is said to have lived a little before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. His book, entitled Zohar, is extant; but it is agreed that many additions have been made to it. The first part of this work is entitled Zenitha, or Mystery; the second, Itra Rabba, or the Great Synod; the third, Itra Lata, or the Little Synod; which is the author's adieu to his disciples.—Hend. Buck.

CABIRI, (great, powerful;) the four great gods of the ancient pagans, particularly the Samothracians. They were named Axieros, Axiokersa, Axiokersos, and Casmilus, which are explained by Bochart to be Ceres, Pluto, Proserpine, and Mercury; all children of Jupiter.—Broughton's Dict; Danet's Dict. of Ant.; Williams.

CABUL, the name which Hiram, king of Tyre, gave to the twenty cities in the land of Galilee, of which Solomon made him a present, in acknowledgment for the great services in building the temple. 1 Kings 9: 31. These cities not being agreeable to Hiram, on viewing them, he called them the land of Cabul, which in the Hebrew tongue denotes displeasing; others take it to signify binding or adhesive, from the clayey nature of the soil.—Watson.

CADARIANS, (powerful;) a sect of Mussulmen, according to D'Herbelot, who maintain free-will in opposition to fate, from which they are charged with admitting two first principles, like the Manichæans.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

CADIZADELITES; a sect of mongrel Mahometans, in their doctrine and manners resembling the ancient Stoics, and remarkably grave; believing in Mahomet as the Paraclete, yet, some of them at least, reverencing Jesus Christ, and favoring the Christians. They receive both the Bible and the Koran, practise circumcision, and scruple not to drink wine.—Ricaud's Hist. of the Ottoman Empire; Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

CALAPHAS, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon, son of Camith; and after possessing this dignity nine years, from A. M. 4029 to 4038, he was succeeded by Jonathan, son of Ananas, or Annas. Caiaphas was high-priest, A. M. 4037, which was the year of Jesus Christ's death. He married a daughter of Annas, who also is called high-priest in the gospel, because he had long enjoyed that dignity. When the priests deliberated on the seizure and death of Jesus Christ, Caiaphas declared, that there was no room for debate on that matter, "because it was expedient that one man should die for the people, that the whole nation should not perish." John 11: 49, 50. This sentiment was a prophecy, which God suffered to proceed from the mouth of the high-priest on this occasion, importing, that the death of Jesus would be for the salvation of the world. When Judas had betrayed Jesus, he was first taken before Annas, who sent him to his son-in-law, Caiaphas, who possibly lived in the same house. John 18: 24. The priests and doctors of the law there assembled to judge our Saviour, and to condemn him. The depositions of certain false witnesses being insufficient to justify a sentence of death against him, and Jesus continuing silent, Caiaphas, as high-priest, said to him, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God?" To this adjuration, so solemnly made by the superior judge, Jesus answered, "Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." On hearing these words, Caiaphas rent his clothes, saying, "What farther need have we of witnesses? Behold now you have heard his blasphemy. What think ye?" They answered, "He is worthy of death." And, as the power of life and death was not at this time in their hands, but was reserved by the Romans, they conducted him to Pilate, that he might confirm their sentence, and order his execution.

Two years after this, Vitellius, governor of Syria, coming to Jerusalem at the passover, was received very magnificently by the people. As an acknowledgment for this honor, he restored the custody of the high-priest's ornaments to the priests, he remitted certain duties raised on the fruits of the earth, and deposed the high-priest Caiaphas. From this it appears that Caiaphas had fallen under popular odium, for his deposition was to gratify the people.—Watson.

CAIN, the eldest son of Adam and Eve. He was the first man who had been a child, and the first man born of woman. For his history, as connected with that of Abel, see ABEL. The mark set upon Cain, "lest any one finding him should kill him," has been variously interpreted. Some have supposed it a change in the color of his skin, others a certain horror of countenance. The LXX. understood the passage to mean, that the Lord gave him a sign, to assure him that his life should be preserved. Whatever it was, its object was not to aggravate, but to mitigate his punishment, which may intimate that Cain had manifested repentance.

Mr. Taylor, in illustration of the history of Cain, observes: Cain had slain Abel his brother; this being a very extraordinary and embarrassing instance of guilt, and perhaps the first enormous crime among mankind which required exemplary punishment, the Lord thought proper to interpose, and to act as judge on this singularly affecting occasion. Adam might be ignorant of this guilt, ignorant by what process to detect it, and ignorant by what penalty to punish it; but the Lord (metaphorically) hears of it, by the blood which cried from the ground; and he detects it, by citing the murderer to his tribunal; where, after examination and conviction, he passes sentence on him:—"Thou art cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." And Cain said to the Lord, "Is my iniquity too great for expiation? Is there no fine, no suffering, short of such a vagabond state, that may be accepted? Behold, thou hast banished me this day from the face of the land (adamah) where I was born, where my parents dwell, my native country! and from thy presence also, in thy public worship and institutions; I must now hide myself from all my heart holds dear, being prohibited from approaching my former intimates, and thy venerable altar. I shall be a fugitive, a vagabond on the earth; and any one (in future years) who findeth me may slay me without compunction, as if I were rather a wild beast than a man." The Lord said, "I mentioned an expiation formerly, on account of your crime of ungovernable malice and anger, bidding you lay a sin-offering before the sacred entrance; but then you disregarded that admonition and command. Nevertheless, as I did not take the life of your father Adam, though forfeited, when I sat in judgment on him, but abated of that rigorous penalty; so I do not design that you should be taken off by sudden death; neither immediately from myself, nor mediately by another. I pronounce, therefore, a much heavier sentence on whoever shall destroy Cain. Moreover, to show that Cain is a person suffering under punishment, since no one else has power to do it; since he resists the justice of his fellow-men; since his crime has called me to be his judge, I shall brand his forehead with a mark of his crime; and then, whoever observes this mark will avoid his company: they will not smite him, but they will hold no intercourse with him, fearing his irascible passions may take offence at some unguarded word, and should again transport him into a fury, which may issue in bloodshed. Beside this, all mankind, wherever he may endeavor to associate, shall fear to pollute themselves by conference with him."—The meanness continually arising from this state of sequestration, led the unhappy Cain to seek repose in a distant settlement.

He retired into the land of Nod, lying east from the province of Eden. While he dwelt in this country, which is generally understood to be Susiana, or Chusistan, he had a son, whom he named Enoch, in memory of whom he built a city of the same name. This is all we learn from Scripture concerning Cain.—Watson; Calmet.

CAINAN, son of Enos, born A. M. 325, when Enos was ninety years of age. Gen. 5: 9. At the age of seventy, Canan begat Mahalalel; and died, aged nine hundred and ten, A. M. 1235.

CAINAN, a son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. He is neither in the Hebrew nor in the Vulgate of Gen. 11: 12—14, but is named between Salah and Arphaxad, in Luke 3: 36. The LXX. in Gen. 10: 24. 11: 12. admit him. Some have suggested, that the Jews suppressed the name Canan out of their copies, designing to render the LXX. and Luke suspected. Others, that Moses omitted Canan, being desirous to reckon ten generations only from Adam to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham. Others, that Arphaxad was father of both Canan and Salah; of Salah naturally, of Canan legally. Others, that Canan and Salah were the same person, under two names; thus they allege in support of that opinion which maintains Canan to be really son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. Many learned men believe, that this name was not originally in the text of Luke, but is an addition by inadvertent transcribers, who, remarking it in some copies of the LXX. added it.—Calmet.

CAINITES; a sect that sprung up about the year 130; so called, because they esteemed Cain worthy of the greatest honors. They honored those who carry in Scripture the most visible marks of reprobation; as the inhabitants of Sodom, Esau, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. They had in particular great veneration for Judas, under the pretence that the death of Christ had saved mankind.—Hend. Buck.

CAKES. The Hebrews had several sorts of cakes, which they offered in the temple, made of meal, of wheat, or of barley; kneaded sometimes with oil, sometimes with honey; sometimes only rubbed over with oil when baked, or fried with oil in a frying-pan.

For offering, these cakes were salted, but unleavened. If the cakes which were offered were baked in an oven, and sprinkled or kneaded with oil, the whole was presented to the priest, who waved the offering before the Lord, then took so much of it as was to be burned on the altar, threw that into the fire, and kept the rest himself. Lev. 2: 4. If the offering were a cake kneaded with oil, and dressed in a frying-pan, it was broken, and oil was poured on it; then it was presented to the priest, who took a handful of it, which he threw on the altar-fire, and the rest was his own. It should be observed, that oil in the East answers the purpose of butter among us in Europe.

Cakes or loaves, offered with sacrifices of beasts, as was customary, (for the great sacrifices were always accompanied by offerings of cakes, and libations of wine and oil,) were kneaded with oil. The wine and oil were not poured on the head of the animal about to be sacrificed, (as among the Greeks and Romans,) but on the fire in which the victim was consumed. Num. 28: 1, &c. The law regulated the quantity of meal, wine, and oil, for each kind of victim. See BREAD.—Calmet.

CALAH; a city of Assyria, built by Ashur. Gen. 10: 12. From it the adjacent country, on the north-east of the Tigris, and south of the Gordian mountains of Armenia, was called Callachene, or Callacide.—Watson.

CALAMUS, kanha; (Exod. 30: 23. Cant. 4: 14. Isa. 43: 24. Jer. 6: 29. Ezek. 27: 19.) an aromatic reed, growing in moist places in Egypt, in Judea, near lake Genesareth, and in several parts of Syria. It grows to about two feet in height; bearing from the root a knotted stalk, quite round, containing in its cavity a soft white pith. The whole is of an agreeable aromatic smell; and the plant is said to scent the air even while growing. When cut down, dried, and powdered, it makes an ingredient in the richest perfumes. It was used for this purpose by the Jews.

CALAMUS SCRIPTORIUS; a reed answering the purpose of a pen to write with. The ancients used styles, to write on tablets covered with wax; but reeds, to write on parchment or papyrus. The Psalmist says, "My tongue is the pen of a ready writer." 45: 1. The Hebrew signifies rather a style. The third book of Maccabees states, that the writers employed in making a list of the Jews in Egypt, produced their reeds quite worn out. Baruch wrote his prophecies with ink, (Jer. 36: 4.) and, consequently, used reeds; for it does not appear that quills were then used to write with. In 3 John 13, the apostle says, he did not design to write with pen (reed) and ink. The Arabians, Persians, Turks, Greeks, and Armenians, to this day, write with reeds, or rushes.—Watson.

CALAMY, (EDMUND,) a celebrated non-conformist divine, was born at London, in 1600, and studied at Cambridge. Having embraced Presbyterianism, he took an active part in the religious disputes of the age, and was one of the authors of the treatise which bore the title of Smectymnus, and was directed against Episcopacy. He was a member of the assembly of divines at Westminster; but he strenuously opposed the trial of the king, and the usurpation of Cromwell, and had a share in effecting the restoration of Charles the Second. The restored monarch offered him the bishopric of Litchfield, but he refused it, and he was subsequently expelled from his living by the act of uniformity. Such was the shock to his health, in consequence of the fire of London, that he is said to have died of it, in 1666. He produced many sermons and controversial writings. Calamy was a learned, yet a plain, faithful, pious, and practical preacher. On one occasion, after the restoration, when preaching before general Monk on the subject of "filthy lucre," he said, "And why is it called filthy, but because it makes men do base and filthy things? Some men will betray three kingdoms for filthy lucre's sake;" at the same time throwing his handkerchief towards the general's pew.—Davenport.

CALAMY, (EDMUND, DR.) an eminent non-conformist divine, grandson of the preceding, was born in London, April 5th, 1671. His father, bearing the same name, was one of the ministers ejected by the act of uniformity, from his living at Moreton, in Essex. His father early placed him in the merchant tailors' school, where he obtained the esteem of his master, Mr. Hartcliffe, and gained much elementary knowledge. He was subsequently instructed at the seminary of Mr. Cradock, in Suffolk, where he procured, by his talents and worth, the esteem of many persons, who afterwards attained to great eminence in the church of England. At the age of seventeen, he was removed to the university of Utrecht, and placed under the tuition of two distinguished professors, Dr. Uries and G. evius. There he studied intensely. One whole night of every week, in addition to all his protracted days, he devoted to the acquisition of knowledge. In 1691, when Principal Carstairs was sent to Holland, in quest of a gentleman to fill a professor's chair in the university of Edinburgh, he applied to Calamy, and pressed him to accept the situation; but he declined the proffered honor, though soon afterwards he returned to England, for the purpose of pursuing his studies in the Bodleian library. After studying the controversy between the conformists and non-conformists, he determined on entering the ministry among the latter, and frequently preached in the meeting-house at Oxford, and round the neighborhood. In 1672, he was requested to assist the minister of a Presbyterian congregation in Blackfriars'; and in 1673 was ordained at Little St. Helen's. In 1702, he was chosen to assist Dr. Williams, and elected one of the Tuesday lecturers at Salters' hall. In 1703, the Rev. Mr. Alsop being removed, by death, from his congregation in Westminster, Dr. Calamy succeeded him; and there, to persons of high rank and considerable knowledge and information, he for many years preached with pious ardor and wise fidelity. In 1702, he published an "Abridgment of Baxter's History of his Life and Times," and an "Apology for Non-conformists." In 1703, he answered bishop Hoadley's Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England, in a work entitled "A Defence of Moderate Non-conformity," &c. Soon after this publication, bishop Hoadley wrote a work, entitled, "A Serious Admonition to Mr. Calamy." In 1704, Mr. Calamy published the second part of his Defence of Moderate Non-conformity, which the celebrated Locke pronounced to be unanswerable. In 1705, he wrote the third part of his Defence, and added thereto a Letter to Hoadley, in reply to his "Defence of the Reasonableness of Conformity." In 1707, Hoadley published his "Defence of Episcopal Ordination," and Calamy wrote a reply to it; but that reply, from prudential motives, he did not print. In 1709, at the request of several distinguished persons in Scotland, he visited that country; was received with the highest marks of respect and esteem, and was honored by the universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, with the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1713, he published a second edition of his "Abridgment of Baxter's Life and Times," and continued, as usual, faithfully and zealously to preach to a large and attentive congregation. In 1718, he wrote a vindication of his grandfather and other ejected ministers, from the charges brought against them by Echar, in his history of England; and in 1720, his far celebrated "Non-conformists' Memorial" first made its appearance. That work contains biographical notices of the two thousand ministers, lecturers, masters, and fellows of colleges, who were ejected and silenced by the act of uniformity.

His mind was not, however, solely devoted to the cause of non-conformity, but he was often engaged in recommending the doctrines or duties of religion. In 1722, he dedicated a volume of sermons on the "Doctrine of the Holy Trinity," to the king, who ordered him to be presented with fifty pounds. He wrote a short life of Mr. Howe, published many single sermons, and left behind him the manuscript of an Historical Account of his own Life, with some Reflections on the Times in which he had lived. That account consisted of three volumes folio, and has recently been published. He died on the 3d of June, 1732, aged sixty-two.

To Dr. Calamy dissenters were much attached, in consequence of the zeal, and ability, and kindness with which he pleaded their cause; and most men allow that he was a sincere Christian, a good scholar, and a sound theologian. See Mayo's Sermon on the Death of Calamy; Calamy's Abridgment of the Life of Baxter, &c.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

CALAS, (JOHN,) an unfortunate merchant of Toulouse, of the Protestant religion. When his son, Marc Antoine, who had embraced the tenets of the Catholics, had strangled himself in a fit of melancholy, the father was seized by the suspicious government, as guilty of the murder. No proof could be offered against him, and self-evident as it was that a weak old man could not execute such a deed of violence on a youth full of strength, in a house where the family was then resident, even if the feelings of a parent were put out of the question, yet he was condemned and broken upon the wheel in 1762, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. The family of the unhappy man retired to Geneva, and Voltaire subsequently undertook to defend his memory. He succeeded in drawing public attention towards the circumstances of the case, and a revision of the trial was granted. Fifty judges once more examined the facts, and declared Calas altogether innocent.—Davenport.

CALASIO, (MARIUS,) a Franciscan friar, was born at Calasio, near Aquila, in the Neapolitan territory, about 1550. He died in 1620, just as he was on the point of publishing his Concordance of the Bible, in four folio volumes; an excellent work, which forms a complete Hebrew Lexicon, and on which he had spent forty years of incessant labor. Hebrew was as familiar to Calasio as his native language. His Concordance appeared in 1621, and was republished by Romaine, in 1747.—Davenport.

CALATRAVA, THE NUNS OF THE ORDER OF, were founded in 1219, by Don Gonsalves Yanes, grand-master of the knights of Calatrava, in Spain. They wore the habit of the Cistercians, and performed the same probations as the knights.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

CALDERARI, (braziers;) a politico-religious sect of Italy, set on foot, during the reign of Murat, in opposition to the Carbonari, which see.—Williams.

CALDERWOOD, (DAVID,) a Scotch Presbyterian divine, was born in 1575, and strenuously opposed the plan of James VI. to establish conformity between the English and Scotch churches; for which opposition he was banished. Retiring to Holland, he published, in 1625, his work, entitled Altare Damascenum; a severe attack on Episcopacy. He returned to Scotland; contributed greatly to the establishment of Presbyterianism; and died in 1651. Calderwood left a voluminous history of the church of Scotland, of which only a portion has been printed.

He was a man endowed with extraordinary powers of mind; and was, during the whole of his useful life, a firm friend to non-conformity, devoted to the cause, and continually wrote in its favor: nor was he less distinguished as a Christian than as a divine. His piety was undissembled and eminent; and though the correctness of his creed may be questioned, the sincerity of his religion must be admitted. See Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, and Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland.—Davenport; Jones's Chr. Biog.

CALDWELL, (ELIAS B.) clerk of the supreme court of the United States, graduated at Princeton in 1796, and died at Washington in May, 1825, gladdened by the promises of the religion which he professed. He zealously assisted in forming and conducting the American Colonization Society, of which he was the corresponding secretary. In honor of him, the managers of the society gave the name of Caldwell to a town in their African colony. Mr. C., in order to bring religious instruction to the untaught in the country near Washington, obtained a license to preach from the presbytery, and was accustomed to preach on the Sabbath.—African Repos. i. 126; Miss. Herald, 22: 81.; Allen.

CALEB, son of Jephunneh, a heroic prince of Judah, was sent with Joshua and others to view the land of Canaan. Num. 13. They brought with them some of the finest fruits as specimens of its productions; but some of the spies discouraging the people, they openly declared against the expedition. Joshua and Caleb encouraged them to go forward, and the Lord sentenced the whole multitude except these two to die in the desert. 14: 1—10. When Joshua invaded and conquered great part of Canaan, Caleb with his tribe came to Gilgal, and asked for a particular possession, which Joshua bestowed upon him with many blessings. ch. 14: 6—15. Caleb, therefore, with his tribe, marched against Kirjath-arba, (afterwards Hebron,) took it, and killed three giants of the race of Anak; from thence he went to Debir, or Kirjath-sepher, which was taken by Othniel; 11: 5: 13—19. Caleb is thought to have survived Joshua.—Calmel.

CALENDAR; the order and series of the months that make up a year: it comes from the word Calendæ, the name which the Romans gave to the first days of the month. The Roman calendar was composed by Romulus, founder of Rome, who being better versed in martial affairs than acquainted with the stars, made a year of ten months, whereof the first was March, then April, May, June, Quintil, called afterwards Julius, and Sextil, called also in process of time, August, September, October, November, December: he gave March, May, Quintil, and October, each thirty-one days, and but thirty each to the other six; so that altogether made but three hundred and four days. Numa Pompilius reformed this, and imitated the Grecians, to allow the year twelve lunar months, of thirty and twenty-nine days each, one after the other, which made three hundred and fifty-four days; but because he loved an uneven number, through a superstition that he held from the Egyptians, he made his of three hundred and fifty-five days, and gave it twelve months, viz. January, February, March, &c. January was of twenty-nine days, February of twenty-eight, March, May, July, and October, of thirty-one, and the other six of twenty-nine each: it did not matter, February's being an even number, because he designed it for the sacrifices that were made for the gods of hell, to which that number, because unlucky, better belonged. Numa would have the month of January, which he placed at the winter solstice, to be the beginning of the year, and not March, which Romulus placed at the equinox of the spring. He also made use of the intercalation of the Grecians, who added a supernumerary month every second year, which consisted successively of twenty-two and twenty-three days; and that to equal the civil year to the motion of the sun, which makes its revolution in three hundred and sixty-five days, and about six hours, he ordered the chief pontiffs to show the people the time and manner of inserting these extraordinary months; but whether it was through ignorance, superstition or interest, they confounded things so much, that the feasts which should be kept according to this institution at certain times, fell upon quite different seasons, as the feasts of autumn upon the spring, &c. This disorder was so great, that Julius Cæsar, dictator and sovereign pontiff, after he had won the battle of Pharsalia, did not look upon the reformation of the calendar as a thing unworthy his care. He sent for the famous astrologer, Sosigenes, from Alexandria, who ordered the year according to the course of the sun, and having composed a calendar of three hundred and sixty-five days, he left the six hours to form a day at the end of every fourth year, which day was to be inserted in the month of February, after the 24th of that month, which the Romans, according to their way of counting, called the sixth of the calends; and hence came the word bissextile, because they said twice Sexto Calendas, to imply the ten days by which the solar year of three hundred and sixty-five days surpassed Numa's of three hundred and fifty-five; he added two days to January, Sextil, and December, who had before but twenty-nine; and added to April, June, September, and November, a day to each, leaving the month of February but twenty-eight days in the ordinary years, and twenty-nine in the bissextile. And as by the negligence of those who were to order and distribute the intercalary months, the beginning of the year was found to be seventeen days before the winter solstice, and that it was then also a year of the intercalation of the month of twenty-three days, which in all made ninety; for this reason, I say, this year of the correction of the calendar by Julius Cæsar was of fifteen months, and of four hundred and forty-five days, and was therefore called the year of confusion. It is of importance to observe that this emperor, willing to accommodate himself to the humor of the Romans, who were used so long to the lunar year, began the Julian year upon a day of the new moon, which followed the winter solstice, and which was at that time eight days after it, and that was the reason why the year begun since eight days after the solstice of Capricorn. It was not hard for the Romans, who then commanded most part of the earth, to make this correction of Julius Cæsar to be received, and bring it in use amongst the remotest nations. The Grecians left off their lunar, and the intercalation of their forty-five days every fourth year. The Egyptians fixed their Thot, or the first day of their year, which before changed from one season to another; the Hebrews did the like,—so that it became the calendar of all nations. The primitive Christians kept the same name of the months, the same number of days of the months, and the intercalation of a day in the bissextile year; but took out of the Julian calendar the nundinal letters, which marked the days of assembly, or feria, and put other letters in their place to mark Sunday, and the other days of the week; and instead of the profane feasts, and the plays of the Romans, they placed in order the feasts and ceremonies of the true religion. About the beginning of the sixth age, Dennis the abbot, surnamed the Little, seeing the different customs of the eastern and western churches about the time of celebrating Easter, he composed a calendar according to the Victorian period, composed of cycles of the sun and moon, with reference to the birth of Jesus Christ; for until then the greatest part of the Christians counted their eras from the foundation of Rome, or from the consuls and emperors, always keeping to the custom of the Romans as to the beginning of the year, fixed on the first of January. This calendar of the ancient church showed precisely enough the new moon, and consequently the time of the feast of Easter; but in succeeding ages, it was discovered that this calculation did not agree altogether with the course of the sun and moon, and that the feast of Easter was no more held upon the full moon of the first month. And this error in astronomy was of evil consequence, because the feast of Easter would have insensibly fallen in winter, and then in autumn and summer. To remedy this disorder, pope Gregory XIII. sent briefs to all Christian princes, and to all famous universities, to desire them to seek means to re-establish the vernal equinox in its right place; and after he had received the opinions of all the learned, he cut off ten days in the calendar, and confirmed it with a bull in 1581, so that the day after St. Francis, which is the 4th of October, was called fifteen instead of five; by this correction, what was before the 11th of October became the 21st; and the equinox of spring, which fell upon the 2d of March, was changed to the 12th, as it was in the time of the council of Nice, in 325. The same pope found a way to hinder the like disorder for the future, in cutting off one bissextile day every hundred years. This correction was received by all those that are of the church of Rome, but has not been allowed of by the Protestants of England, Germany, &c. And there were several learned men that wrote against this reformation; amongst others Mæstlinus, professor of mathematics at Tubingen, Scaliger, and Georgius Germanus; and there was a new modelled calendar made by Mr. Viete, and presented to the pope, with his notes upon the faults that he observed in the Gregorian. This is also called the new and perpetual calendar, because the disposition of the epacts, which are substituted for the golden number, will make it of use in all times, whatever may be discovered in the motion of the stars.—Blondel; Hend. Buck.

CALENDARS; books containing the memorials of the days on which the martyrs suffered. At first, the calendar contained the mention of the martyrs only; but, in the course of time, the confessors, or those who, without arriving at the glory of martyrdom, had confessed their faith in Christ, by their heroic virtues, were admitted to the same honor. The calendars were preserved in the churches. A calendar of the church of Rome was published by Boucher, another by Allatius, a third by Joannes Wanto, chancellor of Paris. A most ancient calendar of the church of Carthage was published by Mabillon. But the principal work of this kind is Joseph Assemann's "Calendar of the Universal Church, illustrated with notes."—Butler's Life of Alban Butler; Henderson's Buck.

CALENDERS; Mahometan friars, so called from Santon Calenderi, their founder, who went bare-headed, and clothed in the skins of wild beasts, whom they resembled in their morals, or rather want of morals.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

CALEPODIUS; a Christian minister of Rome, who suffered martyrdom in the persecution of the emperor Maximinus. After being inhumanly treated, and barbarously dragged about the streets, a millstone was fastened about his neck, and he was thrown into the river Tiber, A. D. 235.—Foz.

CALIGULA, (Caius,) emperor of Rome, succeeded Tiberius, A. D. 37; and reigned three years, nine months, and twenty-eight days. It does not appear that he molested the Christians. Caius having commanded Petronius, governor of Syria, to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem, for the purpose of adoration, the Jews so vigorously opposed it, that, fearing a sedition, he suspended the order. He was killed by Cereas, one of his guards, while coming out of the theatre, A. D. 41, in the fourth year of his reign; and was succeeded by Claudius.—Calmet.

CALISTUS; a bishop of Rome, who suffered martyrdom, A. D. 224. The manner of his death is not recorded.—Foz.

CALIXTUS, properly CALISEN, (GEORGE;) the most able and enlightened theologian of the Lutheran church in the seventeenth century, was born in 1586, at Melby, in Holstein, and educated at Flensburg and Helmstadt. In 1607, in the latter university, he turned his thoughts to theology; in 1609, visited the universities of the south of Germany; in 1612, those of Holland, England, and France, where his intercourse with different religious parties, and the greatest scholars of his time, developed that independence and liberality of opinion, for which he was distinguished. After a brilliant victory, in 1614, in a dispute with the Jesuit Murianus, he was made professor of theology, and died in 1656. His treatises on the authority of the Holy Scriptures, transubstantiation, celibacy, supremacy of the pope, and the Lord's supper, belong, even according to the judgment of learned Catholics, to the most profound and acute writings against Catholicism. But his genius, and the depth of his exegetic and historical knowledge, exposed him to the persecutions of the zealots of his time. His assertion that the points of difference between Calvinists and Lutherans were of less importance than the doctrines in which they agreed, and that the doctrine of the Trinity was less distinctly expressed in the Old Testament than in the New, and his recommendation of good works, drew upon him the reproaches of crypto-papism. His heresy was termed Syncretism. See below. The elector John George I. of Saxony, protected him, in 1655, at the diet of Ratisbon, against the Lutheran theologians. His historical investigations and his philosophical spirit shed new light on dogmatic theology and the exegesis of the Bible, and gave them a more scientific form. He made Christian morality a distinct branch of science, and by reviving the study of the Christian fathers, and of the history of the church, prepared the way for Spener, Thomasius, and Semler. He educated his son, Frederick Ulrick Calixtus, and many other enlightened theologians.—Ency. Amer.

CALIXTINS; a branch of the Hussites in Bohemia and Moravia, in the fifteenth century. The principal point in which they differed from the church of Rome, was the use of the chalice (calix,) or communicating in both kinds. Calixtins was also a name given to those among the Lutherans who followed the opinions of George Calixtus, a celebrated divine in the seventeenth century, who endeavored to unite the Romish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic churches, in the bonds of charity and mutual benevolence. He maintained, 1. That the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, by which he meant those elementary principles whence all its truths flow, were preserved pure in all three communions, and were contained in that ancient form of doctrine that is vulgarly known by the name of the apostles' creed. 2. That the tenets and opinions which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors during the first five centuries, were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of Scripture.—Hend. Buck.

CALL; to name a person or thing, Acts 11: 26. Rom. 7: 3. 2. To cry to another for help; and hence, to pray. The first passage in the Old Testament in which we meet with this phrase, is Gen. 4: 26, where we read, "Then began men to call on the name of the Lord;" or Jehovah; the meaning of which seems to be, that they then first begun to worship him in public assemblies. In both the Old and New Testament, to call upon the name of the Lord, imports invoking the true God in prayer, with a confession that he is Jehovah, that is, with an acknowledgment of his essential and incommunicable attributes. In this view the phrase is applied to the worship of Christ. Acts 2: 21. 7: 59. 9: 14. 22: 16. Rom. 10: 12. 1 Cor. 1: 2.—Watson.

CALLING. Divines have disputed much in modern times concerning "the calls and invitations of the gospel;" and difficulties have been started about reconciling them with the scripture doctrines of election and particular redemption. Many, no doubt, have obscured and perverted the doctrine of divine grace by what have been termed ministerial calls, and exhortations, and gospel offers. Persons, while in a state of unbelief, have been directed what they should do in order to work themselves into a converted state, and become qualified for trusting in Christ. Faith has been represented as some laborious exercise of the mind; and sinners have been urged to strive hard to perform the great work of believing, that they may be justified. These things are unquestionably both improper and pernicious; because instead of exhibiting Christ as the immediate, the free, and the all-sufficient relief of the guilty, they convert the gospel into a law of works, and give the sinner as much to do, in order to obtain an interest in Christ and his salvation, as if he were to obey the whole law.

1. But though the calls of the gospel may have been misrepresented, and converted into a self-righteous system, nothing is more plain than that there are invitations, calls, and exhortations addressed to unbelievers, in the Scriptures. Such are Isa. 55: 1—4. Matt. 11: 28. John 7: 37. Rev. 22: 16, 17. Christ represents the preaching of the gospel under the similitude of inviting persons to a marriage supper, where every thing was prepared and ready for their use. Matt. 22: 2—15. Luke 14: 16—24. Paul speaks of himself and fellow-apostles as Christ's ambassadors, commissioned by him to beseech, to pray, and to entreat men to be reconciled to God. 2 Cor. 5: 18—21. And this corresponds with the words in the parable, "Compel them to come in." Luke 14: 23. No doubt, this compulsion is only to be effected by persuasion, the forcible persuasion of truth; and there is in the gospel testimony and promise every thing that is calculated to promote that object. If indeed the gospel resembled some cold mathematical problem which persons might examine and re-examine, and then lay aside as a thing in which they had no immediate interest or concern, it would be as supposed; but if we reflect upon its important and interesting nature to every one who hears it, and how deeply their present peace and final happiness are involved in the reception which they give it, we must at once perceive how much the state of the question becomes thereby altered; for "it is not only a faithful saying, but a saying that is worthy of all acceptation," that is, supremely excellent and desirable, "that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." 1 Tim. 1: 15. Accordingly, when the first preachers of the word went abroad among the nations as the heralds of salvation, they pressed home the doctrine of reconciliation upon men, declaring that God was now accessible to sinners by the death of his Son; and they urged this as the grand motive and argument why men should be reconciled unto God: and these things they enforced upon their consciences with a view to excite their affections, their hopes and their fears. On the other hand, "knowing the terrors of the Lord, they persuaded men" to flee from the wrath to come, awakening the careless and unconcerned to a proper consideration of their state, and of the danger they incurred in rejecting the great salvation. They, at the same time, set before them the glorious suitableness and freedom of that salvation, the evidence by which it is supported, and the happiness which results from enjoying it; thus alluring them by the mercies of God; and in all this, addressing themselves, not merely to the speculative fancy, but "to every man's conscience as in the sight of God." 2 Cor. 4: 2. Thus they "compelled them to come in." And the divine wisdom and condescension were equally manifested in this; for we often see the pressing invitations and importunate entreaties, even of our fellow-creatures, influencing the most obdurate minds, when every other method has proved ineffectual. And to this method the blessed God hath condescended to have recourse, to work upon the human mind, in sending the message of peace, pardon, and reconciliation among his rebellious creatures. Thus far both the Arminian and the Calvinist are agreed.

2. If now the word of God does contain invitations, calls, and entreaties to sinners, while dead in trespasses and sins, to repent and believe the gospel: and if, on the other hand, it asserts that no man can come unto Christ, or believe in him, except the Father draw him; neither of which propositions can be denied; then, certainly, the difficulty which we may feel in harmonizing them, should not influence us to deny the truth of either. We ought rather to confess our ignorance, and leave it to God to harmonize these apparent difficulties, and to justify his own ways to man. The Arminian, it is true, has his theory for this purpose, and the Calvinist has his; but neither, it seems, has yet given universal satisfaction. The Arminian, dissatisfied with the obvious distinction between a natural and a moral inability, pleads for sufficient grace to all; to which the Calvinist replies, that this hypothesis, while denying in every case that of sovereign efficiency, ascribes to man and not to God, the very turning point of his own salvation. See ARMINIANISM, and CALVINISM.

3. "On this difficult question," says a late writer, "what must we answer? Must we say that God could not foresee the event? This cannot be admitted without doing injustice to his perfections as well as to Scripture, which foresaw and foretold the rejection of the Messiah by the Jews, and the rejection of the Jews for murdering the Messiah. Must we say that God expostulates with none but the elect? But this is rather cutting the knot than untying it. Must we then say that God is insincere in addressing them? This is dreadful: for if God can speak falsely, dangerous is the state of those who trust him. Neither of these inferences can be admitted; indeed it would answer no end; for to admit either of these, is to plunge ourselves into a thousand difficulties for the sake of removing one. Let us then rest, where we ought to rest. Let us believe the Scripture propositions to be true, and, applying ourselves to practice, let us leave the manner of reconciling them to God. I call it but the shadow of a difficulty; for indeed a man must know very little of God, very little of himself, and very little of Scripture, not to know that two truths may be both certain, and yet the harmony of them be beyond his comprehension.

4. There is then a universal call of the gospel to all men; for wherever it comes, it is the voice of God's Spirit to those who hear it, calling them to repent and believe the divine testimony unto the salvation of their souls; and it leaves them inexcusable in rejecting it. John 3: 14—19. Heb. 10: 26—29. This universal call, however, is not inseparably connected with salvation; for it is in reference to that, that Christ says, "Many are called, but few are chosen." Matt. 22: 14.

5. Though these words, therefore, are well understood, as they occur in general use, it must nevertheless be apparent to all who read the New Testament with attention, that they have a sacred and appropriate signification as used by the evangelists and apostles, the proper understanding of which is of considerable importance. For the Scripture also speaks of a calling which is effectual, and which consequently is more than the outward ministry of the word; yea, more than some of its partial and temporary effects upon many who hear it, for it is always ascribed to God's making his word effectual through the enlightening and sanctifying influences of his Holy Spirit. In the golden chain of spiritual blessings which the apostle enumerates in Rom. 8: 30, originating in the divine predestination, and terminating in the bestowment of eternal glory on the heirs of salvation, that of CALLING forms an important link. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called, and whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified." Thus it is said, "Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but God giveth the increase." 1 Cor. 3: 6, 7. Again, he is said to have "opened the heart of Lydia, that she attended to the doctrine of Paul." Acts 16: 14. Hence, faith is said to be the gift of God. Eph. 2: 8. Phil. 1: 29. The Spirit takes of the things of Christ, and shows them to men, (John 16: 14,) and thus opens their eyes, turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Acts 26: 18. And so God saves his people, not by works of righteousness which they have done, but according to his mercy, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit. Titus 3: 5. Thus they are saved, and called with an holy calling, not according to their works, but according to the divine purpose and grace which was given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. 2 Tim 1: 9. It is evident that in these and the like passages, the term calling has much the same meaning as conversion; only that it more forcibly suggests the idea of the Gospel as the instrument, and of God as the author. See also Rom. 1: 6 8: 28, 30

9: 11, 23, 24. 11: 29. 1 Cor. 1: 24—31. 1 Thess. 1: 5. 2 Thess. 2: 14. Every unbiased mind must admit this conclusion.

6. Effectual calling has been more particularly defined by the call of the gospel, accompanied with the inward work of God's Spirit, whereby convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds with the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel. This may further be considered as a call from darkness to light, (1 Pet. 2: 9.); from bondage to liberty, (Gal. 2: 13.); from the fellowship of the world to the fellowship of Christ, (1 Cor. 1: 9.); from misery to happiness, (1 Cor. 7: 15.); from sin to holiness, (1 Thes. 4: 7.); finally, from all created good to the enjoyment of eternal felicity. 1 Pet. 5: 10. It is considered in the Scripture as an holy calling, (2 Tim. 1: 9.); an high calling, (Phil. 3: 14.); an heavenly calling, (Heb. 3: 1.); and without repentance, as God will never cast off any who are once drawn to him. Rom. 11: 29.—Jones; Watson; Buck; Gill; Ridgeley; Bennet; McLean; Fuller.

CALLENDER, (ELISHA,) minister of the first Baptist church in Boston, was the son of Ellis Callender, who was a member as early as 1669, and minister of the same church from 1708 till 1726. In early life the blessings of divine grace were imparted to him. He was graduated at Harvard college in the year 1710. At his ordination, May 21, 1718, Drs. Increase and Cotton Mather and Mr. Webb, though of a different denomination, gave their assistance. He was very faithful and successful in the pastoral office till his death, March 31, 1738. He was succeeded by Mr. Condy. A few days before his death he said, "When I look on one hand, I see nothing but sin, guilt, and discouragement; but when I look on the other, I see my glorious Savior, and the merits of his precious blood, which cleanseth from all sin. I cannot say, that I have such transports of joy, as some have had; but through grace I can say, I have gotten the victory over death and the grave." The last words which fell from his lips were, "I shall sleep in Jesus." His life was unspotted; his conversation was always affable, religious, and dignified; and his end was peaceful and serene.—Backus's Hist. of New England, iii. 124; Boston Eve. Post, April 3, 1738; Allen; Benedict.

CALLENDER, (JOHN,) an eminent Baptist minister and writer in Rhode Island, was a nephew of Elisha Callender, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1723. He was ordained colleague with Mr. Peckam as pastor of the church at Newport, Oct. 13, 1731. This was the second Baptist church in America. It was founded in the year 1644. Mr. Callender died January 26, 1748, aged forty-one. He was a man of very considerable powers of mind, and of accomplished education. The purity and evangelical simplicity of his doctrine, confirmed and embellished by the virtuous and devout tenor of his life, endeared him to his flock, and justly conciliated the esteem of all the wise, worthy, and good. Humanity, benevolence, and charity breathed in his conversation. He was distinguished equally for his candor and piety. He collected many papers relating to the history of the Baptists in this country, which were used by Mr. Backus. A century after the deed of Rhode Island was obtained of the Narragansett Indians, he delivered at Newport, March 24, 1738, a sermon on the history of the colony, which was published in 1739, with additions. This historical discourse, usually called the Century Sermon, brings down the history of Rhode Island and Providence plantations, from 1637 to the end of the first century. This is but a small work; yet it is the only history of Rhode Island which has been written, and it is honorable to its author. He published also a sermon at the ordination of Jeremiah Condy, 1739, and a sermon on the death of Mr. Clap of Newport, 1745.—Backus's Hist. of New England, iii. 229; Allen; Benedict.

CALMET, (AUGUSTINE,) an erudite divine and critic, and a monk of the Benedictine order, was born near Commercy, in Lorraine, in 1672; became abbot of St. Leopold, near Nancy, and, afterwards, of Senones; and died in 1757. Calmet is a voluminous author, and his works abound in information; but they are exceedingly prolix, and written in an ungraceful style. The most popular of his numerous productions is, a Historical and Critical Dictionary of the Bible, in four volumes quarto, which, in a compressed form, has been naturalized in the English and other languages.—Davenport.

CALNEH; a city in the land of Shinar, built by Nimrod, and one of the cities mentioned, Gen. 10: 10., as belonging to his kingdom. It is believed to be the same with Calno, mentioned in Isa. 10: 9. It is said by the Chaldee interpreters, as also by Eusebius and Jerome, to be the same with Ctesiphon, standing upon the Tigris, about three miles distant from Seleucia, and that for some time it was the capital city of the Parthians. Bochart, Wells, and Michaëlis agree in this opinion.—Watson.

CALOYERS; a general name given to the monks of the Greek church. It is taken from the Greek kalogerioi, which signifies good old men. These religious consider Basil as their father and founder, and look upon it as a crime to follow any other rule than his. There are three degrees among them—the novices, who are called Archari; the ordinary professed, called Microchemi; and the more perfect, called Megalochemi. They are likewise divided into Cœnobites, Anchorites, and Recluses.

The cœnobites are employed in reciting their office from midnight to sunset; and as it is impossible, in so long an exercise, they should not be overtaken with sleep, there is one monk appointed to wake them; and they are obliged to make three genuflections at the door of the choir, and, returning, to bow to the right and left to their brethren. The anchorites retire from the conversation of the world, and live in hermitages in the neighborhood of the monasteries. They cultivate a little spot of ground, and never go out but on Sundays and holidays, to perform their devotions at the next monastery: the rest of the week they employ in prayer and working with their hands. As for the recluses, they shut themselves up in grottos and caverns on the tops of mountains, which they never go out of, abandoning themselves entirely to Providence. They live on the alms sent them by the neighboring monasteries.

In the monasteries, the religious rise at midnight, and repeat a particular office, called from thence Mesonycticon, which takes up the space of two hours; after which, they retire to their cells till five o'clock in the morning, when they return to the church to say matins. At nine o'clock, they repeat the terce, sexte, and mass; after which they repair to the refectory, where is a lecture read till dinner. Before they leave the refectory, the cook comes to the door, and, kneeling down, demands their blessing. At four o'clock in the afternoon, they say vespers; and at six, go to supper. After supper they say an office, from thence called apodipho; and, at eight, each monk retires to his chamber and bed till midnight. Every day, after matins, they confess their faults on their knees to their superior.

They have four lents. The first and greatest is that of the resurrection of our Lord. They call it the grand quarantain, and it lasts eight weeks. During this lent, the religious drink no wine, and their abstinence is so great, that, if they are obliged, in speaking, to name milk, butter, or cheese, they always add this parenthesis, Timitis agias saracostis, i. e. saving the respect due to the holy lent. The second lent is that of the holy apostles, which begins eight days after Whitsunday; its duration is not fixed, it continuing sometimes three weeks, and at other times longer. During this lent, they are allowed to drink wine. The third lent is that of the Assumption of the Virgin; it lasts fourteen days, during which they abstain from fish, excepting on Sundays, and the day of the transfiguration of our Lord. The fourth lent is that of Advent, which they observe after the same manner as that of the apostles.

The caloyers, besides the usual habit of the monastic life, wear over their shoulders a square piece of stuff, on which are represented the cross, and the other marks of the passion of our Savior, with these letters, JC. XC. NC. i. e. Jesus Christus vincit.

All the monks are obliged to labor for the benefit of their monastery, as long as they continue in it. Some have the care of the fruits, others of the grain, and others of the cattle. The necessity the caloyers are under of cultivating their own lands, obliges them to admit a great number of lay-brothers, who are employed the whole day in working.

Over all these caloyers there are visiters or exarchs, who visit the convents under their inspection, only to draw from them the sums which the patriarch demands of them. Yet, notwithstanding the taxes these religious are obliged to pay, both to their patriarch and to the Turks, their convents are very rich.

The most considerable monastery of the Greek caloyers in Asia, is that of mount Sinai, which was founded by the emperor Justinian, and endowed with sixty thousand crowns revenue. The abbot of this monastery, who is also an archbishop, has under him two hundred religious. This convent is a large square building, surrounded with walls fifty feet high, and with but one gate, which is blocked up to prevent the entrance of the Arabs. On the eastern side there is a window, through which those within draw up the pilgrims in a basket, which they let down by a pulley. Not many miles beyond this, they have another, dedicated to St. Catharine. It is situated in the place where Moses made the bitter waters sweet. It has a garden, with a plantation of more than ten thousand palm trees, from whence the monks draw a considerable revenue. There is another in Palestine, four or five leagues from Jerusalem, situated in the most barren place imaginable. The gate of the convent is covered with the skins of crocodiles, to prevent the Arabs setting fire to it, or breaking it to pieces with stones. It has a large tower, in which there is always a monk, who gives notice by a bell of the approach of the Arabs, or any wild beasts.

The caloyers, or Greek monks, have a great number of monasteries in Europe; among which that of Penteli, a mountain of Attica, near Athens, is remarkable for its beautiful situation, and a very good library. That of Callinachus, a principal town of the island of Chios, is remarkable for the occasion of its foundation. It is called Niamogni, i. e. the sole Virgin, its church having been built in memory of an image of the holy virgin, miraculously found on a tree, being the only one left of several which had been consumed by fire. Constantine Monomachus, emperor of Constantinople, being informed of this miracle, made a vow to build a church in that place, if he recovered his throne, from which he had been driven; which he executed in the year 1050. The convent is large, and built in the manner of a castle. It consists of about two hundred religious, and its revenues amount to sixty thousand piastres, of which they pay five hundred yearly to the grand seignior.

There is in Amourgo, one of the islands of the Archipelago, called Sporades, a monastery of Greek caloyers, dedicated to the Virgin; it is a large and deep cavern, on the top of a very high hill, and is entered by a ladder of fifteen or twenty steps. The church, refectory, and cells of the religious who inhabit this grotto, are dug out of the sides of the rock with admirable artifice.

But the most celebrated monasteries of Greek caloyers are those of mount Athos, in Macedonia. They are twenty-three in number; and the religious live in them so regularly, that the Turks themselves have a great esteem for them, and often recommend themselves to their prayers. Every thing in them is magnificent; and, notwithstanding they have been under the Turk for so long a time, they have lost nothing of their grandeur. The principal of these monasteries are De la Panagia and Anna Laura. The religious, who aspire to the highest dignities, come from all parts of the East, to perform here their novitiate, and, after a stay of some years, are received, upon their return into their own country, as apostles.

The caloyers of mount Athos have a great aversion to the pope, and relate, that a Roman pontiff, having visited their monasteries, had plundered and burned some of them, because they would not adore him.

There are female caloyers, or Greek nuns, who likewise follow the rule of Basil. Their nunneries are always dependent on some monastery. The Turks buy sashes of their working, and they open their gates freely to the Turks on this occasion. Those of Constantinople are widows, some of whom have had several husbands. They make no vow, nor confine themselves within their convents. The priests are forbidden, under severe penalties, to visit these religious.—Hend. Buch.

CALVARY; or, as it is called in Hebrew, Golgotha, "a skull," or "place of skulls," supposed to be thus denominated from the similitude it bore to the figure of a skull or man's head, or from its being a place of burial. It was a small eminence or hill to the north of mount Sion, and to the west of old Jerusalem, upon which our Lord was crucified. The ancient summit of Calvary has been much altered, by reducing its level in some parts, and raising it in others, in order to bring it within the area of a large and irregular building, called "The Church of the Holy Sepulchre," which now occupies its site. But in doing this, care has been taken that none of the parts connected with the crucifixion should suffer any alteration. The same building also incloses within its spacious walls several other places reputed sacred. The places which claim the chief attraction of the Christian visitant of this church, and those only perhaps which can be relied on, are, the spot on which the crucifixion took place, and the sepulchre in which our Lord was afterwards laid. The first has been preserved without mutilation: being a piece of ground about ten yards square, in its original position; and so high above the common floor of the church, that there are, according to Chateaubriand, twenty-one steps to ascend up to it. Mr. Buckingham describes the present mount as a rock, the summit of which is ascended by a steep flight of eighteen or twenty steps from the common level of the church, which is equal with that of the street without; and besides this, there is a descent of thirty steps, from the level of the church, into the chapel of St. Helena, and by eleven more to the place where the cross was said to be found. On this little mount is shown the hole in which the cross was fixed; and near it, the position of the crosses of the two thieves: one, the penitent, on the north; and the other on the south. Here, also, is shown a cleft in the rock, said to have been caused by the earthquake which happened at the crucifixion. The sepulchre, distant, according to Mr. Jolliffe, forty-three yards from the cross, presents rather a singular and unexpected appearance to a stranger; who, for such a place, would naturally expect to find an excavation in the ground, instead of which, he perceives it altogether raised, as if artificially, above its level. The truth is, that in the alterations which were made on Calvary, to bring all the principal places within the projected church, the earth around the sepulchre was dug away; so that, what was originally a cave in the earth has now the appearance of a closet or grotto above ground. The sepulchre itself is about six feet square and eight high. There is a solid block of the stone left in excavating the rock, about two feet and a half from the floor, and running along the whole of the inner side; on which the body of our Lord is said to have been laid. This, as well as the rest of the sepulchre, is now faced with marble: partly from the false taste which prevailed in the early ages of Christianity, in disguising with profuse and ill-suited embellishments the spots rendered memorable in the history of its Founder, and partly, perhaps, to preserve it from the depredations of the visitants. This description of the holy sepulchre will but ill accord with the notions entertained by some English readers of a grave; but a cave or grotto, thus excavated on rocky ground, on the side of a hill, was the common receptacle for the dead among the eastern nations. Such was the tomb of Christ; such that of Lazarus; and such are the sepulchres still found in Judea and the east.* It may be useful further to observe, that it was customary with Jews of property to provide a sepulchre of this kind on their own ground, as the place of their interment after death; and it appears that Calvary itself, or the ground immediately around it, was occupied with gardens; one of which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, who had then recently caused a new sepulchre to be made for himself. It was this sepulchre, so close at hand, and so appropriate, which he resigned for the use of our Lord; little thinking perhaps, at the time, how soon it would again be left vacant for its original purpose by his glorious resurrection.

So much for the similarities between the evangelists' description of the sacred places and those appearances which they now present: it remains to inquire, what proof we have that their localities were accurately preserved. It is certain that many thousands of strangers resorted every year to Jerusalem, for purposes of devotion, who would find themselves interested, in a more than ordinary degree, in the transactions which that city had lately witnessed, and with the multitudinous reports concerning them, which were of a nature too stupendous to be concealed. The language of Luke (24: 28.) plainly imports wonder that so much as a single pilgrim to the holy city could be ignorant of late events; and Paul appeals to Agrippa's knowledge, that "these things were not done in a corner." It is, in short, impossible, that the natural curiosity of the human mind—to adduce no superior principle—should be content to undergo the fatigues of a long journey to visit Jerusalem, and yet, when there, should refrain from visiting the scenes of the late astonishing wonders. So long as access to the temple was free, so long would Jews and proselytes from all nations pay their devotions there; and so long would the inquisitive, whether converts to Christianity, or not, direct their attention to mount Calvary, with the garden and sepulchre of Joseph. The apostles were at hand, to direct all inquiries; neither James nor John could be mistaken; and during more than thirty years, the localities would be ascertained beyond a doubt, by the participators and the eye-witnesses themselves.

It is worth our while to examine the evidence in proof of the continued veneration of the Christians for the holy places, which should properly be divided into two periods; the first to the time of Adrian's Ælia; the second from that time to the days of Constantine. Jerome, writing to Marcella concerning this custom, has this remarkable passage: (Ep. 17. ad Marcell.) "During the whole time from the ascension of the Lord to the present day, through every age as it rolled on, as well bishops, martyrs, and men eminently eloquent in ecclesiastical learning, came to Jerusalem; thinking themselves deficient in religious knowledge, unless they adored Christ in those places from which the gospel dawn burst from the cross." It is a pleasing reflection that the leading men in the early Christian communities were thus diligent in acquiring the most exact information. They spared no pains to obtain the sacred books in their complete and perfect state, and to satisfy themselves by ocular inspection, so far as possible, of the truth of those facts on which they built the doctrine they delivered to their hearers. So Melito, bishop of Sardis, (A. D. 170.) writes to Onesimus, "When I went into the East, and was come to the place where those things were preached and done:"—so we read that Alexander, bishop of Cappadocia, (A. D. 211.) going to Jerusalem for the sake of prayer, and to visit the sacred places, was chosen assistant bishop of that city. This seems to have been the regular phraseology on such occasions; for to this cause Sozomen ascribes the visit of Helena to Jerusalem, for the sake of prayer, and to visit the sacred places."

This may properly introduce the second period in this history, on which we lay great stress;—it is no longer the testimony of friends; it is the testimony of enemies; it is the record of their determination to destroy to their utmost every vestige of the gospel of Christ. On that determination we rest our confidence; they could not be mistaken; and their endeavors guide our judgment. Jerome says, (Ess. 13. ad Paulin.) "From the time of Hadrian to that of the government of Constantine, about the space of one hundred and eighty years, in the place of the resurrection was set up an image of Jupiter; in the rock of the cross a marble statue of Venus was stationed, to be worshipped by the people; the authors of these persecutions supposing, that they should deprive us of our faith in the resurrection and the cross, if they could but pollute the holy places by idols. Bethlehem, now our most venerable place, and that of the whole world, of which the Psalmist sings, 'Truth is sprung out of the earth,' was overshadowed by the grove of Thammuz, i. e. of Adonis; and in the cave where once the Messiah appeared as an infant, the lover of Venus was loudly lamented." This is a general account of facts; a few additional hints may be gleaned from other writers.

Sozomen is more particular. We learn from him, that "the Gentiles by whom the church was persecuted, in the very infancy of Christianity, labored by every art, and in every manner, to abolish it: the holy place they blocked up with a vast heap of stones; and they raised that to a great height, which before had been of considerable depth; as it may now be seen. And moreover, the entire place, as well of the resurrection, as of Calvary, they surrounded by a wall, stripping it of all ornament. And first they overlaid the ground with stones, then they built a temple of Venus on it, and set up an image of the goddess. And that the evidence of this desecration should not rest on "monkish historians," Providence has preserved incontestable witnesses in the medals of Adrian, which mark him as the founder of the new city, Ælia, and exhibit a temple of Jupiter, another of Venus, and various other deities, all worshipped in it.

It is evident, that if the rock of Calvary and the holy sepulchre were surrounded by the same wall, as Sozomen asserts, they could not be far distant from each other; and this wall, with the temples and other sacra it inclosed, would not only mark these places, but, in a certain sense, would preserve them; as the mosque of Omar preserves the site of the temple of Solomon, at this day. While, therefore, we abandon to the doubts of Dr. Clarke and Capt. Light the commemorative altars and stations, which we think it not worth while to defend, and while we heartily wish that all these places had been left in their original state, to tell their own story, we must be allowed to relieve the memory of Helena, the Christian empress, from the guilt of deforming by intentional honors these sacred localities; and the monks, however ignorant or credulous, from the imputation of imposing on their pilgrims and visitors, in respect to the site of the places they now show as peculiarly holy.

On the whole, we are called to admire the proofs yet preserved to us by Providence, of transactions in these localities nearly two thousand years ago. Facts which, for centuries, employed the artifices and the power of the supreme government in church and state, of the Jewish hierarchy, and of the Roman emperors, to subvert,—to destroy the evidences of,—yet the evidences defied their malignity;—of the barbarians—Saracens and Turks to demotish; but they still survive;—of heathen philosophy, and sot-disant modern philosophy, to annul, but in vain. The labors of Julian to re-edify the temple continue almost living witnesses of his discomfiture. The sepulchres of the soldiers who fell in assaulting Jerusalem, remain speaking evidences of the destruction of the city, according to prediction, by the Romans. The holy sepulchre stands, a traditional memorial of occurrences too incredible to obtain credit, unless supported by super-human testimony. Or, if that be thought dubious, mount Calvary certainly exists, with features so distinct, so peculiar to itself, and unlike every thing else around it, that in spite of the ill-judged labors of honest enthusiasm, of the ridiculous tales of superstition, and the nummery of ignorance and arrogance, we have only to compare the original records of our faith with circumstances actually existing; to demonstrate that the works on which our belief relies were actually written in the country, at the times, and by the persons—eye-witnesses—which they purport to be.

CALVARY!

Thy name to me is balm. On thee my thoughts
Repose the livelong day; and when at night
Deep sleep descends on men, my thoughts awake
To muse upon thy wonders. Round thy Cross
Twine my eternal hopes, and flourish there.

Watson; Calmet.

CALVIN, (JONV.) was born July 10, 1500, at Noyon, in Picardy. His father, Gerard, was neither distinguished by affluence nor learning; but by his judicious, prudent and upright conduct, he obtained, as he merited, the patronage of the Montmor family, in Picardy. Calvin was educated, in early life, under their roof; and afterwards studied some subsequent years at the college de la Marche, in Paris, under the tuition of Marturin Cordier, for whose learned and pious instructions he entertained the most sincere and grateful recollection. From the college de la Marche, he proceeded to that of Montaign; and whilst he advanced in the attainment of profound knowledge, he became increasingly pious. His father, accurately estimating his talents, and wisely attending to the peculiar habits of his mind, obtained for him, when only twenty years of age, the rectory of Pont L'Evêque, at Noyon, and a benefice in the cathedral church. For some reason, however, which it appears impossible accurately to ascertain, Calvin afterwards directed the energies of his mind to the study of the law at Orleans, under the direction of the celebrated civilian, Pierre de l'Etoile, and attained a proficiency in the science which astonished his contemporaries. The death of his father compelled his return to Noyon, and for a short time retarded his studies. But revisiting Paris, he again renewed them; and, at the age of twenty-four, published his Commentary on the celebrated work of Seneca on Clemency. Calvin had already discovered the absurdities of popery, and freely written on them to his friends; and by his intimacy with Nicholas Cop, who about this time was summoned before the French court, for having exposed the errors of the national religion, had raised many suspicions against him, and his flight to Basle became necessary. The revival of letters, and the exertions of Luther and Melancthon, two celebrated reformers, combined at this era to encourage a disposition which prevailed, to investigate the doctrines of the church of Rome, and assisted in effecting a reformation, which all wise men must applaud, and at which all good men must rejoice. From Paris, Calvin directed his footsteps to Xaintonge, and in its retirement pursued his studies in theology; composed some formulae, to be used as homilies; and, above all, grew in personal holiness, and thus prepared his mind for his future labors in the cause of truth. Calvin then visited Nerac; resided some time with Jacques le Fevre d'Estaples, who was formerly the instructor of the offspring of Francis the First; and then revisited Paris. In the succeeding year, Francis the First determined, if possible, to extinguish the spark of reformation in Paris; directed not merely the torture, but the death, of many eminent and pious individuals, of both sexes, for their antipathy to a church which they considered as idolatrous, and to rites and ceremonies which they regarded as superstitious. From such scenes the mind of Calvin revolted. From such a church he was determined to separate. He therefore published "La Psychopannische," or a refutation of the doctrine, that the souls of the just sleep till the general resurrection;—and he then fled the kingdom. He retired to Basle, and devoted, with Simoa Grinee, much time to the study of Hebrew.

The apology made by Francis the First for the persecution of the reformed, and which was, that they were bad citizens, disobedient subjects, and clamorous anabaptists, at this time excited the holy displeasure of Calvin, and he published his "Christian Institutes," dedicating them to Francis. In Italy, about the same period, the principles of the Reformation began to dawn; and the reformer, beholding with the purest satisfaction, the first beams of a clearer light, hastened to that country; and, aided by the wise and accomplished daughter of Louis XII., the duchess de Ferrare, he assisted in promoting the spread of the Protestant faith. At the town of Piedmont, he ventured publicly to preach the doctrines of the Reformation; but, in the commencement of the year 1536, he was compelled to quit this scene of his labors. In the autumn of the same year he visited Geneva; was prevailed on by Farel and Pierre Viret, to settle there; and immediately commenced the arduous duties of a reformed Christian minister in the consistory. In Geneva, the Protestant religion had much spread, and that city had contracted a close alliance with Bern; but the state of morals was very low, and, therefore, whilst the talents of Calvin commanded respect, his austerity and sanctity were reprobated or ridiculed. Calvin was accused of Arianism; but the charge he refuted. He opposed the re-establishment of superstitious ceremonies and feasts; but himself and his two friends, Farel and Viret, were hated by the Catholics, and were ultimately banished from Geneva. At Strasburg, however, he found a shelter from the storm of persecution; and, aided by Bucer, he was appointed professor of theology, and pastor of a French church. Though banished from Geneva, he cherished for its inhabitants a Christian regard; he frequently addressed them by letters; he wrote an admirable reply to a publication by Cardinal Sadoleto, which was calculated, by the falsity of its reasonings (though disguised by ability and ingenuity,) to shake the faith of the reformed. He directed the energies of his mind to the conversion of all schismatics; and he republished his "Christian Institutes." In 1540, he was invited to return to Geneva. He at first declined; but, at length, solicited by two councils, and by the ministers and inhabitants of the city, he quitted Strasburg in the spring of 1541, with an understanding that he should speedily return; and was received with transport at Geneva. Active and energetic, zealous and persevering, Calvin instantly commenced the work of reformation. The ecclesiastical laws he assisted in revising; the ordinances he altered; and before the year had closed, this work of usefulness was accomplished, and approved by a general council. Those laws were as efficient and salutary, as they were wise and equitable. At this time he wrote a catechism, which was translated into various languages, and met with general approbation. He also published a "Commentary on the Epistle to Titus," and dedicated it to his old friends Viret and Farel. His labors now rapidly increased. He preached nearly every day; he lectured very frequently in theology; presided at meetings; instructed churches; and defended the Protestant faith in works celebrated for their perspicuity and genius. Nor was he less active in his duties as a citizen than as a theologian, or a minister of Jesus Christ. In 1543, he composed a liturgy for the church at Geneva. He also wrote a work on the necessity of a reformation in the church, and exposed the absurdities of a frivolous translation of the Bible, by Castalio, in the compilation of which fancy had been consulted at the expense of truth, and sound instead of sense. The enemies to the reformation were numerous and potent when combined, but singly they were nothing. The truth of this remark was felt by Calvin; and he, therefore, refuted the various works of their enemies as they appeared. Thus he answered Albert Pighius.

But his efforts were not all controversial. He established, at Geneva, a seminary for the education of pious young men in the Protestant faith, who, by their future ministrations, should extend the borders of the true church; and in that great work of usefulness he was assisted by the celebrated Beza. At that time also, the Waldenses, inhabiting Cabrires, and other places, who were persecuted by order of the parliament of Aquitaine, and who fled to Geneva, found in Calvin a sincere and zealous friend. He vindicated in public their cause, and in private relieved their necessities. In the year 1546, the efforts of Calvin were various, though painful. Charles V., who was a determined enemy to the Protestant religion, had alarmed some by his threats, and corrupted others by his promises. Calvin exerted himself to counteract all his efforts. But this was not all. Whilst some were lukewarm at Geneva, others were additionally profligate. To convert and convince them, he labored with incessant anxiety, though with but inadequate success. In 1547, whilst Germany was the scene of war, and France the theatre of persecution, Calvin wrote his "L'Antidote," being a controversial work on the doctrine of the first seven sections of the council of Trent, and also "a Warning Letter to the Church of Rome," against the doctrines of a monk who taught the Gnostic and Antinomian heresies. In the same year he also continued his pastoral duties, and proceeded in the composition of his "Commentaries on Paul's Epistles." In 1548, Beza retired to Geneva, and, with Calvin, formed future plans of yet more extended and important usefulness. Calvin, accompanied by Farel, in the following year visited the Swiss churches; and wrote two very able and learned letters to Socinus, the founder of the sect called Socinians. In 1550, he assisted yet further in the work of reformation, by obtaining the direction of the consistory at Geneva, for the communication of private as well as public religious instruction to its inhabitants, and for a total disregard, by every one, of all feast and saint days. The next year was less favorable to the peace of Calvin. A controversy on the doctrine of predestination agitated the church; the enemies of Calvin misrepresented his sentiments, and endeavored to excite a general antipathy, not merely to his doctrines, but also to his person. But Providence rendered their attempts abortive.

Calvin is accused of having, at this time, acted with a tyrannical and persecuting spirit towards the heretical Servetus. With him Calvin was once intimate, and also corresponded. Servetus, by his conduct and publications, especially by his "Resstitutio Christianismi," attracted the attention of the pope, and of the persecuting cardinal Tournon. It is stated that Calvin declared, "If that heretic (Servetus) came to Geneva, he would take care that he should be capitally punished." But this statement his friends confidently deny; and reply, that he persuaded Servetus not to visit Geneva; that he disapproved of all religious persecution; that he could, if he had thought proper, for three years before Servetus was so punished, have exposed him to his enemies, but which he would not do; and that, Calvin, in his writings, declares, that with his original imprisonment and prosecution he was not at all implicated. It cannot, however, be denied, that it was at the instigation of Calvin he was prosecuted, as his secretary was his accuser at Geneva, and exhibited articles against him. By the council of Geneva, Servetus was condemned to be burned to death; and, on the 27th of October, the punishment was inflicted. The impropriety of that punishment is admitted by all the friends of civil and religious liberty, and the apologists for Calvin alike condemn it. But they contend, and with seeming propriety, that it was consonant with the spirit of the age, with the laws of Geneva, and with even the opinions of many of the great, and even good men, who then lived.

About this time Calvin was much affected by the persecution of his friend and fellow-laborer, Farel, for having condemned the immorality of the Genevese; and was almost incessantly occupied in acts of kindness to the persecuted Protestants, who, on the death of Edward, king of England, had been compelled to quit the country. He was also engaged in writing his "Commentary on the Gospel of John." Nor could the spirit of bigotry and persecution, which prevailed in England, fail of attracting his attention. He communicated with the sufferers, both in England and France, and was indefatigable in rooting up all heresies which then disturbed the peace of the church. Towards the close of the year, Calvin visited Frankfort, for the purpose of terminating the controversy as to the Lord's supper, which had been so long agitated. He returned to Geneva much indisposed, but devoted his time to writing his "Commentary on the Psalms;" and to active, energetic, and successful exertions, through the medium of German ambassadors, on behalf of the Protestants at Paris, who, in that year (1555), were unjustly and inhumanly persecuted. At this time, a sect called the Trinitheists, headed by Gentilis, who believed that God consisted not merely of three distinct persons, but also of three distinct essences, was revived; and Calvin directed his attention to a refutation of the system. In the succeeding year, he proposed the establishment of a college at Geneva, for the education of youth; and in three years his wishes were accomplished, and himself was elected to the situation of professor of divinity, jointly with Claudius Pontus. This college afterwards became eminently useful, and was much distinguished for the learned and pious men who emanated from it. In the same, and the following year, Calvin was presented with the freedom of the city of Geneva; reprinted his "Christian Institutes," as well in French as Latin; prepared for the press his "Commentary on Isaiah;" and combated, with success, a new heresy which had arisen, as to the mediatorial character of Christ. In 1561, Calvin was summoned before the council of Geneva, at the desire of Charles IX., as being an enemy to France and her king. But, on examination, it appeared, that the only charge which could be established against him, was that of having sent Protestant missionaries to that kingdom. Soon afterwards, he published his "Commentary on Daniel;" and much interested himself on behalf of the Protestants in France, who were then persecuted by the duke of Guise. In 1562, his health rapidly declined; and he was compelled to restrict his labors to Geneva and his study. But in this and the following year, he lectured on the doctrine of the Trinity; completed his "Commentaries on the Books of Moses and Joshua," and published his celebrated "Answers to the Deputies of the Synod of Lyons." In the year 1564, his health became gradually worse; but yet he insisted on performing as many of his duties as his strength would possibly allow. On the twenty-fourth of March, he was present at the assembly. On the twenty-seventh, he was carried into the council, and delivered, before the seigneurs who were assembled, his farewell address; and on the second of April, he appeared at church, received from Beza the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and joined in the devotions of the great congregation. To the syndics, in the ensuing month, he delivered an able and affecting oration; and to the ministers of the town and country, assembled on an occasion in his room, he addressed a pathetic and admirable discourse. This was his last public labor. The remaining moments of his life were dedicated to acts of devotion, until May the twenty-fourth, at eight P. M., when he expired, aged fifty-four.

The grief of the Genevese was inconceivably great. As a citizen, a pastor, a reformer, a father, he was universally regretted, and his memory was embalmed in the tears and sorrows of a wide-spread population.

Calvin was of a middling stature, with sallow complexion; but his eyes were celebrated for their brilliancy. He was sincere, disinterested, and benevolent. The style of his writings is elegant and chaste, and they contain much of the softest and most persuasive eloquence.

As an expositor of the Scriptures, Calvin was sober, spiritual, penetrating. As a theologian, he stands in the very foremost rank of those of any age or country. His Institutes, composed in his youth, amidst a pressure of duties, and the rage and turbulence of the times, invincible against every species of assault, give him indisputably this pre-eminence. As a civilian, even though the law was a subject of subordinate attention, he had few equals among his contemporaries. In short, he exhibited, in strong and decided development, all those moral and intellectual qualities which marked him out for one who was competent to guide the opinions, and control the commotions, of inquiring and agitated nations. Through the most trying and hazardous period of the Reformation, he exhibited, invariably, a wisdom in counsel, a prudence of zeal, and at the same time, a decision and irreproachability of character which were truly astonishing. Nothing could for a moment deter him from a faithful discharge of his duty; nothing detrude him from the path of rectitude. When the very foundations of the world seemed to be shaking, he stood erect and firm, the pillar of the truth. He took his stand between two of the most powerful kingdoms of the age, resisted and assailed alternately the whole force of the papal domination—mainly the cause of truth and of God against the intriguing Charles on the one hand, and the courtly and bigoted Francis on the other. The pen was his most effectual weapon; and this was beyond the restriction or refutation of his royal antagonists. Indeed, on the arena of theological controversy, he was absolutely unconquerable by any power or combination of powers, which his numerous opponents could bring against him. He not only refuted and repressed the various errors which sprang up so abundantly in consequence of the commotion of the times, and which threatened to defeat all the efforts which were making for the moral illumination of the world; but the publication of the Institutes contributed, in a wonderful degree, to give unity of religious belief to the friends of the Reformation, and, of course, to marshal the strength, and combine and give success to the efforts, of all contenders for the faith once delivered to the saints.

Notwithstanding all that has been said to his disparagement, it is certainly true that Calvin was a great and good man. In the full import of the phrase, he may be styled a benefactor of the world. Most intensely and effectually, too, did he labor for the highest temporal, and especially for the eternal, interests of his fellow-men. He evidently brought to the great enterprise of the age a larger amount of moral and intellectual power than did any other of the reformers. Even the cautious Scaliger pronounces him the most exalted character that has appeared since the days of the apostles, and, at the age of twenty-two, the most learned man in Europe. And the immediate influence of his invincible mind is still deeply felt through the masterly productions of his pen, and will continue to be felt in the advancement of the pure interests of the church, until the complete triumph of her principles.

Calvin deserves the thanks, and not the curses, of posterity. He was ardently esteemed by all the good of his own time; and he has since been, is now, and will continue to be, esteemed, so long as high moral excellence and the severe majesty of virtue shall, to any extent, be objects of human approbation.

His works first appeared in a collected form, at Geneva, in twelve vols. fol. 1578; they were reprinted at the same place in seven vols. fol. 1617; and in nine vols. fol. at Amsterdam, in 1671. This last is the best edition. (See MacKenzie's Life of Calvin; Mosheim's Ecl. Hist. Cent. xvi.; Défense de Calvin, par Drelincourt; Narrative of Calvin, by Beza; Histoire Littéraire de Genève, by M. J. Senebier; Jones's Christ. Biog., and Christ. Spect. for May, 1828.)—Hend. Buck.

CALVINISM, the name given to that system of religious faith which corresponds in the main with that of Calvin; though in some points differing from the views of the illustrious reformer. Calvin considered every church as a separate and independent body, invested with the power of legislation for itself. He proposed that it should be governed by presbyteries and synods, composed of clergy and laity, without bishops, or any clerical subordination; and maintained that the province of the civil magistrate extended only to its protection and outward accommodation. He acknowledged a real, though spiritual presence of Christ in the eucharist; and he confined the privilege of communion to pious and regenerate believers. These sentiments, however, are not imbibed by all who are called Calvinists.

In 1536, Calvin was appointed professor of divinity at Geneva, where he established that system of church polity called Presbyterianism, originally considered as an essential part of Calvinism; but since the synod of Dort (or Dordrecht), which embraced, digested, and established his theological principles, in 1618, above forty years after his decease, the term Calvinism is generally confined to those principles, independent of his system of church polity.

Calvinists, however, contend that their system did not originate with Calvin, but is as ancient as the Scriptures from which it is drawn. They also say it is in substance the same as that of Augustine, and it is certainly very difficult to distinguish them. Mr. Toplady (in his "Historic Proof") has indeed traced the doctrine, in a series of quotations, from the times of the apostles to those of the reformation; and though some of his extracts may be objected to, the work, as a whole, seems scarcely to admit of refutation. Our present object however is, to represent the sentiments of Calvin, and those denominated from him, which have been distinguished into High (hyper, or ultra) Calvinists, Strict Calvinists, and Moderate (or modern) Calvinists.

The first class will be found described in this work, under ANTIOMNIANS, CRISPITES, and HOPKINSIANS, to which it is sufficient to refer. Strict Calvinists are those who adopt the opinions of Calvin himself, and the synod of Dort, above referred to. The most offensive point in Calvin's system, is the doctrine of absolute predestination, and its counterpart, reprobation: on these points, therefore, we shall quote his own words, in which if he errs by excessive rigor in his statements, the origin of his error can be seen.

"Predestination," says Calvin, "by which God adopts some to the hope of life, and adjudges others to eternal death, no one, desirous of the credit of piety, dares absolutely to deny. But it is involved in many cavils, especially by those who make fore-knowledge the cause of it. We maintain, that both belong to God; but it is preposterous to represent one as dependent on the other.

"Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, by which he hath determined, in himself, what he would have to become of every individual of mankind. For they are not all created with a similar destiny; but eternal life is fore-ordained for some, and eternal damnation for others. Every man, therefore, being created for one or the other of these ends, we say he is predestinated either to life or to death."

This point, this eminent reformer proceeds to argue from the conduct of the Almighty respecting the seed of Abraham, and toward certain individuals, as Jacob and Esau. (Institutes, Book III. chap. xxi. § 5, &c. Allen's Trans. vol. ii. pp. 404-5.)

"Now, with respect to the reprobate, (proceeds Calvin,) whom the apostle introduces in the same place:—as Jacob, without any merit yet acquired by good works, is made an object of grace, so Esau, while yet unpolluted by any crime, is accounted an object of hatred, Rom. 9: 13. If we turn our attention to works, we insult the apostle, as though he saw not that which is clear to us: now that he saw none is evident, because he expressly asserts the one to have been elected, and the other rejected, while they had not yet done any good or evil, to prove the foundation of divine predestination not to be in works.—Secondly, when he raises the question, whether God is unjust, he never urges, what would have been the most absolute and obvious defence of his justice, that God rewarded Esau according to his wickedness; but contents himself with a different solution,—that the reprobate are raised up for this purpose, that the glory of God may be displayed by their means.—Lastly, he subjoins a concluding observation, that 'God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.' You see how he attributes both to the mere will of God. If, therefore, we can assign no reason why he grants mercy to his people, but because such is his pleasure, neither shall we find any other cause but his will for the reprobation of others: for when God is said to harden, or show mercy to whom he pleases, men are taught by this declaration to seek no cause beside his will." (Ibid., § 11. Allen's Trans. p. 425.)

It is most clear, however, from his words elsewhere, that this great divine did not mean to destroy human responsibility, nor to set aside the use of means; since the Scripture addresses to man exhortations and reproofs, though it constantly attributes to the grace of God the Spirit and power of obedience. (See Inst. Book III. chap. v. § 4.)

We shall subjoin only, as immediately connected with this subject, Calvin's opinion of the corruption of human nature, by original sin. The following is his doctrine on this mysterious point:—

"Original sin appears to be an hereditary pravity and corruption of our nature, diffused through all the parts of the soul, rendering us obnoxious to the divine wrath, and producing in us those works which the Scripture calls works of the flesh. . . . These two things, therefore, should be strictly observed: first, that our nature, being so totally vitiated and depraved, we are, on account of this very corruption, considered as convicted and justly condemned in the sight of God; to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocence, and purity. And this liability to punishment, arises not from the delinquency of another; for when it is said, that the sin of Adam renders us obnoxious to the divine judgment, it is not to be understood as if we, though innocent, were undeservedly loaded with the guilt of his sin; but because we are all subject to a curse in consequence of his transgression—he is therefore said to have involved us in guilt. Nevertheless, we derive from him, not only the punishment, but also the pollution, to which the punishment is justly due." (Instit. Book II. chap. i. § 3. Allen's Trans. vol. ii. pp. 266-7.)

We now proceed to exhibit an abstract of the same system, as arranged and matured in the articles of the synod of Dort, in reference to the five points in dispute with the Arminians, (as stated under that article,) which forms the general standard of strict Calvinism.

1. OF PREDESTINATION. "As all men have sinned in Adam, and have become exposed to the curse and eternal death, God would have done no injustice to any one, if he had determined to leave the whole human race under sin and the curse, and to condemn them on account of sin; according to those words of the apostle, 'all the world is become guilty before God.' Rom. 3: 19, 23; 6: 23. . . .

"That some, in time, have faith given them by God, and others have it not given, proceeds from his eternal decree; for 'known unto God are all his works from the beginning,' &c. (Acts 15: 18. Eph. 1: 11.) According to which decree, he graciously softens the hearts of the elect, however hard, and he bends them to believe: but the non-elect he leaves, in just judgment, to their own perversity and hardness. And here, especially, a deep discrimination, at the same time both merciful and just, a discrimination of men equally lost, opens itself to us; or that decree of election and reprobation which is revealed in the word of God: which, as perverse, impure, and unstable persons do wrest to their own destruction, so it affords ineffable consolation to holy and pious souls." (Comp. Art. XVII. of the Church of England.)

"But election is the immutable purpose of God; by which, before the foundations of the earth were laid, he chose, out of the whole human race, fallen by their own fault from their primeval integrity into sin and destruction, according to the most free good pleasure of his own will, and of mere grace, a certain number of men, neither better nor worthier than others, but lying in the same misery with the rest, to salvation in Christ; whom he had, even from eternity, constituted Mediator and head of all the elect, and the foundation of salvation; and therefore he decreed to give them unto him to be saved, and effectually to call and draw them into communion with him, by his word and Spirit: or he decreed himself to give unto them true faith, to justify, to sanctify, and at length powerfully to glorify them," &c. Eph. 1: 4-6. Rom. 8: 30.

"This same election is not made from any foreseen faith, obedience of faith, holiness, or any other good quality and disposition, as a pre-requisite cause or condition in the man who should be elected, &c. 'He hath chosen us, (not because we were,) but that we might be holy,' &c. Eph. 1: 4. Rom. 9: 11-13. Acts 13: 48.

"Moreover, holy Scripture doth illustrate and commend to us, this eternal and free grace of our election, in this more especially, that it doth testify all men not to be elected; but that some are non-elect, or passed by, in the eternal election of God, whom truly God, from most free, just, irrepensible, and immutable good pleasure, decreed to leave in the common misery, into which they had, by their own fault, cast themselves; and not to bestow on them living faith, and the grace of conversion; but having been left in their own ways, and under just judgment, at length, not only on account of their unbelief, but also of all their other sins, to condemn and eternally punish them, to the manifestation of his own justice. And this is the decree of reprobation, which determines that God is in no wise the author of sin, (which, to be thought of, is blasphemy,) but a tremendous, incomprehensible just judge and avenger." (Scott's Synod of Dort, pp. 112-124.)

2. OF THE DEATH OF CHRIST. Passing over, for brevity's sake, what is said of the necessity of atonement, in order to pardon, and of Christ having offered that atonement and satisfaction, it is added:—"This death of the Son of God is a single and most perfect sacrifice and satisfaction for sins; of infinite value and price, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world: but because many who are called by the Gospel do not repent, nor believe in Christ, but perish in unbelief: this doth not arise from defect, or insufficiency of the sacrifice offered by Christ upon the cross, but from their own fault. . . .

"God willed that Christ, through the blood of the cross, should, out of every people, tribe, nation, and language, efficaciously redeem all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation, and given to him by the Father; that he should confer on them the gift of faith," &c. (Scott's Synod, &c. pp. 128-130.)

3. OF MAN'S CORRUPTION, &c. "'All men are conceived in sin, and born the children of wrath,' indisposed (inepti) to all saving good, prone to evil, dead in sin, and the slaves of sin; and without the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit, they neither are willing nor able to return to God, to correct their depraved nature, or to dispose themselves to the correction of it." This will not be found to differ materially from the third article of the ARMINIANS, (page 118,) and therefore need not here be enlarged on, though both widely differ from the doctrine of the latter remonstrants and Anti-calvinists in general. (Scott's Synod, pp. 125, 126.)

7. OF GRACE AND FREE-WILL. "But in like manner as, by the fall, man does not cease to be man, endowed with intellect and will; neither hath sin, which hath pervaded the whole human race, taken away the nature of the human species, but it hath depraved and spiritually stained it; so that even this divine grace of regeneration does not act upon men like stocks and trees, nor take away the properties (proprieties) of his will; or violently compel it, while unwilling; but it spiritually quickens, heals, corrects, and sweetly, and at the same time powerfully, inclines it; so that whereas it before was wholly governed by the rebellion and resistance of the flesh, now prompt and sincere obedience of the Spirit may begin to reign; in which the renewal of our spiritual will, and our liberty, truly consist: in which manner, (or for which reason,) unless the admirable Author of all good should work in us, there could be no hope to man of rising from the fall by that free-will, by which, when standing, he fell into ruin." (Scott's Synod, p. 141.)

5. ON PERSEVERANCE. "God, who is rich in mercy, from his immutable purpose of election, does not wholly take away his Holy Spirit from his own, even in lamentable falls; nor does he so permit them to decline, (prolabi) that they should fall from the grace of adoption, and the state of justification; or commit the sin unto death, or against the Holy Spirit; that, being deserted by him, they should cast themselves headlong into eternal destruction. . . . So that not by their own merits or strength, but by the gratuitous mercy of God, they obtain it, that they neither totally fall from faith and grace, nor finally continue in their falls and perish." (Scott's Synod, pp. 150, 151.)

Having given this summary of the sentiments of Calvin himself, and of the ancient or strict Calvinists, who are by no means extinct, it is proper to observe, that there are, and always have been, many who embrace the Calvinistic system in its leading features, who object to some particular parts, and to the strong language in which some of the propositions are expressed. These are called MODERATE, or MODERN Calvinists, who differ from Calvin, and the synod of Dort, chiefly on two points—the doctrine of reprobation, and the extent of the death of Christ.

1. Reprobation, or "predestination to death or misery as the end, and to sin as the means, I call (says Dr. E. Williams) an impure mixture" with Calvinism, "as having no foundation either in the real meaning of Holy Writ, or in the nature of things; except, indeed, we mean by it, what no one questions, a determination to punish the guilty."—Dr. W. calls this a "mixture, because its connexion with predestination to life is arbitrary and forced:—impure, because the supposition itself is a foul aspersion of the divine character. Augustine, Calvin, Perkins, Twisse, Rutherford, &c., though highly valuable and excellent men, upon the whole, were not free from this impure mixture of doctrine. But of all modern authors, (if we except the philosophical Necessarians.) Dr. Hopkins, of America, seems the most open in his avowal of the sentiment" above mentioned. See HOPKINSIANS. (Dr. Williams's Sermon and Charges, p. 128, and Appendix, p. 393.)

The term reprobate is indeed scriptural, simply meaning to reject; and stands in Scripture in immediate connexion with the sins of those who are thus rejected. Thus the prophet Jeremiah (chap. 6: 30), speaking of the apostate Jews, "Reprobate silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them;" not, however, before they had rejected him, and turned aside to idols: and the apostle Paul speaks of some "reprobate concerning the faith," i. e. who had rejected the truths of the gospel; and of others, as "reprobate to every good work," because they paid no regard to its holy precepts. (See 2 Tim. 3: 8. Tit. 1: 26.) Nor does it appear to be ever used in the Scriptures in the sense of non-elected. (See Cruden's Concordance in Reprobate.) Hence it has been contended, and that very recently, that reprobation has no connexion with the predestination of the Scriptures. (See "The Doctrine of Eternal Reprobation disproved, and sovereign distinguishing Grace defended," by Philanthropos. London, 1821.)

It must be confessed after all, that the election of some men (whether few or many) to everlasting life implies the non-election of others, which is a point to which the mind can never be reconciled, but from a deep conviction, that had we ourselves been left to perish in our sins, God would have been just in our condemnation, and that we have no claim to distinguishing mercy:—"It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, and because his compassions fail not." When viewed in this its true light, the election of any, much more of so vast a multitude as shall finally be saved out of every nation and kindred and tongue and people, appears an act of grace equally wonderful and glorious, and worthy of all the rapturous praise ascribed for it in the Scriptures.

As to reconciling the conduct of God with our view of the fitness of things, this is not the only case in which it seems impracticable in the present world. O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out. Rom. 11: 33—36. In such instances it is wise, as well as pious, to be silent; for "who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?"

A very ingenious man (Mr. John Bacon, the statuary) used to compare the rashness of our judging of the divine conduct in our present state of imperfection, to the folly of a man who should judge of a room-full of complicated machinery, by looking through the key-hole.

2. The other subject on which Modern Calvinists differ from the great reformer, relates to the nature and extent of Christ's death. The doctrines of atonement, and of justification by the imputation of Christ's righteousness, are clearly admitted by all who assume the name of Calvinists, and by many others; but there are subordinate points on which they differ. Some contend that Christ not only died restrictively for a certain number, that is, the elect; but that he underwent a certain degree of punishment, exactly in proportion to the demerit of those individuals; inasmuch, that had their number, or the number of their sins, been greater, he must have suffered still more than he actually did for their redemption. This arises from their not only considering sins as debts (as our Lord himself teaches us); but from carrying the analogy farther than the subject will allow; for sins and debts certainly will not in all points agree. As, for instance, debts may be paid in kind, by returning that we owe, which never can apply to sins. Nor does it appear consistent with the divine dignity to represent the covenant of grace as a commercial bargain. Many Calvinists therefore represent human redemption (and they think scripturally) as flowing originally from the free and sovereign mercy of God, who having chosen to redeem sinners to himself, gave his only-begotten Son to be their Redeemer, in a way honorable to the divine perfections, as well as abundantly sufficient to obliterate human guilt; and this atonement they consider as expressly made, that "whosoever believes" in Christ, and cordially approves this way of salvation, "should not perish, but have everlasting life;" its merit being fully commensurate to the whole mass of human guilt. So that virtually Christ died for all men, in the most unlimited sense, though those who receive not the atonement, can of course derive no benefit therefrom. And this may be illustrated even on the principle of a debt, since the offer of a friend to give pecuniary satisfaction for a debt, may be rendered nugatory, by the debtor himself refusing utterly to accept the boon. The gospel itself does not insist upon men being saved against their will.

Thus Dr. Magee, in his excellent work on the Atonement, says:—"The sacrifice of Christ was never deemed by any, who did not wish to calumniate the doctrine of atonement, to have made God pleacable; but merely viewed as the means appointed by divine wisdom, by which to bestow forgiveness. But still it is demanded, in what way can the death of Christ, considered as a sacrifice of expiation, be conceived to operate to the remission of sin, unless by the appeasing a Being, who otherwise would not have forgiven us? To this, the answer of the Christian is,—I know not, nor does it concern me to know, in what manner the sacrifice of Christ is connected with the forgiveness of sins; it is enough that this is declared by God to be the medium through which my salvation is effected:—I pretend not to dive into the councils of the Almighty. I submit to his wisdom, and I will not reject his grace, because his mode of vouchsafing it is not within my comprehension."

So Andrew Fuller, in his "Calvinistic and Socinian Systems compared," (Letter vii.) strongly reprobates the idea of placating the Divine Being by an atonement; "contending that the atonement is the effect, and not the cause of divine love" to men; and insists, "that the contrary is a gross misrepresentation of the Calvinists in general," though it must be confessed some Calvinists have given too much countenance to such an idea. Mr. Fuller adds, "If we say a way was opened by the death of Christ, for the free and consistent exercise of mercy, in all the methods which sovereign wisdom saw fit to adopt, perhaps we shall include every material idea which the Scriptures give us of that important event."

Mr. Jerram says, (Letters on the Atonement, p. 23.) "I do not believe that any respectable writer, on our side, says, that a satisfaction, or an atonement to divine justice, was required, as a motive to love and pity; but merely as a medium whereby that sentiment could be consistently manifested. No one supposes satisfaction for sins necessary to induce God to be merciful; though we do believe that that mercy could not be consistently manifested without an atonement. (See Heb. 2: 9, 10.)"

On the extent of Christ's death, we have remarked above that the church of England, and some of its most illustrious prelates, admitted its universality. So have the most distinguished Calvinistic divines of the present age; as Dr. E. Williams, Dr. T. Scott, Andrew Fuller, Dr. Dwight, &c. It ought to be added, however, that these divines hold this universality of Christ's death, to be perfectly consistent with the particular and efficacious redemption of the church. Hence it is rather a more full development of the ancient doctrine, than a deviation from it.

After all that has been written against "the Calvinism of the church of England," it appears to many of her members, and perhaps to all others, that her system is that of Moderate Calvinism. (See Overton's True Churchman ascertained.) She embraces the doctrines of election, original sin, &c.; but she is silent on the doctrine of reprobation, and admits the universality of the Savior's death.

It is much to be regretted that preachers and writers who have thought it their duty to oppose Calvinism, have so generally fallen into the same sort of error complained of under the article Arminianism, of not taking proper pains to understand what it is, or else have not possessed candor enough to do it justice. If, as is to be hoped, this is the effect of mere misapprehension, still how deplorable it is that the disciples of one blessed Master should allow themselves to misapprehend one another on subjects of such vast practical moment. Had the late lamented Watson ever read with attention the works of Jonathan Edwards, or Andrew Fuller, or even so common a book as Buck's Theological Dictionary, it is difficult to believe he would have represented Moderate or even Strict Calvinism in the odious form he has, in his Institutes, and Biblical and Theological Dictionary. "The main characteristic of all these theories," he says, "from the first to the last, from the highest to the lowest, is, that a part of mankind are shut out from the mercies of God, on some ground irrespective of their refusal of a sincere offer to them of salvation through Christ, made with a communicated power of embracing it. Some power they allow to the reprobate, as natural power, and degrees of superadded moral power; but in no case the power to believe unto salvation."

Now what are the facts of the case? Did Mr. Watson himself believe that the guilty heathen are condemned for refusing the offer of salvation through Christ? How could this be, when they never heard of Christ? Again; in reference to such as hear the Gospel, where is the passage of Scripture which speaks of a "communicated power" of embracing it, where it was not actually embraced? Unbelievers, it is admitted, do always resist the Holy Ghost; and it wants no other power to receive than to resist. Whether this power be called natural or moral, it is a power which all sinners possess, and exercise daily in every act of sin; but alas, only to their own destruction. No new increase of power could avail to save them, without a radical change of disposition. Where there is a new disposition wrought in any one, a will to believe the truth, no Calvinist holds that God denies the power. Of course, they hold that all who perish, perish only by their own voluntary continuance in sin; while all that are saved, are saved by God's distinguishing grace.

"Whatever notions of an exaggerated sort (says the profound author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm) may belong to some Calvinists, Calvinism as distinguished from Arminianism, encircles or involves GREAT TRUTHS, which, whether dimly or clearly discerned—whether defended in scriptural simplicity of language, or deformed by grievous perversions, will never be abandoned while the Bible continues to be devoutly read, and which, if they might indeed be subverted, would drag to the same ruin every doctrine of revealed religion. Let it be granted that Calvinism has often existed in a state of mixture with crude, or presumptuous, or preposterous dogmas. Yet surely whoever is competent to take a calm, an independent, and a truly philosophic survey of the Christian system, and can calculate also the balancings of opinion, the antitheses of belief—will grant that if Calvinism, in the modern sense of the term, were quite exploded, a long time could not elapse before evangelical Arminianism would find itself driven helplessly into the gulf that had yawned to receive its rival; and to this catastrophe must quickly succeed the triumph of the dead rationalism of Neology, and then that of Atheism." (Essay upon Edwards on the Will.)

Calvinism originally subsisted in its greatest purity in the city of Geneva; from which place it was first propagated into Germany, France, the United Provinces, and Britain. In France it was abolished by the revocation of the edict of Nantz. It has been the prevailing religion of the United Provinces ever since 1571. The theological system of Calvin was adopted and made the public rule of faith in England, under the reign of Edward VI. The church of Scotland was also modelled by James Knox, agreeably to the doctrines, rites, and form of ecclesiastical government established at Geneva. In England, Calvinism had been on the decline from the time of queen Elizabeth until about sixty years ago, when it was again revived, and has been on the increase ever since. The major part of the clergy, indeed, are not Calvinists, though the articles of the church of England are Calvinistical. It deserves to be remarked, however, that Calvinism is preached in a considerable number of the churches; only several of the evangelical clergy have adopted ultra and exclusive views on the subject; while it is also the distinguishing characteristic of the discourses delivered by the Congregational and Particular Baptist ministers; by those of lady Huntingdon's connexion, and by the powerful body of Welch Calvinistic Methodists. In Scotland, its principles are commonly taught in the establishment, and with scarcely any exception among dissenters. In the United States, it is embraced and taught by the great majority of churches, including all classes of the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Associated Baptists.

CAMALDOLITES; an order founded by St. Romauld, an Italian fanatic, in the eleventh century. The manner of life he enjoined his disciples to observe was this:—They dwelt in separate cells, and met together only at the time of prayer. Some of them, during the two lents in the year, observed an inviolable silence, and others for the space of a hundred days. On Sundays and Thursdays they fed on herbs, and the rest of the week only on bread and water.—Hend. Buck.

CAMBRIDGE MANUSCRIPT; a copy of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in Greek and Latin. Beza found it in the monastery of Irenæus, at Lyons, in 1562, and gave it to the university of Cambridge in 1582. It is a quarto, and written on vellum; sixty-six leaves of it are much torn and mutilated; and ten of these are supplied by a later transcriber. It is written in the scriptio continua, and the Greek is in uncial characters. From this and the Clermont copy of St. Paul's epistles, Beza published his larger annotations in 1582. See Dr. Kipling's edition of it.—Henderson's Buck.

CAMEL. The original name of this animal has passed into most languages, ancient and modern. In Hebrew it is called gemel, from the verb to repay, requite; probably on account of its revengeful disposition. "A camel's anger," is an Arabian proverb for an irreconcilable enmity. There is no animal which remembers an injury longer, nor seizes with greater keenness the proper opportunity of revenge; which is the more remarkable on account of its gentle and docile disposition, when unprovoked by harsh treatment.

From the Scriptures we learn that the camel constituted an important branch of patriarchal wealth. Job had at first three thousand, and after the days of his adversity had passed away, six thousand camels. The Arabians estimate their riches and possessions by the number of their camels; and speaking of the splendor and wealth of a noble, or prince, they observe, he has so many camels; not so many pieces of gold. The Midianites and Amalekites had camels without number, as the sand upon the sea-shore; many of which were adorned with chains of gold, and other rich and splendid ornaments, Judg. 7: 12. So great was the importance attached to the management and propagation of camels, that a particular officer was appointed in the reign of David, to superintend their keepers. Nor is it without a special design, that the inspired writer mentions the descent of the person appointed; he was an Ishmaelite, and therefore supposed to be thoroughly skilled in the treatment of that useful quadruped.

There are as many as seven species of camel discriminated by zoologists; but it is only the Arabian camel, or dromedary, and the Bactrian camel, that are known in Scripture.

The former species is distinguished by having only one bunch or protuberance on the back. Its general height, measured from the top of the dorsal bunch to the ground, is about six feet and a half, but from the top of the head when the animal elevates it, it is not much less than nine feet: the head, however, is usually so carried as to be nearly on a level with the bunch, or rather below it, the animal bending the neck extremely in its general posture. The head is small; the neck very long; and the body of a long and meagre shape; the legs rather slender, and the tail, which is slightly tufted at the extremity, reaches to the joints of the hind legs. The feet are very large, and are hooped in a peculiar manner, being divided above into two lobes, the extremity of each lobe being guarded by a small hoof. The under part of the foot is guarded by an extremely long, tough, and pliable skin, which, by yielding in all directions, enables the animal to travel with peculiar ease and security over dry, hot, stony, and sandy regions, which would soon parch and destroy the hoof. On the legs are six callosities,—one on each knee, one on the inside of each fore leg on the upper joint, and one on the inside of each hind leg at the bottom of the thigh. On the lower part of the breast is also a large callous or tough tubercle, which is gradually increased by the constant habit which the animal has of resting upon it in lying down.

The native country of the camel is Arabia, from whose burning deserts it has been gradually diffused over the rest of Asia and Africa. The Arab venerates his camel as the gift of heaven, as a sacred animal, without whose aid he could neither subsist, trade, nor travel.

The hair of these animals, which is fine and soft, and is renewed every year, is used by the Arabians to make stuffs for their clothing and furniture. It was of this material that Elijah the Tishbite wore a dress, (2 Kings 1: 8.); and also John the Baptist, Matt. 3: 1. It must not be supposed, however, that the description of hair-cloth used by these and other prophets mentioned in Scripture, bore any resemblance to the beautiful cashmere shawl, imported into this country: it was a much coarser manufacture of this material, and is still used by the modern dervises. We may probably obtain some idea of its texture, from what Braithwaite says of the Arabian huts: "They are made of camels' hair, something like our coarse hair-cloths to lay over goods."

Blessed with their camels, the Arabs not only want for nothing, but they fear nothing. In a single day they can traverse a tract of fifty leagues into the desert, and thus escape the reach of their enemies. All the armies in the world, says Buffon, would perish in pursuit of a troop of Arabs. Figure to yourself, for instance, observes this writer a country without verdure, and without water; a burning sand, an air always clear, plains of sands, and mountains still more parched, over which the eye extends without perceiving a single animated being; a dead earth, perpetually tossed by the winds, presenting nothing but bones, scattered flints, rocks perpendicular, or overthrown: a naked desert where the traveller never breathes under a friendly shade, where nothing accompanies him; and where nothing recalls to mind the idea of animated nature; an absolute solitude, infinitely more frightful than that of the deepest forest; for to man trees are, at least, visible objects: more solitary and naked, more lost in an unbounded void, he every where beholds the extended space surrounding him as a tomb: the light of the day, more dismal than the darkness of night, serves only to give him a clearer idea of his own wretchedness and impotence, and to present before his eyes the horror of his situation, by extending around him the immense abyss which separates him from the habitable parts of the earth: an abyss which he would in vain attempt to traverse, for hunger, thirst, and burning heat haunt him every moment that remains between despair and death. The Arab, nevertheless, by the assistance of his camel, has learned to surmount, and even to appropriate these frightful intervals of nature to himself. They serve him for an asylum, they secure his repose, and maintain his independence. The Arab is early accustomed to the fatigues of travelling, to want of sleep, and to endure hunger, thirst, and heat. With this view he instructs, rears, and exercises his camels. A few days after their birth, he folds their limbs to remain on the ground, and in this situation he loads them with a pretty heavy weight, which is never removed but for the purpose of replacing a greater. Instead of allowing them to feed at pleasure, and to drink when they are thirsty, he regulates their repasts, and makes them gradually travel long journeys, diminishing at the same time their quantity of food. When they acquire some strength, he exercises them to the course; he excites their emulation by the example of horses, and in time renders them equally swift and more robust. At length, when he is assured of the strength, fleetness, and sobriety of his camels, he loads them with whatever is necessary for his and their subsistence, departs with them, arrives unexpectedly at the confines of the desert, robs the first passenger he meets, pil-lages the straggling habitations, loads his camels with the booty, and if pursued is obliged to accelerate his retreat. It is on these occasions that he unfolds his own talents and those of his camels; he mounts one of the fleetest, and conducting the troop, makes them travel night and day, almost without stopping to eat or drink; and in this manner he easily passes over the space of three hundred leagues in eight days. During all that time of fatigue and travel, he never unloads his camels, and only allows them an hour of repose, and a ball of paste each day. They often run in this manner for eight or nine days without meeting with any water, and when by chance there is a pool at some distance, they scent the water, even when half a league from it. Thirst makes them redouble their pace, and they drink as much at once as serves them for the time that is past, and for as much to come; for their journey often lasts them several weeks, and their abstinence continues till their journey is accomplished.

The driest thistle and the barest thorn, are all the food this useful quadruped requires; and even these, to save time, he eats while advancing on his journey, without stopping or occasioning a moment of delay. As it is his lot to cross immense deserts where no water is found, and countries not even moistened with the dew of heaven, he is endowed with the power, at one watering place, to lay in a store, with which he supplies himself for thirty days to come. To contain this enormous quantity of fluid, nature has formed large cisterns within him, from which, once filled, he draws at pleasure the quantity he wants, and pours it into his stomach, with the same effect as if he then drew it from the spring.

Notwithstanding that the camel is so extremely revengeful as to bear in mind, and resent, in the most terrible manner, any injury it may have sustained, its patience is the most extraordinary. Its sufferings seem to be great; for when it is overloaded, it sends forth the most lamentable cries, but never offers to resist the tyrant who oppresses it. At the slightest signs it bends its knees, and lies upon its belly, suffering itself to be loaded in this position; at another sign it rises with its load, and the driver getting upon its back, encourages the animal to proceed with his voice and with a song.

Throughout Turkey, Persia, Egypt, Arabia, Barbary, and various other contiguous countries, all kinds of merchandise are carried by camels, which, of all conveyances, is the most expeditious, and attended with the least expense. Merchants and other travellers assemble, and unite in caravans to avoid the insults and robberies of the Arabs. These caravans are often numerous, and are always composed of more camels than men. Each camel is loaded according to his strength; the larger ones carrying from a thousand to twelve hundred pounds weight, and the smaller, from six to seven hundred. Burckhardt states that a camel can never be stopped while its companions are moving on. The Arabs are therefore highly pleased with a traveller who jumps off his beast, and remounts without stopping it, as the act of kneeling down is troublesome and fatiguing to the loaded camel, and before it can rise again, the caravan is considerably ahead. He also affirms it to be an erroneous opinion, that the camel delights in sandy ground. It is true, he remarks, that he crosses it with less difficulty than any other animal, but wherever the sands are deep, the weight of himself and his load makes his feet sink into the sand at every step, and he groans and often sinks under his burden. Hence, this traveller states it to be, that camels' skeletons are found in great numbers where the sands are deepest. It is the hard, gravelly ground of the desert, which is most agreeable to this animal.

The Bactrian camel is distinguished from the Arabian camel or dromedary, by having two bunches on his back. It is not so numerous as the other, and is chiefly confined to some parts of Asia. Unlike the dromedary, whose movement, as we have seen, is remarkably swift, the Bactrian camel proceeds at a slow and solemn pace.

From the account now furnished of this animal, we may see the propriety and beauty of several passages of Scripture, in which it is mentioned or alluded to.

Reviewing his own passing days, and properly estimating the shortness of human life, Job exclaims—

O! swifter than a courier are my days:
They flee away—they see no good.
As SWELLING SHIPS they sweep on;
As an eagle swooping on its prey.

This passage has sadly perplexed commentators. The original of the third line, literally rendered, is "ships of Abeh;" or, if Abeh be taken for swiftness, "ships of swiftness."

For the purpose of ascertaining what might probably be the intention of the sacred writer, Mr. Taylor thus analyses the import of the words: My days pass faster than a running messenger, who exerts his speed when sent on important business; they even fly, like a fugitive who escapes for his life from an enemy; they do not look around them to see for any thing good; they are passed as ships of swiftness; as a vulture flying hastily to the newly-fallen prey. By marking the climax, we find the messenger swift, the fugitive more swift, the ships swifter than the fugitive, and the vulture swiftest of all.

In support of this ingenious conjecture, Mr. Taylor cites the following passage from "honest Sandys:"

"The whole caravan being now assembled, consisted of a thousand horses, mules, and asses; and of fine hundred camels. THESE ARE THE SHIPS OF ARABIA; THEIR SEAS ARE THE DESERTS, a creature created for burthen." &c. It does not clearly appear in this extract, however, though it might be gathered from it, that the camel has the name of the "Ship of Arabia;" but Mr. Bruce comes in to our assistance, by saying, "What enables the shepherds to perform the long and toilsome journeys across Africa, is the CAMEL, EMPHATICALLY CALLED, BY THE ARABS, THE SHIP OF THE DESERT!" he seems to have been created for this very trade;" &c. The idea thus thrown out, and in a great measure confirmed by Sandys and Bruce, is further supported by an account of the swiftness of these metaphorical "ships," furnished in Morgan's History of Algiers. This writer states, that the dromedary, in Barbary called Aashare, will, in one night, and through a level country, traverse as much ground as any single horse can perform in ten. The Arabs affirm, that it makes nothing of holding its rapid pace, which is a most violent hard trot, for four-and-twenty hours on a stretch, without showing the least signs of weariness, or inclination to bait; and that, having swallowed a ball or two of a sort of paste, made up of barley-meal and a little powder of dry dates, with a bowl of water, or camel's milk, the indefatigable animal will seem as fresh as at first setting out, and ready to continue running at the same scarcely credible rate for as many hours longer, and so on from one extremity of the African desert to the other, provided its rider could hold out without sleep, and other refreshments. During his stay in Algiers, Mr. Morgan was once a party in a diversion in which one of these Aashari ran against some of the swiftest Barbs in the whole Neja, which is famed for having good ones, of the true Libyan breed, shaped like greyhounds, and which will sometimes run down an ostrich. The reader will not, we apprehend, be displeased at our transferring his account to these pages.

"We all started like racers, and for the first spurt, most of the best mounted among us kept pace pretty well; but our grass-fed horses soon flagged: several of the Libyan and Numidian runners held pace, till we, who still followed upon a good round hand gallop, could no longer discern them, and then gave out; as we were told after their return. When the dromedary had been out of sight about half an hour, we again espied it, flying towards us with an amazing velocity, and in a very few moments was amongst us, and seemingly nothing concerned; while the horses and mares were all on a foam, and scarcely able to breathe, as was likewise a tall fleet greyhound dog, of the young princess, who had followed and kept pace the whole time, and was no sooner got back to us, but lay down panting as if ready to expire."

This account shows, also, with what propriety the prophet calls this animal the "swift dromedary;" (Jer. 3: 23.) as well as the wisdom of Esther's messengers, in choosing it to carry their despatches to the distant provinces of the Persian empire, Esth. 8: 10.

The writer just quoted informs us, that the Arabs guide their dromedaries by means of a thong of leather, which is passed through a hole purposely made in the creature's nose. Will not this illustrate the expression in 2 Kings 19: 28; "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest?" This denotes, no doubt, the depth of the Assyrian's humiliation, and the swiftness of his retreat.

Another passage which Mr. Taylor thinks may be illustrated by the application of the term Aashare to a swift dromedary, is Prov. 6: 10, 11—

A little sleep, a little slumber,
A little folding of the arms to sleep;
So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth,
And thy want as an armed man.

It is evident that the writer means to denote the speed and rapidity of the approaches of penury; therefore, instead of, "one that travelleth;" we may read "a post, or quick messenger," an express. But our present business is with the "armed man." Now, the words thus translated are no where used to denote an armed man, or "a man of a shield," as some would render them literally; but the Chaldee paraphrast translates them thus, "swift like an Aashare," or, mounted on an Aashare, that is, an Aashare-rider, to answer to the post or express, in the former line. Thus we shall have an increase of swiftness suggested here, as the passage evidently demands. The sentiment, on the principles above suggested, would stand thus:

So shall thy poverty advance as rapidly as an express,
And thy penury as a strong and swift antagonist to [Aashare-rider.]

In that sublime prediction, where the prophet foretells the great increase and flourishing state of Messiah's kingdoms, by the conversion and accession of the Gentile nations, he compares the happy and glorious concourse to a vast assemblage of camels: "The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah." That people, rather than irrational animals, are intended, is evident from these words: "All they from Sheba shall come; they shall show forth the praises of the Lord." Isa. 60: 6. In adopting this figure, the prophet might, perhaps, have his eye on the hieroglyphical writing of the Egyptians, in which the figure of a camel represented a man; and if so, besides its strict conformity to the genius of Hebrew poetry, we can discern a propriety in its introduction into this illustrious prediction. Some interpreters piously refer the prophecy to Christ himself; and imagine it began to receive its accomplishment when the magi, proceeding from the very places mentioned by the prophet, worshipped the new-born Savior, "and presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh." But Midian, and the other places mentioned by the prophet, lay to the south of Judea; while the evangelist expressly says the magi came from the east; which, as well as their name, magi, or wise men, clearly proves that Persia was their native country, and the place of their abode.

To pass a camel through the eye of a needle, was a proverbial expression among the nations of high antiquity, denoting a difficulty which neither the art nor the power of man could surmount. Our Lord condescends to employ it in his discourse to the disciples, to show how extremely difficult it is for a rich man to forsake all, for the cause of God and truth, and obtain the blessings of salvation: "I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven," Matt. 19: 24. Many expositors are of opinion, that the allusion is not to the camel, but to the cable by which an anchor is made fast to the ship; and for camel they read camel, from which our word cable is supposed to be derived. It is not, perhaps, easy to determine which of these ought to be preferred; and some interpreters of considerable note, have accordingly adopted both views. Others have asserted, that there was near Jerusalem a low gate, called the Needle's Eye, under which a camel could not pass without being unloaded.

However, though the exact proverbial expression, which was doubtless well understood by those to whom it was addressed, may be to us unintelligible, the instruction conveyed is obvious. Riches are a snare and often a hindrance in the way to heaven; and the heart that is supremely set upon them, can never be brought to a cordial surrender of itself to the meek, lowly, and self-denying Jesus, without which it is impossible to enter into his kingdom. But the things that are impossible with men, are possible with God. Divine Grace can do away the impossibility, by bringing the heart to a willing compliance with the requirements of the gospel.

In Matt. 23: 24, is another proverbial expression: "Ye strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." Dr. Adam Clarke has proved, that there is an error of the press in the English translation, by which at has been substituted for out. The passage as it now stands, conveys no sense: it should be, "Ye strain out the gnat, and swallow down the camel." The allusion is to the custom which prevailed among both Gentiles and Jews, of straining the liquor which they drank, for the purpose of ejecting those insects which so swarm in some southern countries, and hence, easily fall into wine-vessels. Some of the commentators have wished to get rid of the camel in this passage, from an idea that our Lord could not have united so huge an animal with so small an insect. They, therefore, propose to understand a larger species of fly. This conjectural emendation, however, cannot be admitted, as it is unsupported by all the ancient versions. The expression must be taken hyperbolically. To make the antithesis as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible; the smallest insect, and the largest animal. And this very antithesis was used by the Jewish and Greek writers, as appears from Wetstein.

The expression has generally been understood by English readers, as implying an effort to swallow, but rejecting something very small and inconsiderable, yet receiving without hesitation something much larger and more important: but the fact is, it alludes to a custom the Jews had of straining or filtering their wine, for fear of swallowing any forbidden insect. Now, as it would be ridiculous to strain liquor for the sake of clearing it from insects, and then eating the largest of those insects; so the conduct of those is not only ridiculous, but highly criminal, who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet scruple not to commit the greatest sins.

Camels are spoken of in Scripture,

1. As an article of wealth and state, Gen. 12: 16. 30: 43. 2 Kings 7: 9. 1 Chron. 27: 30. Ezra 2: 67. Neh. 7: 69. Job 1: 2.

2. As used for travelling, Gen. 24: 64. 31: 34. 1 Kings 10: 2.

3. As an important means of traffic, Gen. 37: 25. 1 Chron. 12: 40. Isa. 30: 6.

4. As used in war, Judg. 6: 5. 7: 12. 1 Sam. 30: 17. Jer. 49: 29.

5. As a spoil in war, Judg. 8: 21. 1 Sam. 27: 9. 1 Chron. 5: 21. Job 1: 17. Jer. 49: 32.

6. As sufferers in the plagues brought upon the brute creation for the sin of man, Ex. 9: 3. 1 Sam. 15: 3.

7. As furnishing an article of clothing, Matt. 3: 4. Zech. 14: 15.

8. Connected with these animals, we have a pleasing instance of industry, humility, and courtesy in a young woman of rank and fortune. Rebekah was seen at the well, condescending by personal labor to supply the wants of the camels of Abraham's servant; nor did her good disposition and good conduct go unrewarded; those camels shortly after bore her into the Land of Promise, to become the wife of Abraham's son, and one in the line of mothers from whom he should descend, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed. Gen. 24: 19—64.

9. The camel is prohibited for food as unclean, Lev. 11: 14. Deut. 14: 7.

10. Camels are prophetically and figuratively mentioned in the Old Testament. Isaiah (21: 7.) predicts the march of Cyrus's army to the conquest and destruction of Babylon in the time of Belshazzar. Isaiah (30: 6.), alludes to the folly and presumption of the Israelites, or Jews, or both, who in the time of their trouble carried treasures on camels into Egypt, to purchase the assistance of that people, and acknowledged not the Lord their God, who alone could save and deliver them. Isa. 60: 6, is part of a most sublime prediction, figurative of the purity and enlargement of the church in the reign of the Messiah, when different nations shall with alacrity and zeal dedicate themselves and their substance to the service of God.

Jer. 49: 29, 32, predicts the confusion and ruin that should befall Kedar and Hazor, enemies of Israel, upon whom God would bring his judgments by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. The fulfilment of this prediction took place during the captivity of the Jews, and would tend greatly to encourage their hopes that the promises of their deliverance and return should also in due time be accomplished. Very similar is the prediction, (Ez. 25: 5,) that Rabbah, the chief city of Ammon, should be taken as a stable for camels by the Chaldeans.

CAMELS' HAIR; an article of clothing. John the Baptist was habited in raiment of camels' hair, and Charadin states, that such garments are worn by the modern dervishes. There is a coarse cloth made of camels' hair in the East, which is used for manufacturing the coats of shepherds, and camel-drivers, and also for the covering of tents.—It was, doubtless, this coarse kind which was adopted by John. By this he was distinguished from those residents in royal palaces who wore soft raiment. Elijah is said in the English Bible to have been "a hairy man;" (2 Kings 1: 8.); but it should be "a man dressed in hair;" that is, camels' hair. In Zech. 13: 4, "a rough garment," that is, a garment of a hairy manufacture, is characteristic of a prophet.—Calmet.

CAMELEON, or CHAMELEON. In the English Bible, the chameleon is transformed into the mole, (Lev. 11: 30,) an animal that has little pretension to be associated with reptiles of the lizard species. The Hebrew word, from a root which signifies to breathe, is peculiarly appropriate to this curious animal, which, according to vulgar opinion, is the "creature nourished by the wind and air."

The chameleon nearly resembles the crocodile in form, but differs widely in its size and appetites. Its head is about two inches long, and from thence to the beginning of the tail four and a half; the tail is five inches long, and the feet two and a half; the thickness of the body varies at different times, for the animal possesses the power of blowing itself up and contracting itself, at pleasure.

During his visit to the east, Le Bruyn purchased several chameleons, for the purpose of preserving them alive, and making observations on their nature and manners; but the most interesting account of this curious animal is that furnished by the enterprising and lamented Belzoni, which we transcribe.

"There are three species of chameleons, whose colors are peculiar to themselves: for instance, the commonest sort are those which are generally green, that is to say, the body all green, and when content, beautifully marked on each side regularly on the green with black and yellow, not in a confused manner, but as if drawn. This kind is in great plenty, and never have any other color except a light green when they sleep, and when ill a very pale yellow. Out of nearly forty I had the first year when I was in Nubia, I had but one, and that a very small one, of the second sort, which had red marks. One chameleon lived with me eight months, and most of that time I had it fixed to the button of my coat; it used to rest on my shoulder, or on my head. I have observed, when I have kept it shut up in a room for some time, that, on bringing it out in the air, it would begin drawing the air in; and on putting it on some marjorum, it has had a wonderful effect on it immediately: its color became most brilliant. I believe it will puzzle a good many to say what cause it proceeds from. If they did not change when shut up in a house, but only on taking them into a garden, it might be supposed the change of the colors was in consequence of the smell of the plants; but when in a house, if it is watched, it will [be seen to] change every ten minutes; some moments a plain green, at others all its beautiful colors will come out, and when in a passion it becomes of a deep black, and will swell itself up like a balloon; and, from being one of the most beautiful animals, it becomes one of the most ugly. It is true they are extremely fond of the fresh air; and on taking them to a window where there is nothing to be seen, it is easy to observe the pleasure they certainly take in it: they begin to gulp down the air, and their color becomes brighter. I think it proceeds, in a great degree, from the temper they are in: a little thing will put them in a bad humor. If, in crossing a talle, for instance, you stop them, and attempt to turn them another road, they will not stir, and are extremely obstinate: on opening the mouth at them, it will set them in a passion: they begin to arm themselves, by swelling and turning black, and will sometimes hiss a little, but not much. The third I brought from Jerusalem, was the most singular of all the chameleons I ever had: its temper, if it can be so called, was extremely sagacious and cunning. This one was not of the order of the green kind, but a disagreeable drab, and it never once varied in its color in two months. On my arrival at Cairo, I used to let it crawl about the room, on the furniture. Sometimes it would get down, if it could, and hide itself away from me, but in a place where it could see me; and sometimes, on my leaving the room and on entering it, would draw itself so thin as to make itself nearly on a level with whatever it might be on, so that I might not see it. It had often deceived me so. One day, having missed it for some time, I concluded it was hid about the room; after looking for it in vain, I thought it had got out of the room and made its escape. In the course of the evening, after the candle was lighted, I went to a basket that had got a handle across it: I saw my chameleon, but its color entirely changed, and different to any I ever had seen before: the whole body, head and tail, a brown, with black spots, and beautiful deep orange colored spots round the black. I certainly was much gratified. On being disturbed, its colors vanished, unlike the others; but after this I used to observe it the first thing in the morning, when it would have the same colors. Their chief food was flies: the fly does not die immediately on being swallowed, for on taking the chameleon up in my hands, it was easy to feel the fly buzzing, chiefly on account of the air they draw in their inside: they smell much, and particularly when they want to fling themselves off a great height, by filling themselves up like a balloon. On falling, they get no hurt, except on the mouth, which they bruise a little, and that comes first to the ground. Sometimes they will not drink for three or four days, and when they begin, they are about half an hour drinking."

An Italian professor of natural history, who dissected two of these curious animals, is of opinion that the change of color arises from the fact of their having four skins, extremely fine, whence arise the different colors.—Abbott.

CAMERONIANS, or OLD DISSENTERS, as they choose to call themselves in Scotland. They received the first denomination from the Rev. Richard Cameron, a celebrated field preacher, who exercised his ministry in the mountains and moors of Scotland, refusing to accept the indulgence to tender consciences, granted by Charles II., because such an acceptance seemed to him an acknowledgment of the king's supremacy, and that he had before a right to silence them. Cameron separated from his Presbyterian brethren in 1666; and afterwards, as his enemies assert, was slain at the head of an insurrection at Airmoss, in Kyle, July 20th, 1680. His followers, however, consider his death most honorable; and say that "he fell by the sword of his bloody persecutors, while he, and a number of his followers, being suddenly and furiously attacked, were nobly defending their lives and religious liberties." Their political opinions accorded with those of Hampden, Sydney, and Russell; and considering that the king (Charles II.) had forfeited his crown, without any probability of success, they declared war against his government. They were rash and daring in the extreme; but it is now agreed that they were most cruelly oppressed, and Solomon himself has told us, that "oppression will make a wise man mad."

They were sometimes called Whigs, from their attachment to the cause of liberty; and "mountain men," from their being obliged to take refuge among the mountains. In their religious principles they were rigid adherents to "the solemn league and covenant," and they warmly supported the Revolution of 1688, though they protested against the ecclesiastical establishment as then settled in Scotland. They have ever since lived in peaceable submission to the laws; and, in proof of the loyalty of their principles, they state that "the twenty-sixth regiment of foot was first raised by their body, and still bears the name of Cameronians." In 1743, Mr. Millan, and others of their preachers, constituted a presbytery, which they called "the Reformed Presbytery," on account of their strict adherence to the principles of the Reformation in Scotland, in the sixteenth century.

This denomination, though not numerous, have three presbyteries—in Scotland, Ireland, and North America. In Scotland they have sixteen congregations—some very small, and two of them are called collegiate charges, having two ministers each. In Ireland they have six congregations, and nine in America; but most of them are stated to be without pastors. See R. Adam's R. W. vol. ii. p. 157, &c. CAMISARS, or CAMISARDS; French prophets, or fanatics of the Cevennes, as they were sometimes called, arose in the latter part of the seventeenth century. M. Grégoire attributes their origin to a certain "school of the prophets" in Dauphiny, conducted by a Calvinist named Du Serre. As he has not given his authority, we can only say the thing is not incredible. The ebullitions of enthusiasm have often arisen in the temple of piety; and when real Christians have met for devotion, the exterior signs of piety have sometimes deeply impressed and excited the imitation of persons who were strangers to the inward principle. Such have wrought themselves up to an exaggerated state of feeling, which they have in some cases mistaken for devotion, and in others for inspiration; and even good and intelligent men have been sometimes drawn into the delusion, as appears to have been the case in the instructive and melancholy instance now before us.

These pretended prophets first appeared in Dauphiny and Vivarais. In the year 1688, five or six hundred Protestants of both sexes gave themselves out to be prophets, and inspired of the Holy Ghost, and they soon amounted to many thousands. They had strange fits, which came upon them with tremblings and faintings, as in a swoon, which made them stretch out their arms and legs, and stagger several times before they dropped down. They struck themselves with their hands; they fell on their backs, shut their eyes, and heaved their breasts. The symptoms answer exactly to those produced by inspiring nitrous oxide, and were the fact then discovered, we should have been tempted to suspect imposture. They remained a while in trances, and coming out of them, declared that they saw the heavens open, the angels, paradise, and hell. Those who were just on the point of receiving the spirit of prophecy dropped down, not only in the assemblies, but in the fields, and in their own houses, crying out Mercy. The least of their assemblies made up four or five hundred, and some of them amounted to even three or four thousand. The hills rebounded with their loud cries for mercy, and with imprecations against the priests, the pope, and his anti-Christian dominion; with predictions of the approaching fall of popery. All they said at these times was heard and received with reverence and awe.

In the year 1706, three or four of these prophets came over into England, and brought their prophetic spirit with them, which discovered itself in the same way, namely, by ecstasies, and agitations, and inspirations under them, as it had done in France: and they propagated the like spirit to others, so that before the year was out, there were two or three hundred of these prophets in and about London, of both sexes, and of all ages.

The great subject of their prediction was, the near approach of the kingdom of God, the happy times of the church, and the millennial state. Their message was, (and they were to proclaim it as heralds to every nation under heaven,) that the grand jubilee, "the acceptable year of the Lord," the accomplishment of those numerous Scriptures concerning the new heavens, and the new earth, the kingdom of the Messiah, the marriage of the Lamb, the first resurrection, or the new Jerusalem descending from above, was now even at the door—that this great operation was to be effected by spiritual arms only, proceeding from the mouths of those who should by inspiration, or the mighty gift of the Spirit, be sent forth in great numbers to labor in the vineyard—that this mission of God's servants should be witnessed to by signs and wonders from heaven, by a deluge of judgments on the wicked universally throughout the world; as famine, pestilence, earthquakes, wars, &c.; that the exterminating angels should root out the tares, and there shall remain upon earth only good corn; and the works of men being thrown down, there shall be but one Lord, one faith, one heart, and one voice among mankind. And they declared that all the great things they have spoke of would be manifest over the whole earth, within the term of three years.

These prophets also pretended to the gift of languages, of miracles, of discerning, &c. Discerning the secrets of the heart; the power of conferring the same spirit on others by the laying on of hands, and the gift of healing. To prove they were really inspired by the Holy Ghost, they alleged the complete joy and satisfaction they experienced, the spirit of prayer which was poured forth upon them, and the answer of their prayers by the Most High.

These pretensions, however, laid the foundation of their detection and complete overthrow. They went so far as to pretend to raise the dead, and fixed upon one of their own number for the experiment, who was to rise on a particular day. But Dr. Enes did not rise, nor could they raise him.

The press teemed on this occasion, as well may be supposed, with publications pro and con. One of the most remarkable was entitled, "A Brand snatched from the Burning;" &c.; and contained the confessions and re-tractations of one John Keymer, who was apprentice to a printer. His wife and sister, it seems, were first drawn into the snare, and thus urged him to "seek the blessing," as it was called, by imposition of the hands of these prophets. This accordingly he did receive from the hands of Elias Marion, one of those who had come from France, who pronounced over him several sentences in French, which he did not understand; but they were afterwards translated for him, and given to him written in English. They purported to be the words of God himself, expressed in the first person, and began thus: "My child, till now thou hast been rebellious to my will. I come, I tell thee, to appropriate thy heart to me. . . . Resign thyself to follow me. I call thee." Poor Keymer did so (as he supposed) for a considerable time, till he saw the failure of all the predictions of these prophets; and the extravagance and licentiousness of their conduct, which at last proceeded to open adultery, completely cured him. Among the predictions falsified, one was, the burning of London on the 25th of March, and another, the conversion of queen Anne, who was to go and prophesy in Barbican. Among the most celebrated of these prophets was John Lacey, Esq., a member of Mr. Calamy's congregation, and a man of considerable property, who entered into all their absurdities, except that of a community of goods, to which he strongly objected, having an income of two thousand pounds per annum. In one of his fits of inspiration, Mr. Calamy, (afterwards Dr. C.) had an opportunity of seeing him, and gives the following account of it:

"I went into the room where he sat, walked up to him, and asked him how he did; and, taking him by the hand, lifted it up, when it fell flat upon his knees, as it lay before. He took no notice of me, nor made me any answer; but I observed the humming noise grow louder and louder by degrees, and the heaving in his breast increased, till it came up to his throat, as if it would have suffocated him; and then he at last began to speak, or, as he would have it taken, the Spirit spake in him. The speech was syllabical, and there was a distinct heave and breath between each syllable; but it required attention to distinguish the words. When the speech was over, the humming and heaving gradually abated; and I again took him by the hand, and felt his pulse, which moved pretty quick; but I could not perceive by his hands any thing like sweating, or more than common heat."

Mr. Walter Wilson, from whom we take this quotation, adds: "Some time after this, Mr. Lacey, without giving the least notice, got up one morning, left his lady in bed, quitted his house and children, and, taking a few necessaries with him, went to live among the prophets. Then he took to himself for wife Betty Gray, who had been a snuffer of candles at the playhouse, but now passed for a person inspired. This transaction, in one of his inspirations, which Mr. Calamy saw, he called a quitting Hagar and taking himself to Sarah; and declared that he did it by order of the Spirit!" CAMMERHOF, (FREDERIC), a Moravian bishop, came to this country in 1746, to assist bishop Spangenberg. In 1748, he visited the establishment at Shomokin, on the Susquehanna; in 1750 he repaired to Onondaga to promote the introduction of the gospel amongst the Inroquois. He died at Bethlehem, his usual place of residence, April 28, 1751, greatly deplored. During four years he had baptized eighty-nine Indians. There was so much sweetness and benevolence in his character, as to impress even the savages with respect for him. His mild and friendly behavior once turned the heart of an Indian, enraged by his reproofs, who had resolved to kill him.—Loskiel; Allen.

CAMP, or ENCAMPMENT, of the Israelites. The whole body of the people, consisting of six hundred thousand fighting men, besides women and children, was disposed under four battalions, so placed as to inclose the tabernacle, in the form of a square, and each under one general standard. (See ARMIES.) There were forty-one encampments, from their first in the month of March, at Rameses, in the land of Goshen, in Egypt, and in the wilderness, until they reached the land of Canaan. They are thus enumerated in Numbers 33:—

1. Rameses	21. Haradah
2. Succoth	22. Makheloth
3. Etham, on the edge of the wilderness	23. Tahath
4. Pihahiroth	24. Tarah
5. Marah	25. Mithcah
6. Elim	26. Hashmothah
7. By the Red sea	27. Moseroth
8. Wilderness of Sin	28. Bene-jaakan
9. Dophkah	29. Hor-hagidgad
10. Alush	30. Jotbathah
11. Rephidim	31. Ebronah
12. Wilderness of Sinai	32. Ebion-gaber
13. Kibroth-hattaavah	33. Kadesh
14. Hazereth	34. Mount Hor
15. Rithmah	35. Zalmonah
16. Rimmon-parez	36. Ponon
17. Libnah	37. Oboth
18. Rissah	38. Ije-abarim
19. Kehelethah	39. Dibon-gad
20. Shapher	40. Almon-diblathaim
	41. Mountains of Abarim .

In the second year after their exodus from Egypt, they were numbered; and upon an exact poll, the number of their males amounted to six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty, from twenty years old and upwards. Num. 1: 2. This vast mass of people, encamped in beautiful order, must have presented a most impressive spectacle. That it failed not to produce effect upon the richly endowed and poetic mind of Balaam, appears from Numbers 24: 2, "And Balaam lifted up his eyes and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he took up his parable and said, How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river side, as the trees of lign aloes which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees beside waters." Grandeur, order, beauty, and freshness, were the ideas at once suggested to the mind of this unfaithful prophet, and called forth his unwilling admiration. Perhaps we may consider this spectacle as a type of the order, beauty and glory of the true "church in the wilderness," in those happy days when God "shall not behold iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel;" when it shall be said, "The Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them."—Watson.

CAMP-MEETINGS; religious festivals held among the Methodists in some parts of England, and the United States of America, and also among the Presbyterians in the back settlements of the latter country. In Kentucky, and some adjacent parts, not fewer than fifteen or twenty thousand people assemble on such occasions. They come in wagons or on horseback from distant districts, bring provisions with them, and erecting booths under the dense shade of the forests, they devote a whole week to the religious exercises of the period. They have prayer meetings, &c. in separate tents, or in groups in the open air, morning and evening, and four sermons daily, two in the earlier, and two in the latter part of the day, while the festival lasts. The great day is the Sabbath, when the vast population of the more immediate neighborhood assemble and swell the numbers, and the ordinance of the Lord's supper is administered. According to the testimony of those who have been present, nothing can exceed the effect produced by the evening scene, when the otherwise impenetrable gloom of the woods is lighted up into one blaze by the numerous fires which are kindled and kept burning, and the sound of so many thousands of voices, causing the immense groves to re-echo the praises of the Most High. The general order and propriety which prevail on such occasions evince the deep hold which religion has on the minds of those who thus meet for the purposes of spiritual edification and improvement.—Hend. Buck.

CAMPBELL, (George, D. D.), an eminently learned and liberal divine of the last century, was born on the 25th of December, 1719, at Aberdeen, Scotland. He sprang from a very honorable stock, numbering among his ancestors several of the descendants of the family of Argyle. His father, the Rev. Colin Campbell, was one of the ministers of the city of Aberdeen, and held in high estimation by good men of all denominations, for his pious and benevolent disposition; so that he was often intrusted by the provincial synod, and other public bodies, with the distribution of their charitable donations. His wife's name was Margaret, the daughter of Alexander Walker, Esq., who had been provost of the city; by her he had three sons and three daughters, who were in very early life deprived of this worthy guide of their youth, as he died on the 27th of August, 1728, regretted by every one that knew him, both on account of his unaffected manners, diffusive benevolence, and faithful discharge of the duties of his profession. As George, the subject of this memoir, was the youngest son, his portion of his father's scanty inheritance was very small; it was to his own exertions, and the great natural energy of his mind, that he was chiefly indebted for his progress and advancement in future life. He received the rudiments of classical instruction at the grammar school of his native city, which had been famed for more than a century for the successful teaching of the Latin tongue; and he afterwards entered as student at Marischal college, where the celebrated Dr. Thomas Blackwell, principal and professor of Greek, had introduced an ardent zeal for prosecuting the study of that very rich and expressive language. Thus he laid betimes an ample and solid foundation for that profound and various erudition, and that critical sagacity, by which he afterwards rendered such essential services to the church. It seems to have been once his intention to prepare himself for the study of the law; and we find him actually engaged as an apprentice to a writer to the signet in Edinburgh. He acquired in this situation that knowledge of the constitution and laws of his country, and that habit of close reasoning and accurate inditing, for which he was afterwards so much distinguished. He soon, however, became dissatisfied with this profession, and betook himself to the study of the Scriptures, and whatever would tend to qualify him for the office of a minister of the gospel. Before the expiration, therefore, of his apprenticeship, he attended the lectures on divinity, then delivered by professor Goddie, at the university of Edinburgh; and not long afterwards became a student of theology, under professor Lumsden, of King's college, and professor Chalmers, of Marischal college, Aberdeen. Here he particularly distinguished himself by his discourses, delivered, according to usual custom, in the Scotch universities. Wishing, however, to acquire further information and greater skill in polemical divinity than these exercises would afford, he entered into a literary association, with several of the other students, among whom may be particularly mentioned the Rev. Dr. Glennie, Mr. James McKail, and Mr. William Forbes. This society was formed in the month of January, 1742, and a number of young men of great promise were gradually admitted into it; but, according to the account given by several of the members, Mr. Campbell was considered as the life and soul of the society, and as one likely to attain great eminence in his profession. Like most young men of genius, his style was rather florid; but he made no parade of science: the discourses delivered by him, when a youth, displayed much good sense, a sound knowledge of theology, and an intimate acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures; and whenever they appeal to the imagination or the passions, abound in the finest and most touching sentiments, evincing his natural powers of eloquence, and the great success with which he had cultivated them. After the usual course of theological studies, he was proposed to the synod, and at length licensed as a preacher, on the 11th of June, 1746. Two years after this, he received a presentation to the parish of Banchory Terman, situated seventeen miles from Aberdeen, where his great talents as an expounder of Scripture, began to show themselves in his morning lectures to his congregation, which were remarkable for their great simplicity and perspicuity. While thus explaining the New Testament to his flock, he conceived the idea of translating a part of it, the result of which was his publication, several years after, of his Translation of the Four Gospels. After continuing nine years in this country parish, he was called to succeed Mr. John Bisset, as one of the ministers of Aberdeen; here his talents as a lecturer shone in their proper sphere; and having the advantage of the best libraries, he commenced a course of lectures on rhetoric, criticism, and other subjects, which were delivered to the literary society of that place, and afterwards served as the basis of his "Philosophy of Rhetoric," and other works, by which he gained much celebrity. At this time he had not published any thing, except a sermon preached before the synod of Aberdeen, on "The Character of a Minister as a Teacher and Pattern;" but this he has not included in the collection he made some time before his death, probably because of the style being not sufficiently simple. In 1759, Mr. Campbell received a royal presentation to the office of principal of Marischal college, which at that time became vacant. Two other candidates had applied for it, one of whom was supported by the magistrates of Aberdeen, and the other by the landed interest of the county, and many of the heads of the college; but Mr. Campbell having been induced to write to Archibald, duke of Argyle, who had great influence in the affairs of Scotland at that time, and having modestly stated his relation to the duke's family, this application, together with his high character and respectable talent, succeeded in procuring him the appointment. Placed thus at the head of the university, he soon approved himself worthy of his dignity. That celebrated infidel, Mr. David Hume, had just published his Essay on Miracles, which excited great attention among the learned of the day; nor did he meet with any opponent whom he deigned to notice, until professor Campbell entered the lists, and preached a sermon on the subject before the provincial synod of Aberdeen, which, at their request, he afterwards formed into a Dissertation on Miracles. Before its publication, however, he transmitted the manuscript, through the medium of his friend, Dr. Blair, of Edinburgh, for Mr. Hume's inspection. The philosopher, notwithstanding all his indifference, evidently felt the force of the arguments used in this learned and acute performance; he objected to a few expressions, and pointed out some instances in which he had been misunderstood; on which Mr. Campbell revised the work, generously expunging the offensive expressions, and made use of the remarks of his opponent, to render his dissertation more complete. When published, a copy was sent to Mr. Hume, who was so pleased with his conduct, that he declared he felt an inclination to answer it, if he had not in early life made a determination never to answer any opponent. This dissertation appeared in 1763, and was dedicated to the earl of Bute, at that time prime minister: it had a most extensive sale in this country, and was translated into the French, Dutch, and German languages; so that the name of Dr. Campbell, (for he had in the mean time received the degree of doctor of divinity from King's college,) was regarded with the greatest respect by the literary men of every European state. For twelve years he discharged the duties of principal of Marischal college, being held in equally high estimation by the professors and the students, and living on the most happy terms with all his colleagues. He was esteemed a most worthy man, a sincere Christian, a good preacher, and above all, one of the best lecturers of his time; he used very few, sometimes not any notes, and where he spoke entirely extempore, he seldom failed in enlightening the understanding, and moving the hearts of his auditors. On the 26th of June, 1771, he was appointed professor of divinity in his college, instead of Dr. Gerard, who was removed to King's; and as he was thus called to additional labor, he found it necessary to resign his pastoral charge as one of the ministers of the city; as minister of Gray Friars, however, an office connected with the professorship, he preached once on the Lord's day in one of the established churches. Dr. Campbell did not adhere closely to the customary prelections of the former professors, who used to meet the students twice a week during the session, and spend one of these opportunities in hearing them discourse: he intimated, immediately on commencing his labors, that he should always deliver lectures twice in the week, and fixed upon another day for hearing the students' discourses, when they had any to deliver. He was the first professor that ever limited the compass of subjects in the divinity lectures; it had been the custom to extend them far beyond the period usually allotted to the study of those subjects; but Dr. Campbell very wisely confined them within the space of four years, so that every student had, by this means, the advantage of attending the whole course. The chief excellence of these lectures, however, consisted in their ingenuity and profound learning; in their luminous arrangement and admirable perspicuity; and above all, in the method which he always pursued, of leading the students to think for themselves, and not slavishly to depend upon the opinions and systems of others made ready to their hands. His own understanding was at once capacious and acute; he was too independent to be fettered by human systems, and too judicious to be led astray by fanciful theories; he would declare the truth, how much soever it might conflict with his own private notions and practices, or those of the body with which he stood connected. Deeply skilled in church history, Scripture criticism, polemical divinity, and every subject of importance to the student and the minister, he was eminently qualified to direct the studies of others, while his public discourses and labors well exemplified the instructions that he gave. His Lectures on Ecclesiastical History furnish ample illustration of these remarks; they were not published till after the author's death, being revised and written out for the press only a short time before his last illness. In the month of April, 1771, he preached and published his excellent sermon on the spirit of the gospel, which will be long read as an admirable specimen of his talents and candor. Five years afterwards, he completed his Philosophy of Rhetoric, the two first chapters of which he had composed at least twenty-five years before. This work abounds with most interesting remarks on style and elocution, and the most accurate criticism; the theory of evidence which it contains, the Encyclopædia Britannica describes as the most valuable part, "to which there is nothing superior; perhaps nothing equal, in our own, or any other language." In 1776, on the day appointed for a fast, on account of the American war, Dr. Campbell preached a sermon on the nature, extent, and importance of allegiance. This discourse, in which the author disputes the right of the colonies to throw off their allegiance, was written with so much force of argument, and in so excellent a spirit, that, at the request of dean Tucker, six thousand copies were circulated through America. The following year, another discourse appeared on the success of the first preachers of the gospel, considered as a proof of its truth. It was preached before the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, and published at their request. Here "the policy of heaven" and "that of this world" are finely contrasted; and the argument for the divine origin of the gospel, from the success of its first publishers, triumphantly stated. In the year 1779, the doctor evinced his liberality of sentiment in "An Address to the People of Scotland, on the alarm raised by the bill in favor of the Roman Catholics." The following sentiments, extracted from this able pamphlet, contain at once the happiest illustration of the writer's spirit and manner, and the most luminous statement of the argument itself. "Let popery be as black as you will: call it Beelzebub, if you please; it is not by Beelzebub, that I am for casting out Beelzebub, but by the Spirit of God. We exclaim against popery; and in exclaiming against it, betray but too manifestly, that we have imbibed the spirit for which we detest it. In the most unlovely spirit of popery, we would fight against popery! It is not by such weapons, that God has promised to consume the man of sin, but by the breath of his mouth; that is, his word. Christians, in ancient times, confided in the divine promises; we, in these days, confide in parliament! True religion never flourished so much—never spread so rapidly, as when, instead of persecuting, it was persecuted; instead of obtaining support from human sanctions, it had all the terrors of the magistrate and the laws armed against it."

Dr. Campbell published several other discourses; but the last, and most valuable production of his pen, was his "Translation of the Four Gospels," which is generally admitted to be excellent; and the preliminary dissertations with which it is accompanied, have done much in removing some of those difficulties which are to be met with in the commonly received version. This admirable work has met with a most extensive circulation; the author, however, did not long survive to witness its success. On the 31st of March, 1796, while sitting with his friends, he was taken ill; but the next morning he was at his desk as usual, though he complained that he could not write with his accustomed ease. The following day he had a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of his speech, under which he languished till his death, which happened on the 7th of April, giving no other signs of sensibility than his frequent efforts to speak. Though he was not permitted to leave a testimony behind at the time of his decease, he had already borne one about five years before, when he was judged to be at the point of death. On that occasion, he expressed himself in the following terms: "God has been pleased to give me some understanding of his promises in the gospel of his Son Jesus Christ. These I have communicated to others in my life. I now entertain the faith and hope of them; and this may be considered as the testimony of a dying man." Within a year of his death, he resigned his office of divinity professor in the Marischal college; and soon after, his majesty having graciously conferred on him a pension of three hundred pounds per annum, he gave up his situation as principal, and retired from public life. He was small in stature, and in old age, rather inclined to stoop; his countenance was open, and his eye piercing, and indicative of great mental acumen. He studied very closely, especially towards the latter part of his life, rising generally at five o'clock in the morning, and continuing, with few and short intervals, engaged in study till twelve at night; and yet, owing to his regularity of living and great temperance, his constitution was not impaired; so that he had entered on the seventy-seventh year of his age at the period of his decease. His character may be summed up in a few words. His imagination was fertile; his judgment vigorous and acute; his learning profound and various; of a cheerful temper, unfeigned piety, and unblemished morals, of modest and gentle manners, and remarkable for his ingenuousness, and love of truth; in short, as a man and a Christian, in public, or in private life, as a husband, as a minister of the gospel, and as the principal of a college and professor of divinity, he had, perhaps, few equals—certainly no superior.—Life, by the Rev. George Skene Keith; Jones's Chris. Biog.

CAMPFIRE; Canticles 1: 14; 4: 13. Sir T. Browne supposes that the plant mentioned in the Canticles, rendered kupros in the Septuagint, and Zyprus in the Vulgate, is that described by Dioscorides and Pliny, which grows in Egypt, and near to Ascalon, producing an odorate bush of flowers, and yielding the celebrated oleum cyprinum. This is one of the plants which is most grateful to the eye and the smell. The deep color of its bark, the light green of its foliage, the softened mixture of white and yellow with which the flowers, collected into long clusters like the lilac, are colored; the red tint of the ramifications which support them, form an agreeable combination. The flowers, whose shades are so delicate, diffuse around the sweetest odors, and embalm the gardens and apartments which they embellish. The women take pleasure in decking themselves with these nosegays of beauty and clusters of fragrance.

With the powder of the dried leaves, also, they give an orange tincture to their nails, to the inside of their hands, and to the soles of their feet. The expression, rendered "pare their nails;" Deut. 21: 12, may perhaps rather mean, "adorn their nails;" and imply the antiquity of this practice. This is a universal custom in Egypt, and not to conform to it would be considered indecent. It seems to have been practised by the ancient Egyptians, for the nails of the mummies are most commonly of a reddish hue.—Watson.

CAMUS, (JOHN PETER;) a French prelate, was born at Paris, in 1582, and was made bishop of Belley by Henry IV. After having held his see for twenty years, he resigned it to live in retirement; but his virtues and piety soon occasioned him to be drawn from his retreat. He was appointed vicar-general to the archbishop of Rouen; and, subsequently, bishop of Arras. He died in his seventieth year, when on the point of going to his new diocese. His works, which are said to amount to more than two hundred volumes, have fallen into oblivion. Of the mendicant monks he was a determined and persevering enemy, and he incessantly attacked them with the keenest railery and satire.—Davenport.

CANA; the city in which our Lord performed his first miracle, was in Galilee, and pertained to the tribe of Zebulon. The village now bearing the name, and supposed to occupy the site of the ancient town, is pleasantly situated on the descent of a hill, about sixteen miles north-west of Tiberias, and six north-east of Nazareth. Dr. Richardson states, that in a small Greek church in this place, he was shown an old stone pot, made of the common compact lime-stone of the country, which the hierophant informed him was one of the original pots that contained the water which underwent the miraculous change at the wedding, which was here honored by the presence of Christ. "It is worthy of note," says Dr. Clarke, "that walking among the ruins of a church, we saw large massy stone pots, answering the description given of the ancient vessels of the country; not preserved nor exhibited as reliques, but lying about, disregarded by the present inhabitants, as antiquities with whose original use they were unacquainted. From their appearance, and the number of them, it was quite evident, that a practice of keeping water in large stone pots, each holding from eighteen to twenty-seven gallons, was once common in the country." (Travels, P. ii. ch. 14.) Cana, or, as it is now called, Kefer Kenna, or Cane Gali, contains about three hundred inhabitants, who are chiefly catholic Christians. There was another place bearing the same name, belonging to the tribe of Asher, which was situated in the neighborhood of Sidon.—Calmet.

CANAAN, the son of Ham. The Hebrews believe that Canaan, having first discovered Noah's nakedness, told his father Ham; and that Noah, when he awoke, having understood what had passed, cursed Canaan, the first author of the offence. Others are of opinion, that Ham was punished in his son Canaan, Gen. 9: 25. For though Canaan is mentioned, Ham is not exempted from the malediction; on the contrary, he suffers more from it, since parents are more affected with their children's misfortunes than with their own; especially if the evils have been inflicted through some fault or folly of theirs. Some have thought that Canaan may be put elliptically for the father of Canaan, that is, Ham, as it is rendered in the Arabic and Septuagint translations.

The posterity of Canaan was numerous. His eldest son, Sidon, founded the city of Sidon, and was father of the Sidonians and Phœnicians. Canaan had ten other sons, who were fathers of as many tribes, dwelling in Palestine and Syria; namely, the Hittites, the Jebusites, the Amorites, the Girgasites, the Hivites, the Arkites, the Sinites, the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hemathites. It is believed that Canaan lived and died in Palestine, which from him was called the land of Canaan. Notwithstanding the curse is directed against Canaan the son, and not against Ham the father, it is often supposed that all the posterity of Ham were placed under the malediction, "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." But the true reason why Canaan only was mentioned probably is, that the curse was in fact restricted to the posterity of Canaan. It is true that many Africans, descendants of other branches of Ham's family, have been largely and cruelly enslaved; but so have other tribes in different parts of the world. There is certainly no proof that the negro race were ever placed under this malediction. Had they been included in it, this would neither have justified their oppressors, nor proved that Christianity is not designed to remove the evil of slavery. But Canaan, alone in his descendants, is cursed, and Ham only in that branch of his posterity. It follows that the subjugation of the Canaanitish races to Israel fulfils the prophecy. To them it was limited, and with them it expired. Part of the seven nations of the Canaanites were made slaves to the Israelites, when they took possession of their land; and the remainder by Solomon.

CANAAN, LAND OF. In the map it presents the appearance of a narrow slip of country, extending along the eastern coast of the Mediterranean; from which, to the river Jordan, the utmost width does not exceed fifty miles. This river was the eastern boundary of the land of Canaan, or Palestine, properly so called, which derived its name from the Philistines originally inhabiting the coast. To three of the twelve tribes, however, Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, portions of territory were assigned on the eastern side of the river, which were afterwards extended by the subjugation of the neighboring nations. The territory of Tyre and Sidon was its ancient border on the north-west; the range of the Libanus and Anti-libanus forms a natural boundary on the north and north-east; while in the south it is pressed upon by the Syrian and Arabian deserts. Within this circumscribed district, such were the physical advantages of the soil and climate, there existed, in the happiest periods of the Jewish nation, an immense population. The kingdom of David and Solomon, however, extended far beyond these narrow limits. In a north-eastern direction, it was bounded only by the river Euphrates, and included a considerable part of Syria. It is stated that Solomon had dominion over all the region on the western side of the Euphrates, from Thipsah, or Thapsacus, on that river, in latitude thirty-five degrees twenty minutes, to Azzah, or Gaza. "Tadmor in the wilderness," (Palmyra,) which the Jewish monarch is stated to have built, (that is, either founded or fortified,) is considerably to the north-east of Damascus, being only a days' journey from the Euphrates; and Hamath, the Epiphania of the Greeks, (still called Hamah,) in the territory belonging to which city Solomon had several "store cities," is seated on the Orontes, in latitude thirty-four degrees forty-five minutes north. On the east and south-east, the kingdom of Solomon was extended by the conquest of the country of Moab, that of the Ammonites, and Edom; and tracts which were either inhabited or pastured by the Israelites, lay still further eastward. Maon, which belonged to the tribe of Judah, and was situated in or near the desert of Paran, is described by Abulfeda as the farthest city of Syria towards Arabia, being two days' journey beyond Zoar. In the time of David, the people of Israel, women and children included, amounted, on the lowest computation, to five millions; besides the tributary Canaanites, and other conquered nations. The vast resources of the country, and the power of the Jewish monarch, may be estimated not only by the consideration in which he was held by the contemporary sovereigns of Egypt, Tyre, and Assyria, but by the strength of the several kingdoms into which the dominions of David were subsequently divided. Damascus revolted during the reign of Solomon, and shook off the Jewish yoke. At his death, ten of the tribes revolted under Jeroboam, and the country became divided into the two rival kingdoms of Judah and Israel, having for their capitals Jerusalem and Samaria. The kingdom of Israel fell before the Assyrian conqueror, in the year B. C. 721, after it had subsisted about two hundred and fifty years. That of Judah survived about one hundred and thirty years, Judea being finally subdued and laid waste by Nebuchadnezzar, and the temple burned, B. C. 588. Idumea was conquered a few years after. From this period till the era of Alexander the Great, Palestine remained subject to the Chaldean, Median, and Persian dynasties. At his death, Judea fell under the dominion of the kings of Syria, and, with some short and troubled intervals, remained subject either to the kings of Syria or of Egypt, till John Hyrcanus shook off the Syrian yoke, and assumed the diadem, B. C. 130. The Asmonean dynasty, which united, in the person of the monarch, the functions of king and pontiff, though tributary to Roman conquerors, lasted one hundred and twenty-six years, till the kingdom was given by Antony to Herod the Great, of an Idumean family, B. C. 39.

2. At the time of the Christian era, Palestine was divided into five provinces; Judea, Samaria, Galilee, Perea, and Idumea. On the death of Herod, Archelaus, his eldest son, succeeded to the government of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, with the title of tetrarch; Galilee being assigned to Herod Antipas; and Perea, or the country beyond Jordan, to the third brother, Philip. But in less than ten years, the dominions of Archelaus became annexed, on his disgrace, to the Roman province of Syria; and Judea was thenceforth governed by Roman procurators. Jerusalem, after its final destruction by Titus, A. D. 71, remained desolate and almost uninhabited, till the emperor Hadrian colonized it, and erected temples to Jupiter and Venus on its site. The empress Helena, in the fourth century, set the example of repairing in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, to visit the scenes consecrated by the gospel narrative; and the country became enriched by the crowds of devotees who flocked there. In the beginning of the seventh century, it was overrun by the Saracens, who held it till Jerusalem was taken by the crusaders in the twelfth. The Latin kingdom of Jerusalem continued for about eighty years, during which the Holy Land streamed continually with Christian and Saracen blood. In 1187, Judea was conquered by the illustrious Saladin, on the decline of whose kingdom it passed through various revolutions, and at length, in 1317, was finally swallowed up in the Turkish empire.

Palestine is now distributed into pashalics. That of Acre or Akka extends from Djebail nearly to Jaffa; that of Gaza comprehends Jaffa and the adjacent plains; and these two being now united, all the coast is under the jurisdiction of the pasha of Acre. Jerusalem, Hebron, Nablous, Tiberias, and, in fact, the greater part of Palestine, are included in the pashalic of Damascus, now held in conjunction with that of Aleppo; which renders the present pasha, in effect, the viceroy of Syria. Though both pashas continue to be dutiful subjects to the grand seignor in appearance, and annually transmit considerable sums to Constantinople to insure the yearly renewal of their office, they are to be considered as tributaries, rather than subjects of the porte; and it is supposed to be the religious supremacy of the sultan, as caliph and vicar of Mahomet, more than any apprehension of his power, which prevents them from declaring themselves independent. The reverence shown for the firmans of the porte throughout Syria attests the strong hold which the sultan maintains, in this character, on the Turkish population. The pashas of Egypt and Bagdad are attached to the Turkish sovereign by the same ecclesiastical tie, which alone has kept the ill-compacted and feeble empire from crumbling to ruin.

3. A few additional remarks upon the topography and climate will tend to elucidate the force of many of those parts of Scripture which contain allusions to these topics. Dr. E. D. Clarke, after stating his resolve to make the Scriptures his only guide throughout this interesting territory, says, "The delight afforded by the internal evidences of truth, in every instance where their fidelity of description was proved by a comparison with existing documents, surpassed even all we had anticipated. Such extraordinary instances of coincidence even with the customs of the country as they are now exhibited, and so many wonderful examples of illustration afforded by contrasting the simple narrative with the appearances presented, made us only regret the shortness of our time, and the limited sphere of our abilities for the comparison." Judea is beautifully diversified with hills and plains—hills now barren and gloomy, but once cultivated to their summits, and smiling in the variety of their produce, chiefly the olive and the vine; and plains, over which the Bedouin now roves to collect a scanty herbage for his cattle, but once yielding an abundance of which the inhabitants of a northern climate can form no idea. Rich in its soil; glowing in the sunshine of an almost perpetual summer; and abounding in scenery of the grandest, as well as of the most beautiful kind; this happy country was indeed a land which the Lord had blessed: but Mahometan sloth and despotism, as the instruments employed to execute the curse of heaven, have converted it into a waste of rock and desert, with the exception of some few spots, which remain to attest the veracity of the accounts formerly given of it. The hills of Judea frequently rise into mountains; the most considerable of which are those of Lebanon and Hermon, on the north; those which surround the sea of Galilee, and the Dead sea, also attain a respectable elevation. The other mountains of note are, Carmel, Tabor, Ebal, and Gerizim, and the mountains of Gilboa, Gilead, and Abarim; with the summits of the latter, Nebo and Pisgah: a description of which will be found under their respective heads. Many of the hills and rocks abound in caverns, the refuge of the distressed, or the resorts of robbers.

4. From the paucity of rain which falls in Judea, and the heat and dryness of the atmosphere for the greater part of the year, it possesses but few rivers; and as these have all their rise within its boundaries, their course is short, and their size inconsiderable: the principal is the Jordan, which runs about a hundred miles. The other remarkable streams are, the Arnon, the Jabbok, the Kishon, the Kedron, the Besor, the Sorek, and the stream called the river of Egypt. These, also, will be found described under their respective heads. This country was once adorned with woods and forests; as we read of the forest of cedars in Lebanon, the forest of oaks in Bashan, the forest or wood of Ephraim, and the forest of Hareth in the tribe of Judah. Of these, the woods of Bashan alone remain; the rest have been swept away by the ravages of time and of armies, and by the gradual consumption of the inhabitants, whose indolence and ignorance have prevented their planting others.

5. There are no volcanoes now existing in Judea or its vicinity: nor is mention made of any in history, although volcanic traces are found in many parts on its eastern side, as they are also in the mountains of Edom on the south, the Djebel Shera and Hesma, as noticed by Burckhardt. There can be no doubt that many of the sacred writers were familiarly acquainted with the phenomena of volcanoes; whence it may be inferred that they were presented to their observation at no great distance, and from which they drew some of their sublimest imagery. Mr. Horne has adduced the following instances: "The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence. His fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him," Nahum 1: 5, 6. "Behold, the Lord cometh forth out of his place, and will come down and tread upon the high places of the earth. And the mountains shall be molten under him, and the valleys shall be cleft as wax before the fire, and as the waters that are poured down a steep place," Micah 1: 3, 4. "O that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence. As when the melting fire burneth, the fire causeth the waters to boil, to make thy name known to thine adversaries, that the nations may tremble at thy presence. When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for, thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence," Isa. 64: 1-3.

6. The climate of Judea, from the southern latitude of the country, is necessarily warm. The cold of winter is, indeed, sometimes greater than in European climates situated some degrees farther to the north; but it is of short duration, and the general character of the climate is that of heat. Both heat and cold are, however, tempered by the nature of the surface; the winter being scarcely felt in the valleys, while in the summer the heat is almost insupportable; and, on the contrary, in the more elevated parts, during the winter months, or rather weeks, frosts frequently occur, and snow sometimes falls, while the air in summer is comparatively cool and refreshing. Many winters pass without either snow or frost; and in the coldest weather which ever occurs, the sun in the middle of the day is generally warm, and often hot; so that the pain of cold is in reality but little felt, and the poor who cannot afford fires may enjoy, during several hours of the day, the more genial and invigorating influence of the sun. This is the ordinary character of the winters; though in some years, as will be seen presently, the cold is more severely felt during the short time that it prevails, which is never more than two months, and more frequently not so much as one. Towards the end of November, or beginning of December, domestic fires become agreeable. It was at this time that Jehoikim, king of Judah, is represented by Jeremias as sitting in his winter house, with a fire burning on the hearth before him, Jeremias 36: 22. The same luxury, though frequently by no means necessary, is used by the wealthy till the end of March.

7. Rain only falls during the autumn, winter, and spring, when it sometimes descends with great violence: the greatest quantity, and that which properly constitutes the rainy season, happening between the autumnal equinox, or somewhat later, and the beginning of December; during which period, heavy clouds often obscure the sky, and several days of violent rain sometimes succeed each other with winds. This is what in Scripture is termed the early or the former rain. Showers continue to fall at uncertain intervals, with some cloudily but more fair weather, till towards the vernal equinox, when they become again more frequent and copious till the middle of April. These are the latter rains, Joel 2: 23. From this time to the end of May, showers come on at irregular intervals, gradually decreasing as the season advances; the sky being for the most part serene, and the temperature of the air agreeable, though sometimes acquiring a high degree of heat. From the end of May, or beginning of June, to the end of September, or middle of October, scarce a drop of rain falls, the sky being constantly unclouded, and the heat generally oppressive. During this period, the inhabitants commonly sleep on the tops of their houses. The storms, especially in the autumn, are preceded by short but violent gusts of wind, which, from the surface of a parched soil, raise great clouds of dust; which explains what is meant by, "Ye shall not see wind," 2 Kings 3: 7. The continuation of the same passage likewise implies, that such circumscripted whirlwinds were generally considered as the precursors of rain: a circumstance likewise alluded to by Solomon, who says, "Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift, is like clouds and wind without rain," Prov. 25: 14. Another prognostic of an approaching storm is a small cloud rising in the west, and increasing until it overspreads the whole heavens. Such was the cloud, "like a man's hand," which appeared to Elijah, on mount Carmel; which spread "till the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain," 1 Kings 18: 44. To this phenomenon, and the certainty of the prognostic, our Savior alludes: "When ye see a cloud" (or the cloud, tau nephelēn) "rise out of the west, straightway ye say, There cometh a shower; and so it is," Luke 12: 54. The same appearance is noticed by Homer:—

"Slow from the main the heavy vapors rise,
Spread in dim streams, and sail along the skies,
Till black as night the swelling tempest shows,
The cloud condensing as the west wind blows.
He dreads the impending storm," &c. POPE.

Hail frequently falls in the winter and spring in very heavy storms, and with hail-stones of an enormous size. Dr. Russell says that he has seen some at Aleppo which measured two inches in diameter; but sometimes they are found to consist of irregularly shaped pieces, weighing near three ounces. The copious dew forms another peculiarity of this climate, frequently alluded to in Scripture: so copious, indeed, is it sometimes, as to resemble small rain, and to supply the wants of superficial vegetation. Mr. Maundrell, when travelling near mount Hermon, says, "We were instructed by experience what the Psalmist means by 'the dew of Hermon,' Psalm 133: 3; our tents being as wet with it, as if it had rained all night."

7. The seasons are often adverted to in Scripture, under the terms "seed-time and harvest." The former, for wheat, is about the middle of October to the middle or end of November: barley is put into the ground two and sometimes three months later. The wheat harvest commences about the twentieth of May, and early in June the whole is off the ground. The barley harvest, it is to be observed, is generally a fortnight earlier. A survey of the astonishing produce of this country, and of the manner in which its most rocky and, to appearance, insuperably sterile parts, are made to yield to the wants of man, will be sufficient to refute the objections raised by sceptical writers against the possibility of its furnishing subsistence to the multitude of its former inhabitants recorded in Scripture. Dr. Clarke, when travelling from Napolose to Jerusalem, relates, "The road was mountainous, rocky, and full of loose stones; yet the cultivation was every where marvellous; it afforded one of the most striking pictures of human industry which it is possible to behold. The limestone rocks and stony valleys of Judea were entirely covered with plantations of figs, vines, and olive trees: not a single spot seemed to be neglected. The hills, from their bases to their utmost summits, were entirely covered with gardens: all of these were free from weeds, and in the highest state of agricultural perfection. Even the sides of the most barren mountains had been rendered fertile, by being divided into terraces, like steps rising one above another, whereon soil had been accumulated with astonishing labor. Among the standing crops, we noticed millet, cotton, linseed, and tobacco; and occasionally small fields of barley. A sight of this territory can alone convey any adequate idea of its surprising produce: it is truly the Eden of the east, rejoicing in the abundance of its wealth. Under a wise and a beneficent government, the produce of the Holy Land would exceed all calculation. Its perennial harvest; the salubrity of its air; its limpid springs; its rivers, lakes, and matchless plains; its hills and dales;—all these, added to the serenity of its climate, prove this land to be indeed a field which the Lord hath blessed: God hath given it of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." An oriental's ideas of fertility differ, however, from ours; for to him, plantations of figs, vines, and olives, with which the limestone rocks of Judea were once covered, would suggest the same associations of plenty and opulence that are called up in the mind of an Englishman by rich tracts of corn-land. The land of Canaan is characterized as flowing with milk and honey; and it still answers to this description; for it contains extensive pasture-lands of the richest quality, and the rocky country is covered with aromatic plants, yielding to the wild bees, who live in the hollow of the rocks, such abundance of honey as to supply the poorer classes with an article of food. Honey from the rocks is repeatedly referred to in the Scriptures, as a delicious food, and an emblem of plenty, 1 Sam. 11: 25; Psalm 81: 16. Dates are another important article of consumption; and the neighborhood of Judea was famous for its numerous palm trees, which are found springing up from chance-sown kernels in the midst of the most arid districts. When to these wild productions we add the oil extracted from the olive, so essential an article to an oriental, we shall be at no loss to account for the ancient fertility of the most barren districts of Judea, or for the adequacy of the soil to the support of so numerous a population, notwithstanding the comparatively small proportion of arable land. There is no reason to doubt, however, that corn and rice would be imported by the Tyrian merchants; which the Israelites would have no difficulty in exchanging for the produce of the olive-ground and the vineyard, or for their flocks and herds. Delicious wine is still produced in some districts, and the valleys bear plentiful crops of tobacco, wheat, barley, and millet. Tacitus compares both the climate and the soil, indeed, to those of Italy; and he particularly specifies the palm tree and balsam tree as productions which gave the country an advantage over his own. Among other indigenous productions may be enumerated the cedar and other varieties of the pine, the cypress, the oak, the sycamore, the mulberry tree, the fig tree, the willow, the turpentine tree, the acacia, the aspen, the arbutus, the myrtle, the almond tree, the tamarisk, the oleander, the peach tree, the chaste tree, the carob or locust tree, the oskar, the doom, the mustard-plant, the aloe, the citron, the apple, the pomegranate, and many flowering shrubs. The country about Jericho was celebrated for its balsam, as well as for its palm trees; and two plantations of it existed during the last war between the Jews and the Romans, for which both parties fought desperately. But Gilead appears to have been the country in which it chiefly abounded: hence the name "balm of Gilead." Since the country has fallen under the Turkish dominion, it has ceased to be cultivated in Palestine, but is still found in Arabia. Other indigenous productions have either disappeared or are now confined to circumscribed districts. Iron is found in the mountain range of Libanus, and silk is produced in abundance in the plains of Samaria.

9. The grand distinction of Canaan, however, is, that it was the only part of the earth made, by divine institution, a type of heaven. So it was exhibited to Abraham, and also to the Jews. It pointed to the eternal rest which the spiritual seed of the father of the faithful were to enjoy after the pilgrimage of life; its holy city was the figure of the "Jerusalem above;" and Zion, with its solemn and joyful services, represented that "hill of the Lord" to which the redeemed shall come with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; where they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall fly away.—Watson.

CANAANITES, the posterity of Canaan by his eleven sons, who are supposed to have settled in the land of Canaan, soon after the dispersion of Babel. Five of these are known to have dwelt in the land of Canaan; viz., Heth, Jebus, Hemor or Amor, Gargashi, and Hevi or Hivi; and these, together with their father Canaan, became the heads of so many nations. Sini or Sini was another son of Canaan, whose settlement is not so precisely ascertained; but some authors infer, from the affinity of their names, that the desert of Sin, and mount Sinai, were the places of his abode, and that they were so called from him. The Hittites inhabited the country about Hebron, as far as Beersheba, and the brook Besor, reckoned by Moses the southern limits of Canaan. The Jebusites dwelt near them on the north, as far as the city of Jebus, since called Jerusalem. The Amorites possessed the country on the east side of Jordan, between the river Arnon on the south-east, and mount Gilead on the north, afterwards the lot of Reuben and Gad. The Gargashites lay next above the Amorites, on the east side of the sea of Tiberias, and their land was afterwards possessed by the half-tribe of Manasseh. The Hivites dwelt northward, under mount Libanus. The Perizzites, who make one of the seven nations of the Canaanites, are supposed, by Heylin and others, to be the descendants of Sini or Sini; and it is probable, since we do not read of their abode in cities, that they lived dispersed, and in tents, like the Scythians, roving on both sides of the Jordan, on the hills and plains; and that they were called by that name from the Hebrew pharatz, which signifies "to disperse." The Canaanites dwelt in the midst of all, and were surrounded by the rest. This appears from the sacred writings to have been the respective situation of those seven nations, which are said to have been doomed to destruction for their idolatry and wickedness, when the Israelites first invaded their country. The learned have not absolutely determined whether the nations proceeding from Canaan's other six sons should be reckoned among the inhabitants of the land of Canaan. The prevalent opinion is, that they were not included. As to the customs, manners, arts, sciences, and language of the seven nations that inhabited the land of Canaan, they must, from the situation they severally occupied, have been very different. Those who inhabited the sea-coast were merchants, and by reason of their commerce and wealth scattered colonies over almost all the islands and maritime provinces of the Mediterranean. (See PHENICIA.) The colonies which Cadmus carried to Thebes in Bœotia, and his brother Cilix into Cilicia, are said to have proceeded from the stock of Canaan. Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, Cyprus, Corfu, Majorca, Minorca, Gades, and Ebutris, are supposed to have been peopled by the Canaanites. The other Canaanites, whose situation was inland, were employed partly in pasturage, and partly in tillage, and they were also well skilled in the exercise of arms. Those who dwelt in the walled cities, and who had fixed abodes, cultivated the land; and those who wandered about, as the Perizzites seem to have done, grazed cattle: so that among the Canaanites, we discover the various classes of merchants, and consequently, mariners; of artificers, soldiers, shepherds, and husbandmen. We learn, also, from their history, that they were all ready, however diversified by their occupations or local interests, to join in a common cause; that they were well appointed for war, both offensive and defensive; that their towns were well fortified; that they were sufficiently furnished with military weapons and warlike chariots; that they were daring, obstinate, and almost invincible; and that they were not destitute of craft and policy. Their language, we find, was well understood by Abraham, who was an Hebrew, for he conversed readily with them on all occasions; but as to their mode of writing, whether it was originally their own, or borrowed from the Israelites, it is not so easy to determine. Their religion, at least in part, seems to have been preserved pure till the days of Abraham, who acknowledged Melchisedek to be priest of the most high God; and Melchisedek was, without doubt, a Canaanite, or, at least, dwelt at that time in Canaan in high esteem and veneration.

2. But we learn from the Scripture history, that the Hittites in particular were become degenerate in the time of Isaac and Rebekah; for they could not endure the thoughts of Jacob's marrying one of the daughters of Heth, as Esau had done. From this time, then, we may date the prevalence of those abominations which subjected them to the divine displeasure, and made them unworthy of the land which they possessed. In the days of Moses, they were become incorrigible idolaters; for he commands his people to destroy their altars, and break down their images, (statues or pillars,) and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. And lest they should pervert the Israelites, the latter were strictly enjoined not to intermarry with them; but "to smite them, and utterly destroy them, nor show mercy upon them," Deut. 7: 1-5. They are accused of the cruel custom of sacrificing men, and are said to have made their seed pass through the fire to Moloch, Levit. 18: 21. Their morals were as corrupt as their doctrine: adultery, bestiality of all sorts, profanation, incest, and all manner of uncleanness, are the sins laid to their charge. "The Canaanites," says Mr. Bryant, "as they were a sister tribe of the Mizraim, resembled them in their rites and religion. They held a heifer, or cow, in high veneration, agreeably to the customs of Egypt. Their chief deity was the sun, whom they worshipped, together with the Baalim, under the titles of Ourchol, Adonis, or Thamuz."

3. When the measure of the idolatries and abominations of the Canaanites was filled up, God delivered their country into the hands of the Israelites, who conquered it under Joshua. However, they resisted with obstinate valor, and kept Joshua employed six years, from the time of his passing the river Jordan, and entering Canaan, in the year B. C. 1451, to the year B. C. 1445, the sabbatical year beginning from the autumnal equinox; when he made a division of the land among the tribes of Israel, and rested from his conquests. As God had commanded this people, long before, to be treated with rigor, (see Deut. 7: 2.) Joshua extirpated great numbers, and obliged the rest to fly, some of them into Africa, and others into Greece. Procopius says, they first retreated into Egypt, but advanced into Africa, where they built many cities, and spread themselves over those vast regions which reach to the straits, preserving their old language with little alteration. In the time of Athanasius, the Africans still said they were descended from the Canaanites; and when asked their origin, they answered, "Canaan." It is agreed, that the Punic tongue was nearly the same as the Canaanitish or Hebrew.—Hutton.

CANAANITES, DESTRUCTION OF. On the rigorous treatment of the nations of Canaan by the Israelites, to which infidels have taken so many exceptions, the following remarks of Paley are a sufficient reply: The first thing to be observed is, that the nations of Canaan were destroyed for their wickedness. This is plain from Lev. 18: 21, &c. Now the facts disclosed in this passage sufficiently testify, that the Canaanites were a wicked people; that detestable practices were general amongst them, and even habitual; that it was for these enormities the nations of Canaan were destroyed. It was not, as some have imagined, to make way for the Israelites; nor was it simply to make away with their idolatry; but it was because of the abominable crimes which usually accompanied the latter. And we may further learn from the passage, that God's abhorrence of these crimes and his indignation against them are regulated by the rules of strict impartiality, since Moses solemnly warns the Israelites against falling into the like wicked courses, "that the land," says he, "cast not you out also, when you defile it, as it cast out the nations that were before you; for whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people," Lev. 18: 28, 29. Now, when God, for the wickedness of a people, sends an earthquake, or a fire, or a plague amongst them, there is no complaint of injustice, especially when the calamity is known, or expressly declared beforehand, to be inflicted for the wickedness of such people. It is rather regarded as an act of exemplary penal justice, and, as such, consistent with the character of the moral Governor of the universe. The objection, therefore, is not to the Canaanitish nations being destroyed; (for when their national wickedness is considered, and when that is expressly stated as the cause of their destruction, the dispensation, however severe, will not be questioned;) but the objection is solely to the manner of destroying them. I mean there is nothing but the manner left to be objected to: their wickedness accounts for the thing itself. To which objection it may be replied, that if the thing itself be just, the manner is of little signification, of little signification even to the sufferers themselves. For where is the great difference, even to them, whether they were destroyed by an earthquake, a pestilence, a famine, or by the hands of an enemy? Where is the difference, even to our imperfect apprehensions of divine justice, provided it be, and is known to be, for their wickedness that they are destroyed? But this destruction, you say, confounded the innocent with the guilty. The sword of Joshua, and of the Jews, spared neither women nor children. Is it not the same with all other national visitations? Would not an earthquake, or a fire, or a plague, or a famine amongst them have done the same? Even in an ordinary and natural death, the same thing happens; God takes away the life he lends, without regard, that we can perceive, to age, or sex, or character. "But, after all, promiscuous massacres, the burning of cities, the laying waste of countries, are things dreadful to reflect upon." Who doubts it? so are all the judgments of Almighty God. The effect, in whatever way it shows itself, must necessarily be tremendous, when the Lord, as the Psalmist expresses it, "moveth out of his place to punish the wicked." But it ought to satisfy us; at least this is the point upon which we ought to rest and fix our attention; that it was for excessive, wilful, and forewarned wickedness, that all this befel them, and that it is all along so declared in the history which recites it.

But further, if punishing them by the hands of the Israelites rather than by a pestilence, an earthquake, a fire, or any such calamity, be still an objection, we may perceive, I think, some reasons for this method of punishment in preference to any other whatever; always bearing in our mind, that the question is not concerning the justice of the punishment, but the mode of it. It is well known, that the people of those ages were affected by no proof of the power of the gods which they worshipped, so deeply as by their giving them victory in war. It was by this species of evidence that the superiority of their own gods above the gods of the nations which they conquered, was, in their opinion, evinced. This being the actual persuasion which then prevailed in the world, no matter whether well or ill founded, how were the neighboring nations, for whose admonition this dreadful example was intended, how were they to be convinced of the supreme power of the God of Israel above the pretended gods of other nations; and of the righteous character of Jehovah, that is, of his abhorrence of the vices which prevailed in the land of Canaan? How, I say, were they to be convinced so well, or at all indeed, as by enabling the Israelites, whose God he was known and acknowledged to be, to conquer under his banner, and drive out before them, those who resisted the execution of that commission with which the Israelites declared themselves to be invested, namely, the expulsion and extermination of the Canaanitish nations? This convinced surrounding countries, and all who were observers or spectators of what passed, first, that the God of Israel was a real God; secondly, that the gods which other nations worshipped, were either no gods, or had no power against the God of Israel; and thirdly, that it was he, and he alone, who possessed both the power and the will, to punish, to destroy, and to exterminate from before his face, both nations and individuals, who gave themselves up to the crimes and wickedness for which the Canaanites were notorious. Nothing of this sort would have appeared, or with the same evidence, from an earthquake, or a plague, or any natural calamity. These might not have been attributed to divine agency at all, or not to the interposition of the God of Israel.

Another reason which made this destruction both more necessary, and more general, than it would have otherwise been, was the consideration, that if any of the old inhabitants were left, they would prove a snare to those who succeeded them in the country; would draw and seduce them by degrees into the vices and corruptions which prevailed among themselves. Vices of all kinds, but vices most particularly of the licentious kind, are astonishingly infectious. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. A small number of persons, addicted to them, and allowed to practise them with impunity or encouragement, will spread them through the whole mass. This reason is formally and expressly assigned, not simply for the punishment, but for the extent to which it was carried; namely, extermination: "Thou shalt utterly destroy them, that they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods."

In reading the old Testament account, therefore, of the Jewish wars and conquests in Canaan, and the terrible destruction brought upon the inhabitants thereof, we are always to remember that we are reading the execution of a dreadful but just sentence pronounced by Jehovah against the intolerable and incorrigible crimes of these nations; that they were intended to be made an example to the whole world of God's avenging wrath against sins, which, if they had been suffered to continue, might have polluted the whole ancient world, and which could only be checked by the signal and public overthrow of nations notoriously addicted to them, and so addicted as even to have incorporated them into their religion and their public institutions; and that the Israelites were mere instruments in the hands of a righteous Providence for effecting the extirpation of a people, of whom it was necessary to make a public example to the rest of mankind; that this extermination, which might have been accomplished by a pestilence, by fire, by earthquakes, was appointed to be done by the hands of the Israelites, as being the clearest and most intelligible method of displaying the power and the righteousness of the God of Israel, his power over the pretended gods of other nations, and his righteous indignation against the crimes into which they were fallen.—Watson; Paley's Sermons, Ser. 29.

CANDACE, the name of an Ethiopian queen, whose eunuch coming to Jerusalem to worship the Lord, was baptized by Philip the deacon, near Bethsura, in the way to Gaza, as he was returning to his own country, Acts 8: 27. The Ethiopia here mentioned was the isle or peninsula of Meroë to the south of Egypt, which, as Mr. Bruce shows, is now called Atbara, up the Nile. Candace was the common name of the queens of that country. Strabo and Pliny mention queens of that name as reigning in their times. That the queen mentioned in the Acts was converted by the instrumentality of her servant, and that the country thus received Christianity at that early period, are statements not supported by any good testimony. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.—Watson.

CANDLESTICK. The instrument so rendered by our translators was more properly a stand for lamps. One of beaten gold was made by Moses, (Exod. 25: 31, 32,) and put into the tabernacle in the holy place, over against the table of shew-bread. The basis of this candlestick was also of pure gold; it had seven branches, three on each side, and one in the middle. When Solomon had built the temple, he was not satisfied with placing one golden candlestick there, but had ten put up, of the same form and metal with that described by Moses, five on the north, and five on the south side of the holy place, 1 Kings 7: 49. After the Jews returned from their captivity, the golden candlestick was again placed in the temple, as it had been before in the tabernacle by Moses. The lamps were kept burning perpetually; and were supplied morning and evening with pure olive oil. Josephus says, that after the Romans had destroyed the temple, the several things which were found within it, were carried in triumph to Rome, namely, the golden table, and the golden candlestick with seven branches. These were lodged in the temple built by Vespasian, and consecrated to Peace; and at the foot of mount Palatine, there is a triumphal arch still visible, upon which Vespasian's triumph is represented, and the several monuments which were carried publicly in the procession are engraved, and among the rest the candlestick with the seven branches, which are still discernible upon it. In Rev. 1: 12—20, mention is made of seven golden candlesticks, which are said to be emblems of the seven Christian churches.—Watson.

CANKER, OR GANGRENE; a terrible disease, which inflames and mortifies the flesh upon which it seizes; spreads swiftly; endangers the whole body; and can scarcely be healed without cutting off the infected part. By the microscope it appears, that swarms of small worms, preying on the flesh, constitute this disease; and that new swarms, produced by these, overrun the neighboring parts. Errors and heresies are likened to a canker; they overspread, corrupt, and prey on the souls of men; they destroy the vitals of religion, and afterward the forms of godliness, and bring spiritual ruin and death on persons and churches, and afterwards ruin upon nations, wherever they are allowed, 2 Tim. 2: 17. Covetous men's silver and gold are cankered; the rust thereof bears witness against them, and eats their flesh as fire: the covetous hoarding it up from use is attended with painful anxiety, and brings on a fearful curse, and endless torment. James 5: 3.—Brønn.

CANKER-WORM, ialek; Psalm 105: 34; Jer. 51: 27, where it is rendered caterpillar; Joel 1: 4; 2: 25; Nahum 3: 15, canker-worm. As it is frequently mentioned with the locust, it is thought by some to be a species of that insect. It certainly cannot be the canker-worm, as our version renders it; for in Nahum, it is expressly said to have wings and fly, to camp in the hedges by day, and commit its depredations in the night. But it may be, as the Septuagint renders it in five passages out of eight where it occurs, the bruchus, or "hedge-chaffer." Nevertheless, the passage, (Jer. 51: 27,) where the ialek is described as "rough," that is, with hair standing an end on it, leads us very naturally to the rendering of our translators in that place, "the rough caterpillar," which, like other caterpillars, at a proper time, casts its exterior covering and flies away in a winged state. Scheuchzer observes that we should not, perhaps, be far from the truth, if with the ancient interpreters, we understood this ialek, after all, as a kind of locust; as some species of them have hair principally on the head, and others have prickly points standing out.—Watson.

CANNE, (JOHN) the celebrated author of the marginal references and notes to the Bible, was born in England about the year 1590 or 1600. In early life, this learned and excellent man was a minister in the established church; but adopting the principles of the Non-conformists, he seceded, and joined the Baptists not far from 1630. He was for some time pastor of the church in Southwark, London; being successor to Mr. Hubbard, its first pastor. He was banished to Holland, where not considering baptism a prerequisite to communion, he succeeded the learned Ainsworth (see AINSWORTH, HENRY, D. D.) as pastor of his church in Amsterdam, and was deservedly popular. While in banishment in 1634, he published a work on the "Necessity of Separation from the Church of England." In 1640, he returned for a short time, on a visit to England, and founded the Baptist church in Broadmead, Bristol, of which Robert Hall was the late pastor. It was then called a "gathered church," to distinguish it from that of the parish. Mr. Canne was equally eminent for learning, piety, knowledge of the Scriptures, and zeal for reformation. In a conference with Mr. Fowler, a pious minister of the establishment, on the duty of "cleaving close to the doctrine of the Lord Jesus in his instituted worship," Mr. Fowler agreed with him in the necessity and duty of reformation; but objecting that at that time "they should not be suffered, but would be cast out of all the public places," Mr. Canne answered, "That mattered not, they should have a barn to meet in, keeping the worship and commands of the Lord as they were delivered us!" He was styled by Mr. John Rogers, in 1657, an "old sufferer and standard against the prelates and tyrants, old and new."

But that which has immortalized the name of Canne, is his judicious selection of marginal references to the Bible. He was the author of three sets of notes, which accompanied three editions of the Bible. The first printed at Amsterdam in 1647, is dedicated To the Right Honourable the Lords and Commons assembled in the High Court of Parliament. In the preface to the second, 1664, he says, in allusion to Jacob's seven years' service for Rachel, "I can truly speak it, I have served the Lord in this work more than thrice seven years, and the time hath not seemed long, neither hath the work been any burden to me, for the love I have had to it." His great ambition was to make the Bible its own interpreter. He prepared for the press a third edition, with large annotations; but it seems it was never published, and this greatest labor of his life was lost to the world.—Ivimey's Hist. Eng. Bop.

CANON. The word kanon had long been in use among the early ecclesiastical writers, and in very general acceptance, before it was transferred to a collection of holy Scriptures. It meant no more, generally, than a "book," and a "catalogue;" but in particular:—1. A "catalogue of things that belong to the church;" or, a "book, that served for the use of the church." Hence a collection of hymns which were to be sung on festivals, as also a list, in which were introduced the names of persons belonging to the church, acquired the name of kanon. The word was used in a sense yet more limited; of 2. A "publicly approved catalogue of all the books that might be read in public assemblies of Christians, for instruction and edification." Finally, but not until very recent times, it has comprised immediately, 3. A "collection of divine and inspired writings." The last signification most modern scholars have adopted. They use, therefore, canonical and inspired, (kanonikos and theopneustos,) as perfectly synonymous.

I. CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. Soon after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, a collection was prepared of all writings of the Hebrews then extant, which, on account of their antiquity, contents, authors, and the claims of divine inspiration which they possessed, became revered and holy in the view of all the members of the new government. In the temple was deposited a sacred library of these writings, which, for a considerable time before Christ, the particular year is unknown, ceased to be further enlarged.

After the period when this collection was made, there arose, among the Jews, authors of a different kind, historians, philosophers, poets, and theological romancers. Now they had books, very unlike in value, and of various ages. The earlier were held, as productions of prophets, to be holy; the later were not, because they were composed in times when there was no longer an uninterrupted prophetic succession. The ancient were preserved in the temple; the modern were not. The ancient were introduced into a public collection; the modern into none whatever, at least into none of a public nature. And if the Alexandrian Christians had not been such great admirers of them, if they had not added them to the manuscripts of the Septuagint, (in the original, if composed in the Greek language; and in a Greek translation, if the autograph was Hebrew,) who knows whether we might have a single page remaining of all the modern Jewish writers?

At a late period, a long time since the birth of Christ, these two kinds of writings have been distinguished by appropriate names, derived chiefly from the use which was made of the writings; the earlier were called CANONICAL, the more recent, APOCRYPHAL BOOKS. And the whole collection of the former was comprehended under the appellation of CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

It has been pretty generally agreed that the forming of the present canon of the Old Testament should be attributed to Ezra. To assist him in this work, the Jewish writers inform us, that there existed in his time a great synagogue, consisting of one hundred and twenty men, including Daniel and his three friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; the prophets Haggai and Zachariah; and also Simon the Just. But it is very absurd to suppose that all these lived at one time, and formed one synagogue, as they are pleased to represent it: for from the time of Daniel to that of Simon the Just, no less than two hundred and fifty years must have intervened.

It is, however, by no means improbable, that Ezra was assisted in this great work by many learned and pious men, who were contemporary with him, and as prophets had always been the superintendents, as well as writers of the sacred volume, it is likely that the inspired men who lived at the same time as Ezra, would give attention to this work. But in regard to this great synagogue, the only thing probable is, that the men who are said to have belonged to it, did not live in one age, but successively, until the time of Simon the Just, who was made high-priest about twenty-five years after the death of Alexander the Great. This opinion has its probability increased by the consideration, that the canon of the Old Testament appears not to have been fully completed, until about the time of Simon the Just. Malachi seems to have lived after the time of Ezra, and therefore his prophecy could not have been added to the canon by this eminent scribe, unless we adopt the opinion of the Jews, who will have Malachi to be no other than Ezra himself; maintaining, that while Ezra was his proper name, he received that of Malachi from the circumstance of his having been sent to superintend the religious concerns of the Jews, for the import of that name is messenger, or one sent.

But this is not all,—in the book of Nehemiah mention is made of the high-priest Jaddua, and of Darius Codomanus, king of Persia, both of whom lived at least a hundred years after the time of Ezra. In the third chapter of the first book of Chronicles, the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel is carried down, at least, to the time of Alexander the Great. This book, therefore, could not have been put into the canon by Ezra; nor much earlier than the time of Simon the Just. The book of Esther, also, was probably added during this interval.

The probable conclusion therefore is, that Ezra began this work, and collected and arranged all the sacred books which belonged to the canon before his time, and that a succession of pious and learned men continued to pay attention to the canon, until the whole was completed, about the time of Simon the Just. After which nothing was ever added to the canon of the Old Testament.

Most, however, are of opinion, that nothing was added after the book of Malachi was written, except a few names and notes; and that all the books belonging to the canon of the Old Testament were collected and inserted in the sacred volume by Ezra himself. And this opinion seems to be the safest, and is by no means incredible in itself. It accords also with the uniform tradition of the Jews, that Ezra completed the canon of the Old Testament; and that after Malachi there arose no prophet who added any thing to the sacred volume.

Whether the books were now collected into a single volume, or were bound up in several codices, is a question of no importance; if we can ascertain what books were received as canonical, it matters not in what form they were preserved. It seems probable, however, that the sacred books were at this time distributed into three volumes,—the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa. This division we know to be as ancient as the time of our Savior, for he says, "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me." Luke 24: 44. Josephus, also, makes mention of this division, and it is by the Jews, with one consent, referred to Ezra, as its author.

In establishing the canon of the Old Testament, we might labor under considerable uncertainty and embarrassment, in regard to several books, were it not that the whole of what are called the Scriptures, and which are included in the threefold division mentioned above, received the explicit sanction of our Lord. He was not backward to reprove the Jews for disobeying, misinterpreting, and adding their traditions to the Scriptures, but he never drops a hint that they had been unfaithful, or careless, in the preservation of the sacred books. So far from this, he refers to the Scriptures as an infallible rule, which "must be fulfilled," and "could not be broken."

We have, therefore, an important point established with the utmost certainty, that the volume of Scripture which existed in the time of Christ and his apostles, was uncorrupted, and was esteemed by them as an inspired and infallible rule. Now, if we can ascertain what books were then included in the sacred volume, we shall be able to settle the canon of the Old Testament without uncertainty.

To do this, it is necessary to resort to other sources of information; and happily the Jewish historian, Josephus, furnishes us with the very information which we want; not, indeed, as explicitly as we could wish, but sufficiently so to lead us to a very satisfactory conclusion. He does not name the books of the Old Testament, but he numbers them, and so describes them, that there is scarcely room for any mistake. The important passage to which we refer, is in his first book against Apion. "We have," says he, "only two-and-twenty books which are to be believed as of divine authority, of which five are the books of Moses. From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, the prophets who were the successors of Moses, have written in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God, and documents of life for the use of men." Now the five books of Moses are universally agreed to be Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The thirteen books written by the prophets will include Joshua, Judges, with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, with Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel; the twelve minor prophets, Job, Ezra, Esther, and Chronicles. The four remaining books will be Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, which make the whole number twenty-two; the canon then existing is proved to be the same as that which we now possess. It would appear, indeed, that these books might more conveniently be reckoned twenty-four, and this is the present method of numbering them by the modern Jews; but formerly the number was regulated by that of the Hebrew alphabet, which consists of twenty-two letters; therefore they annexed the small book of Ruth to Judges, and probably it is a continuation of this book by the same author. They added, also, the Lamentations of Jeremiah to his prophecy, and this was natural enough. As to the minor prophets, which form twelve separate books in our Bibles, they were anciently always reckoned one book; so they are considered in all ancient catalogues, and in every quotation from them.

But we are able also to adduce other testimony to prove the same thing. Some of the early Christian fathers, who had been brought up in paganism, when they embraced Christianity were curious in their inquiries into the canon of the Old Testament, and the result of the researches of some of them still remain. Melito, bishop of Sardis, travelled into Judea, for the very purpose of satisfying himself on this point. And although his own writings are lost, Eusebius has preserved his catalogue of the books of the Old Testament, from which it appears that the very same books were, in his day, received into the canon, as are now found in our Hebrew Bibles. And the interval between Melito and Josephus is not a hundred years, so that no alteration in the canon can be reasonably supposed to have taken place in this period. Very soon after Melito, Origen furnishes us with a catalogue of the books of the Old Testament, which perfectly accords with our canon, except that he omits the minor prophets; which omission must have been a mere slip of the pen in him or his copyist, as it is certain that he received this as a book of holy Scripture; and the number of the books of the Old Testament, given by him in this very place, cannot be completed without reckoning the twelve minor prophets as one.

After Origen, we have catalogues, in succession, not only by men of the first authority in the church, but by councils, consisting of numerous bishops, all which are perfectly the same as our own. It will be sufficient merely to refer to these sources of information. Catalogues of the books of the Old Testament have been given by Athanasius, by Cyril, by Augustine, by Jerome, by Rufin, by the council of Laodicea, in their sixtieth canon, and by the council of Carthage. There is also a catalogue in the Talmud, which perfectly corresponds with ours. And when it is considered that all these catalogues exactly correspond with our present canon of the Hebrew Bible, the evidence must appear complete to every impartial mind, that the canon of the Old Testament is settled upon the clearest historical grounds. There seems to be nothing to be wished for further in confirmation of this point.

II. CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. Many persons who write and speak on the subject of the New Testament canon, appear to entertain a wrong impression in regard to it; as if the books of the New Testament could not be of authority until they were sanctioned by some ecclesiastical council, or by some publicly expressed opinion of the fathers of the church; and as if any portion of their authority depended on their being collected into one volume. But the truth is, that every one of these books was of authority, as far as known, from the moment of its publication; and its right to a place in the canon is not derived from the sanction of any church or council, but from the fact that it was written by inspiration. And the appeal to testimony is not to prove that any council of bishops or others, gave sanction to the book, but to show that it is indeed the genuine work of Matthew, or John, or Peter, or Paul, whom we know to have been inspired.

The books of the New Testament were, therefore, of full authority before they were collected into one volume; and it would have made no difference if they had never been included in one volume, but had retained that separate form in which they were first published. And it is by no means certain that these books were, at a very early period, bound in one volume. As far as we have any testimony on the subject, the probability is, that it was more customary to include them in two volumes, one of which was called the gospel, and the other the apostles. Some of the oldest manuscripts of the New Testament extant, appear to have been put up in this form; and the fathers often refer to the Scriptures of the New Testament under these two titles. The question—when was the canon constituted?—admits, therefore, of no other proper answer than this, that as soon as the last book of the New Testament was written and published, the canon was completed. But if the question relates to the time when these books were collected and published in a single volume, or in two volumes, it admits of no definite answer; for those churches which were situated nearest to the place where any particular books were published, would, of course, obtain copies much earlier than churches in a remote part of the world. For a considerable period, the collection of these books in each church must have been necessarily incomplete; for it would take some time to send to the church or people with whom the autographs were deposited, and to write off fair copies. This necessary process will also account for the fact, that some of the smaller books were not received by the churches so early nor so universally as the larger. The solicitude of the churches to possess immediately the more extensive books of the New Testament, would doubtless induce them to make a great exertion to acquire copies; but probably the smaller would not be so much spoken of, nor would there be so strong a desire to obtain them without delay. Considering how difficult it is now, with all our improvements in the typographical art, to multiply copies of the Scriptures with sufficient rapidity, it is truly wonderful how so many churches as were founded during the first century, to say nothing of individuals, could all be supplied with copies of the New Testament, when there was no speedier method of producing them, than by writing every letter with the pen! The pen of a ready writer must then, indeed, have been of immense value. The idea entertained by some, especially by Dodwell, that these books lay for a long time locked up in the coffers of the churches to which they were addressed, and totally unknown to the rest of the world, is in itself most improbable, and is repugnant to all the testimony which exists on the subject. Even as early as the time when Peter wrote his second epistle, the writings of Paul were in the hands of the churches, and were classed with the other Scriptures. 2 Peter 3: 14, 15. And the citation from these books, by the earliest Christian writers, living in different countries, demonstrates that from the time of their publication, they were sought after with avidity, and were widely dispersed. How intense the interest which the first Christians felt in the writings of the apostles, can scarcely be conceived by us, who have been familiar with these books from our earliest years. How solicitous would they be, for example, who had never seen Paul, but had heard of his wonderful conversion, and extraordinary labors and gifts, to read his writings? And probably they who had enjoyed the high privilege of hearing this apostle preach, would not be less desirous of reading his epistles! As we know, from the nature of the case, as well as from testimony, that many uncertain accounts of Christ's discourses and miracles had obtained circulation, how greatly would the primitive Christians rejoice to obtain an authentic history, from the pen of an apostle, or from one who wrote precisely what was dictated by an apostle? We need no longer wonder, therefore, that every church should wish to possess a collection of the writings of the apostles; and knowing them to be the productions of inspired men, they would want no further sanction to their authority. All that was requisite was to be certain that the book was indeed written by the apostle whose name it bore. Hence some things in Paul's epistles, which seem to common readers to be of no importance, are of the utmost consequence. Such as;—I, Tertius, who wrote this epistle, &c. The salutation with mine own hand. So I write in every epistle. Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. The salutation by the hand of me, Paul. The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle. This apostle commonly employed an amanuensis; but that the churches to which he wrote might have the assurance of the genuineness of his epistles, from seeing his own hand-writing, he constantly wrote the salutation himself. So much care was taken to have these sacred writings well authenticated on their first publication. And on the same account it was that he and the other apostles were so particular in giving the names and the characters of those who were the bearers of their epistles. And it seems that they were always committed to the care of men of high estimation in the church; and commonly more than one appears to have been intrusted with this important commission.

If it be inquired, what became of the autographs of these sacred books, and why they were not preserved, since this would have prevented all uncertainty respecting the true reading, and would have relieved the biblical critic from a large share of labor? it is sufficient to answer, that nothing different has occurred, in relation to these autographs, from that which has happened to all other ancient writings. No man can produce the autograph of any book as old as the New Testament, unless it has been preserved in some extraordinary way, as in the case of the manuscripts of Herculaneum; neither could it be supposed, that in the midst of such vicissitudes, revolutions and persecutions, as the Christian church endured, this object could have been secured by any thing short of a miracle. And God knew, by a superintending providence over the sacred Scriptures, they could be transmitted with sufficient accuracy, by means of apographs, to the most distant generations. Indeed, there is reason to believe that the Christians of early times were so absorbed and impressed with the glory of the truths revealed, that they gave themselves little concern about the mere vehicle by which they were communicated. They had matters of such deep interest, and so novel, before their eyes, that they had neither time nor inclination for the minutiae of criticism. It may be therefore, that they did not set so high a value on the possession of the autograph of an inspired book as we should, but considered a copy, made with scrupulous fidelity, as equally valuable with the original. And God may have suffered these autographs of the sacred writings to perish, lest, in process of time, they should have become idolized, like the brazen serpent; or lest men should be led superstitiously to venerate the mere parchment and ink, and form, and letters, employed by an apostle. Certainly, the history of the church is such as to render such an idea far from being improbable.

The slightest attention to the works of the fathers will convince any one that the writings of the apostles were held from the beginning, in the highest estimation; that great pains were taken to distinguish the genuine productions of these inspired men from all other books; that they were sought out with uncommon diligence, and read with profound attention and veneration, not only in private, but publicly in the churches; and that they are cited and referred to universally as decisive on every point of doctrine, and as authoritative standards for the regulation of faith and practice.

This being the state of the case when the books of the New Testament were communicated to the churches, we are enabled, in regard to most of them, to produce testimony of the most satisfactory kind, that they were admitted into the canon, and received as inspired, by the universal consent of Christians in every part of the world. And as to those few books, concerning which some persons entertain doubts, it can be shown, that as soon as their claims were fully and impartially investigated, they also were received with universal consent. And that other books, however excellent as human compositions, were never put upon a level with the canonical books of the New Testament; that spurious writings under the names of the apostles, were promptly and decisively rejected, and that the churches were repeatedly warned against such apocryphal books.

1. Catalogues.—Here, as in the case of the Old Testament, we find that, at a very early period, catalogues of these books were published; by most of the distinguished Fathers whose writings have come down to us: the same has been done, also, by several councils, whose decrees are still extant.

These catalogues are, for the most part, perfectly harmonious. In a few of them, some books now in the canon are omitted, for which omission a satisfactory reason can commonly be assigned.

1. The first regular catalogue of the books of the New Testament, which we find on record, is by Origen, who lived about one hundred years after the death of the apostle John, and whose extensive biblical knowledge highly qualified him to judge correctly in this case.

In this catalogue, he mentions, "The Four Gospels, The Acts of the Apostles, Fourteen Epistles of Paul, Two of Peter, Three of John," and "The Book of Revelation." This enumeration includes all the present canon, except the Epistles of James and Jude, but these were omitted by accident, not design; for in other parts of his writings, he acknowledges these Epistles as a part of the canon. And while Origen furnishes us with so full a catalogue of the books now in the canon, he inserts no others, which proves that in his time the canon was well settled among the learned; and that the distinction between inspired writings and human compositions was as clearly marked as at any subsequent period.

2. The next catalogue of the books of the New Testament (to which I will refer,) is that of Eusebius, the learned historian of the church; to whose diligence and fidelity, in collecting ecclesiastical facts, we are more indebted than to the labors of all other men, for that period which intervened between the days of the apostles and his own times. Eusebius may be considered as giving his testimony about one hundred years after Origen. His catalogue may be seen in his Ecclesiastical History.—Eusebius, Ecc. Hist. l. iii. c. 25, compared with c. 3. In it he enumerates every book which we now have in the canon, and no others; but he mentions that the Epistle of James, the Second of Peter, and Second and Third of John, were doubted of by some; and that Revelation was rejected by some, and received by others; but Eusebius himself declares it to be his opinion that it should be received without doubt.

There is no single witness among the whole number of ecclesiastical writers, who was more competent to give accurate information on this subject than Eusebius. He had spent a great part of his life in searching into the antiquities of the Christian church; and he had an intimate acquaintance with all the records relating to ecclesiastical affairs, many of which are now lost; and almost the only information which we have of them has been transmitted to us by this diligent compier.

3. Athanasius, so well known for his writings and his sufferings in defence of the divinity of our Savior, in his Festal Epistle, and in his Synopsis of Scripture, has left a catalogue of the books of the New Testament, which perfectly agrees with the canon now in use.

4. Cyril, in his catechetical work, has also given us a catalogue, perfectly agreeing with ours, except that he omits the book of Revelation. Why that book was so often left out of the ancient catalogues and collections of the Scriptures, shall be mentioned hereafter. Athanasius and Cyril were contemporary with Eusebius; the latter, however, may more properly be considered as twenty or thirty years later.

5. Then, a little after the middle of the fourth century, we have the testimony of all the bishops assembled in the council of Laodicea. The catalogue of this council is contained in their sixtieth canon, and is exactly the same as ours, except that the book of Revelation is omitted. The decrees of this council were, in a short time, received into the canons of the universal church; and, among the rest, this catalogue of the books of the New Testament. Thus we find, that as early as the middle of the fourth century, there was a universal consent, in all parts of the world to which the Christian church extended, as to the books which constituted the canon of the New Testament, with the single exception of the book of Revelation; and that this book was also generally admitted to be canonical, we shall take the opportunity of proving in the sequel of this work.

6. But a few years elapsed from the meeting of this council, before Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, published his work on Heresies, in which he gives a catalogue of the canonical books of the New Testament, which in every respect, is the same as the canon now received.

7. About the same time, Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople, in a poem "On the True and Genuine Scriptures," mentions distinctly all the books now received, except Revelation.

8. A few years later, we have a list of the books of the New Testament in a work of Philastrius, bishop of Brixia, in Italy, which corresponds in all respects, with those now received, except that he mentions no more than thirteen of Paul's Epistles. If the omission was designed, it probably relates to the Epistle to the Hebrews.

9. At the same time lived Jerome, who translated the whole bible into Latin. He furnishes us with a catalogue answering to our present canon in all respects. He does, however, speak doubtfully about the Epistle to the Hebrews, on account of the uncertainty of its author. But, in other parts of his writings, he shows that he received this book as canonical, as well as the rest.—Epist. ad Paulinum.

10. The catalogue of Rufin varies in nothing from the canon now received.—Expos. in Symbol. Apost.

11. Augustine, in his work on "Christian Doctrine," has inserted the names of the books of the New Testament, which, in all respects, are the same as ours.

12. The council of Carthage, at which Augustine was present, have furnished a catalogue which perfectly agrees with ours. At this council, forty-four bishops attended. The list referred to is found in their forty-eighth canon.

13. The unknown author, who goes under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, so describes the books of the New Testament as to show that he received the very same as are now in the canon.

11. Another satisfactory source of evidence in favor of the canon of the New Testament, as now received, is the fact that these books and these books alone were quoted as sacred Scripture, by all the fathers, living in parts of the world the most remote from each other. The truth of this assertion will fully appear when we come to speak particularly of the books which compose the canon. Now, how can it be accounted for, that these books, and these alone, should be cited as authority in Asia, Africa, and Europe? No other reason can be assigned, than one of these two,—either, they knew no other books which claimed to be canonical; or, if they did, they did not esteem them of equal authority with those which they cited. On either of these grounds the conclusion is the same,—THAT THE BOOKS QUOTED AS SCRIPTURE ARE ALONE THE CANONICAL BOOKS. To apply this rule to a particular case,—The First Epistle of Peter is canonical, because it is continually cited by the most ancient Christian writers in every part of the world; but the book called the Revelation of Peter is apocryphal, because none of the early fathers have taken any testimonies from it. The same is true of the Acts of Peter, and the Gospel of Peter. These writings were totally unknown to the primitive church, and are therefore spurious. This argument is perfectly conclusive, and its force was perceived by the ancient defenders of the canon of the New Testament. Eusebius repeatedly has recourse to it; and, therefore, those persons who have aimed to unsettle our present canon, as Toland and Dodwell, have attempted to prove that the early Christian writers were in the habit of quoting indifferently and promiscuously, the books which we now receive, and others which are now rejected, as apocryphal. But this is not correct, as has been shown by Nye, Richardson and others. The true method of determining this matter is by a careful examination of all the passages in the writings of the fathers, where other books besides those now in the canon have been quoted. Some progress was made in collecting the passages in the writings of the fathers, in which any reference is made to the apocryphal books, by the learned Jeremiah Jones, in his "New Method of Settling the Canon of the New Testament;" but the work was left incomplete. This author, however, positively denies that it is common for the fathers to cite these books as Scripture, and asserts that there are only a very few instances in which any of them seem to have fallen into this mistake.

III. A third proof of the genuineness of the canon of the New Testament may be derived from the fact, that these books were publicly read as Scripture in all the Christian churches.

IV. A fourth argument, to prove that our canon of the New Testament is substantially correct, may be derived from the early versions of this sacred book into other languages.

Although the Greek language was extensively known through the Roman empire when the apostles wrote, yet the Christian church was in a short time extended into regions where the common people, at least, were not acquainted with it, nor with any language except their own vernacular tongue. While the gift of tongues continued, the difficulty of making known the gospel to such people would, in some measure, be obviated; but when these miraculous powers ceased, the necessity of a version of the gospels and epistles into the language of the people would become manifest. As far, therefore, as we may be permitted to reason from the nature of the case, and the necessities of the churches, it is exceedingly probable that versions of the New Testament were made shortly after the death of the apostles, if they were not begun before. Can we suppose that the numerous Christians in Syria, Mesopotamia, and the various parts of Italy, would be long left without having these precious books translated into a language which all the people could understand? But we are not left to our own reasonings on this subject. We know that at a very early period there existed Latin versions of the New Testament, which had been so long in use before the time of Jerome, as to have become considerably corrupt, on which account he undertook a new version, which soon superseded those that were more ancient. Now, although nothing remains of these ancient Latin versions, but uncertain fragments, yet we have good evidence that they contained the same books as were inserted in Jerome's version, now denominated the Vulgate.

But perhaps the old Syriac version of the New Testament, called Peshito, furnishes the strongest proof of the canonical authority of all the books which are contained in it. This excellent version has a very high claim to antiquity; and in the opinion of some of the best Syriac scholars, who have profoundly examined this subject, was made before the close of the first century.

The arguments for so early an origin are not, indeed, conclusive, but they possess much probability, whether we consider the external or internal evidence. The Syriac Christians have always insisted that this version was made by the apostle Thaddæus; but without admitting this claim, which would put it on a level with the Greek original, we may believe that it ought not to be brought down lower than the second century. It is universally received by all the numerous sects of Syriac Christians, and must be anterior to the existence of the oldest of them. Manes, who lived in the second century, probably had read the New Testament in the Syriac, which was his native tongue; and Justin Martyr, when he testifies that the Scriptures of the New Testament were read in the assemblies of Christians on every Sunday, probably refers to Syrian Christians, as Syria was his native place, where also he had his usual residence. And Michaelis is of opinion that Melito, who wrote about A. D. 170, has expressly declared that a Syrian version of the Bible existed in his time. Jerome also testifies, explicitly, that when he wrote, the Syriac Bible was publicly read in the churches; for, says he, "Ephrem the Syrian is held in such veneration, that his writings are read in several churches immediately after the lessons from the Bible." It is also well known that the Aramaic version, which itself is ancient, was made from the Syriac.

On the general evidence of the genuineness of our Canon, I would subjoin the following remarks:—

1. The agreement among those who have given catalogues of the books of the New Testament, from the earliest times, is almost complete. Of thirteen catalogues to which we have referred, seven contain exactly the same books as are now in the canon. Three of the others differ in nothing but the omission of the book of Revelation, for which they had a particular reason, consistent with their belief of its canonical authority; and in two of the remaining catalogues, it can be proved that the books omitted or represented as doubtful, were received as authentic by the persons who have given the catalogues. It may be asserted, therefore, that the consent of the ancient church, as to what books belonged to the canon of the New Testament, was complete. The sacred Volume was as accurately formed, and as clearly distinguished from other books, in the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, as it has ever been since.

2. Let it be considered, moreover, that the earliest of these catalogues was given by Origen, who lived within a hundred years of the death of the apostle John, and who by his reading, travels, and long residence in Palestine, had a full knowledge of all the transactions and writings of the church, until his own time. In connection with this, let it be remembered, that these catalogues were drawn up by the most learned, pious, and distinguished men in the church, or by councils; and that the persons furnishing them, resided in different and remote parts of the world; as, for example, in Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Carthage and Hippo in Africa, Constantinople, Cyprus, Alexandria in Egypt, Italy, and Asia Minor. Thus it appears that the canon was early agreed upon, and that it was every where the same; therefore, we find the fathers, in all their writings, appealing to the same Scriptures; and none are charged with rejecting any canonical book, except heretics.

3. It appears from the testimony adduced, that it was never considered necessary that any council or bishop should give sanction to these books, in any other way than as witnesses, testifying to the churches that these were indeed the genuine writings of the apostles. These books, therefore, were never considered as deriving their authority from the church, or from councils, but were of complete authority as soon as published: and were delivered to the churches to be a guide and standard, in all things relating to faith and practice. The fathers would have considered it impious for any bishop or council to pretend to add any thing to the authority of inspired books, or to claim the right to add other books to those handed down from the apostles. The church is founded on the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone; but the sacred Scriptures are no how dependent for their authority on any set of men who lived since they were written.

4. We may remark, in the last place, the benignant providence of God towards his church, in causing these precious books to be written, and in watching over their preservation, in the midst of dangers and persecutions; so that, notwithstanding the malignant designs of the enemies of the church, they have all come down to us un-mutilated, in the original tongue in which they were penned by the apostles.

Our liveliest gratitude is due to the great Head of the church for this divine treasure, from which we are permitted freely to draw whatever is needful for our instruction and consolation. And it is our duty to prize this precious gift of divine revelation above all price. On the law of the Lord we should meditate day and night. It is a perfect rule; it shines with a clear light; it exercises a salutary influence on the heart, it warns us when we are in danger; reclaims us when we go astray; and comforts us when in affliction. The word of the Lord is "more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey, and the honey-comb." They who are destitute of this inestimable volume call for our tenderest compassion, and our exertions in circulating the Bible should never be remitted, until all are supplied with this divine treasure; but they who possess this sacred volume and yet neglect to study it, are still more to be pitied, for they are perishing in the midst of plenty. In the midst of light they walk in darkness. God has sent to them the word of life; but they have lightly esteemed the rich gift of his love. O that their eyes were opened, that they might behold wondrous things in the law of the Lord.—Ps. 19: 10.—See also Alexander on the Canon; Cosin's Scholastical History of the Canon; Du Pin's Complete History of the Canon and Writers of the Old and New Testament; *Jer. CANONS, ECCLESIASTICAL, statutes or rules fixed by councils, and possessing the force of ecclesiastical law. From the time of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor, many councils were held, and canons or laws drawn up, for the government of the church; they were collected into three volumes, by Ivo, bishop of Chartres in France, about the fourteenth year of king Henry I., and are called the decrees; they were corrected about thirty-five years afterwards, by Gratian, a Benedictine monk, and are now the most ancient volumes of the ecclesiastical law. They were published in England in the reign of king Stephen.

The next in order of time were the decretals; they were letters of the popes, for the determination of some controversy; and of these there are likewise three volumes. They laid an obligation on the laity as well as the clergy. The first volume of these decretals was compiled by Raimund Barcinus, chaplain to pope Gregory IX., and published about the fourteenth year of king Henry III. It was appointed to be read in all schools, and admitted as law in all the ecclesiastical courts of England. About sixty years afterwards, Simon, a monk of Walden, read these laws in the university of Cambridge, and the next year in that of Oxford. The second volume was collected and methodized by pope Boniface VIII., and published about the twenty-seventh year of king Edward I. The third volume was collected by pope Clement V., and published in the council of Vienna, and likewise in England, in the second year of Edward II.; they took, from that pope, the name of Clementine. These decretals were never received any where but in the pope's dominions. John Andreas, a famous canonist in the fourteenth century, wrote a commentary on these decretals, which he entitled "Novella," from a very beautiful daughter he had, named Novella, whom he bred a scholar. But these foreign canons, even when the papa authority was at the highest in England, were of no force where they were found to contradict the prerogative of the king or the laws of the land.

The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the see of Rome, in England, was founded on the canon law; and this created quarrels between kings, and several archbishops and prelates, who adhered to those papal usurpations; for such foreign canons as were received there, had no force from any papal legate, or provincial authority, but solely from the consent and approbation of the king and people.

Besides the foreign canons, there were several laws and constitutions made there for the government of the church; and all these received their force from the royal assent; and if, at any time, the ecclesiastical courts did, by their sentences, endeavor to enforce obedience to such canons the courts at common law, upon complaint made, would grant prohibitions. These canons were all collected and explained by Lyndwood, dean of the arches, in the reign of Henry VI. But, having been made in the times of papal authority, they were revised, some time after the Reformation, by commissioners appointed for that purpose; among whom was archbishop Cranmer. The work is entitled "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, ex auctoritate Regis Hen. VIII. inchoata, et per Edw. VI. protracta." But the king's death prevented it being confirmed. This book was put into elegant Latin by Dr. Hadden, university orator at Cambridge, with the assistance of Sir John Cheek, who was tutor to king Edward VI.

The authority vested in the church of England, of making canons, was ascertained by a statute of Henry VIII., commonly called the act of the clergy's submission; by which they acknowledged that the convocation had been always assembled by the king's writ; after which follows this enacting clause, viz.:—"That they shall not attempt, allege, or claim, or put in use, any constitutions or canons, without the king's assent." So that, though the power of making canons resided in the clergy, met in convocation, their force was derived from the authority of the king assenting to, and confirming them.

The old canons continued in force till the reign of James I., when, the clergy being lawfully assembled in convocation, that king gave them leave, by his letters patent, to treat, consult, and agree on canons; which they did, and presented them to the king, who gave his royal assent to them, and by other letters patent, did for himself, his heirs, and successors, ratify and confirm the same. These canons were a collection out of the several preceding canons and injunctions; and, being authorized by the king's commission, according to the form of the statute of the 25 Hen. VIII., they were warranted by act of parliament, and became part of the law of the land, and as binding in ecclesiastical matters as any statute whatever in civil. Some of the canons in 1603 are now obsolete, as the seventy fourth, which requires that the beneficed clergy shall wear gowns with standing collars, and square caps.

In the reign of Charles I., several canons were passed by the clergy in convocation. They were approved by the king and privy council, the judges and other eminent persons of the long robe being present; after which, they were subscribed in the house of lords by the bishops, none refusing but the bishop of Gloucester, for which he was suspended ab officio and beneficio by both houses. Notwithstanding which solemn approbation, these canons gave great offence. Some were displeased with the seventh, entitled "a declaration concerning rites and ceremonies." But the greatest clamor was against the sixth, entitled "an oath enjoined for the preventing all innovations in doctrine and government." It was likewise objected to them that they were not made pursuant to the above-mentioned statute of the 25th of Hen. VIII., because they were made in convocation, after the parliament was dissolved. After the restoration, when the bishops were restored by an act of parliament to their jurisdiction, there was a proviso in the act, that it should not confirm the canons made in 1610; and thus the ecclesiastical laws were left as they were before the year 1610.—Hend. Buck.

CANON, a person who possesses a prebend or revenue allotted for the performance of divine service in a cathedral or collegiate church. Canons are of no great antiquity. Paschier observes, that the name was not known before Charlemagne; at least, the first we hear of are in Gregory de Tours, who mentions a college of canons instituted by Baldwin XVI., archbishop of that city, in the time of Clotharius I. The common opinion attributes the institution of this order to Chrodegangus, bishop of Mentz, about the middle of the eighth century.

CANONS, (book of,) ordinances prepared for Scotland by order of Charles I., and designed completely to subvert the constitution of the Scottish church. They declared the power of the king in all matters spiritual to be absolute and unlimited; and they pronounced sentence of excommunication against all who should declare the government of the church, by bishops and archbishops, to be unscriptural and unlawful.—Hend. Buck.

CANONICAL HOURS, are certain stated times of the day consigned more especially by the Romish church to the offices of prayer and devotion; such are matins, lauds, &c. In England, the canonical hours are from eight to twelve in the forenoon; before or after which, marriage cannot be legally performed in any church.—Hend. Buck.

CANONICAL LETTERS, in the ancient church, were testimonials of the orthodox faith which the bishops and clergy sent each other to keep up the Catholic communion, and distinguish orthodox Christians from heretics.—Hend. Buck.

CANONICAL LIFE, the rule of living prescribed by the ancient clergy who lived in community. The canonical life was a kind of medium between the monastic and clerical lives.—Hend. Buck.

CANONICAL OBEDIENCE is that submission which, by the ecclesiastical laws, the inferior clergy are to pay to their bishops, and the religious to their superiors.—Hend. Buck.

CANSTEIN, (CHARLES HILDEBRAND, von,) founder of a famous establishment for printing Bibles, which goes under his name, was born, in 1667, at Lindenburg, in Germany, studied at Frankfort on the Oder, travelled much in Europe, went, in 1688, to Berlin, where he was appointed page of the elector of Brandenburg, and served as a volunteer in the Netherlands. A dangerous sickness obliged him to leave the military service. He went to Halle, where he became familiarly acquainted with Spener. His wish to spread the Bible among the poor led him to form the idea of printing it with stereotype plates. Thus originated the famous institution, called in German, Die Caussteine Bibelanstalt. Canstein published some works, wrote the life of Spener, and died, in 1719, in Halle, leaving to the great orphan asylum his library, and a part of his fortune.—Ency. Amer.

CANTICLES, (THE BOOK OF,) in Hebrew, shir hashirim, the song of songs. The church, as well as the synagogue, received this book generally as canonical. The royal author appears, in the typical spirit of his time, to have designed to render a ceremonial appointment descriptive of a spiritual relation; and this song is accordingly considered, by judicious writers, to be a mystical allegory of that sort which induces a more sublime sense on historical truths, and which, by the description of human events, shadows out divine circumstances. The sacred writers were, by God's condescension, authorized to illustrate his strict and intimate relation to the church by the figure of a marriage; and the emblem must have been strikingly becoming and expressive to the conceptions of the Jews, since they annexed ideas of peculiar mystery to this appointment, and imagined the marriage union to be a counterpart representation of some original pattern in heaven. Hence it was performed among them with very peculiar ceremonies and solemnity, and with every thing that could give dignity and importance to its rites. Solomon, therefore, in celebrating the circumstances of his marriage, was naturally led, by a train of correspondent reflections, to consider that spiritual connexion which it was often employed to symbolize; and the idea must have been the more forcibly suggested to him, as he was at this period preparing to build a temple to God, and thereby to furnish a visible representation of the Hebrew church. The spiritual allegory thus worked up by Solomon to its highest perfection, was very consistent with the prophetic style, which was accustomed to predict evangelical blessings by such parabolic figures; and Solomon was more immediately furnished with a pattern for this representation by the author of the forty-fifth Psalm, who describes, in a compendious allegory, the same future connexion between Christ and his church.

2. But though the work be certainly an allegorical representation, many learned men, in an unrestrained eagerness to explain the song, even in its minutest and most obscure particulars, have too far indulged their imaginations; and, by endeavoring too nicely to reconcile the literal with the spiritual sense, have been led beyond the boundaries which a reverence for the sacred Scriptures should ever prescribe. The ideas which the sacred writers furnish concerning the mystical relation between Christ and his church, though well accommodated to our apprehension by the allusion of a marriage union, are too general to illustrate every particular contained in this poem, which may be supposed to have been intentionally decorated with some ornaments appropriate to the literal construction. When the general analogy is obvious, we are not always to expect minute resemblance, and should not be too curious in seeking for obscure and recondite allusions. Solomon, in the glow of an inspired fancy, and unsuspecting of misconception or deliberate perversion, describes God and his church, with their respective attributes and graces, under colorings familiar and agreeable to mankind, and exhibits their ardent affection under the authorized figures of earthly love. No similitude, indeed, could be chosen so elegant and apposite for the illustration of this intimate and spiritual alliance, as a marriage union, if considered in the chaste simplicity of its first institution, or under the interesting circumstances with which it was established among the Jews.

3. This poem may be considered, as to its form, as a dramatic poem, of the pastoral kind. There is a succession of time, and a change of place, to different parts of the palace and royal gardens. The persons introduced as speakers, are the bridegroom and bride, and their respective attendants. The interchange of dialogue is carried on in a wild and digressive manner; but the speeches are adapted to the persons with appropriate elegance. The companions of the bride compose a kind of chorus, which seems to bear some resemblance to that afterwards adopted in the Grecian tragedy. Solomon and his queen assume the pastoral simplicity of style, which is favorable to the communication of their sentiments. The poem abounds throughout with beauties, and presents everywhere a delightful and romantic display of nature, painted at its most interesting season, and described with every ornament that an inventive fancy could furnish. It is justly entitled the Song of Songs, or most excellent song, as being superior to any that an uninspired writer could have produced, and tending, if properly understood, to purify the mind, and to elevate the affections from earthly to heavenly things.

"Every part of the Canticles," says a modern writer, "abounds in poetical beauties; the objects which present themselves on every side, are the choicest plants, the most beautiful flowers, the most delicious fruits, the bloom and vigor of spring, the sweet verdure of the fields, flourishing and well-watered gardens, pleasant streams and perennial fountains. The other senses are represented as regaled with the most precious odors, natural and artificial; with the sweet singing of birds, and the soft voice of the turtle; with milk and honey, and the choicest of wine. To these enchantments are added all that is beautiful and graceful in the human form, the endearments, the caresses, the delicacy of love. If any object be introduced which seems not to harmonize with this delightful scene, such as the awful prospect of tremendous precipices, or the wildness of the mountains, or the haunts of the lions; its effect is only to heighten, by the contrast, the beauty of the other objects, and to add the charms of variety to those of grace and elegance." (Bossuet's Preface to the Canticles.)

In the following passage, the force and splendor of description is united with all the softness and tenderness of passion:

"Get thee up, my companion,
My lovely one, come away:
For lo! the winter is past,
The rain is over, is gone,
The flowers are seen on the earth:
The season of the song is come,
And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land:
The fig-tree puts forth its green figs,
And the vine's tender grapes yield a fragrance:
Arise, my companion, my fair one, and come."

Ch. 2: 10—13.

The following comparisons abound in sweetness and delicacy:

"How sweet is thy love, O my sister, O spouse,
How much better than wine is thy love,
And the odor of thy perfumes than all spices!
Thy lips, O spouse, distil honey from the comb,
Honey and milk are under thy tongue,
And the seat of thy garments is like the fragrance of Lebanon."

Ch. 4: 10, 11.

There are some others which demand a more accurate investigation.

"Thy hair is like a flock of goats,
That browse upon Mount Gilead."

Ch. 4: 1—5.

The hair of the goat is soft, smooth, of a yellow cast, like that of the bride; see ch. 7: 5, and compare 1 Sam. 19: 13, 16, with 16: 12; her beautiful tresses are compared with the numerous flocks of goats which covered this flourishing mountain from the top to the bottom.

"Thy teeth are like the shorn flock,
Which have come up from the washing place,
All of which have twins,
And none among them is bereaved."

The evenness, whiteness, and unbroken order of the teeth is here admirably expressed:

"Like the twice-dyed thread of crimson are thy lips,
And thy language is sweet."

That is, thin and ruby-colored, such as add peculiar graces to the sweetness of the voice.

"Like the slice of a pomegranate
Are thy cheeks amidst thy tresses."

Partly obscured, as it were, by her hair, and exhibiting a gentle blush of red, from beneath the delicate shade, as the seeds of the pomegranate, the color of which is white tinged with red, surrounded by the rind.

"Thy neck is like the tower of David Built for an army;
A thousand shields are hung up against it,
All bucklers for the mighty."

The neck is described as long, erect, slender, according to the nicest proportion, decorated with gold, gems, and large pearls. It is compared with some turret of the citadel of Zion, more lofty than the rest, remarkable for its elegance, and not less illustrious for its architecture than for the trophies with which it was adorned, being hung round with shields and other implements of war.

"Thy two breasts are like two young kids, Twins of the gazelle, that browse among the lilies?"

delicate and smooth, standing equally prominent from the ivory bosom. The animal with which they are compared is a creature of exquisite beauty, and from that circumstance it derives its name in the Hebrew. Nothing can be imagined more truly elegant and poetical than these passages; nothing more apt or expressive than these comparisons. The discovery of these excellencies, however, only serves to increase our regret for the many beauties which we have lost, the perhaps superior graces, which extreme antiquity seems to have overcast with an impenetrable shade. See Lowth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry, Lect. xxxi.—Watson; Jones.

CAPERNAUM; a city frequently mentioned by the evangelists as having been much the place of the Savior's residence, during the period of his public ministry. It stood on the shore of the sea of Galilee in the borders of Zebulon and Naphthaliim. Matt. 4: 13, 14.

Capernaum is no where mentioned in the Old Testament, under that or any other name like it; and, therefore, it is not improbable that it is one of those towns which were built by the Jews after their return from the Babylonish captivity. It is said to have taken its name from an adjacent spring which was of great repute for its clear and limpid waters, and which, according to Josephus, was by the natives called Capernaum. As this spring was in all probability a particular inducement to the building of the town where it stood, so the town became the usual place to which persons resorted in order to be conveyed from Galilee to any part on the other side of the sea. But that which beyond every other consideration renders this city memorable is, that it was the theatre on which the Son of God manifested his glory, by many stupendous miracles, and where he also delivered some of his most interesting discourses. That divine sermon, for example, which is recorded in the sixth chapter of John's gospel, was delivered in the synagogue of Capernaum. See Vcr. 59. If the reader will only pursue the simple and artless narrative of the evangelist from Mark 1: 31, to ch. 2: 12, he will have abundant materials before him for realizing what interest was then excited in this city, by the preaching and the miracles of the Messiah. The prophet Isaiah had indeed long ago predicted these events, and even pointed out the spot where they should occur; see Isa. 9: 1, 2, a passage which we are expressly told met its accomplishments, in the occurrences at Capernaum, to which we have briefly adverted. See Matt. 4: 12—16. But Capernaum did not improve its privileges! Jesus himself "upbraided the cities in which most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not;" and of this city in particular how awful is the denunciation which he pronounced upon it: "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven [in gospel privileges], shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained to this day; but it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee," Matt. 11: 20—24. It is an obvious reflection from these solemn words, that spiritual privileges cannot be abused with impunity; that those who enjoy the light of divine revelation, will have to render to God a strict account for the use which they have made of it; and that wherever the Lord sends his gospel, and plants the ministry of his word, that place incurs a serious responsibility for which it will be made answerable at a future period. Luke 12: 48, and ch. 16: 31.

Capernaum, which at one time was the metropolis of all Galilee, has long since sunk into insignificance, and has long consisted of no more than six poor fishermen's cottages. See Wells' Geography of the New Testament.—Jones; Bib. Cyclo.

CAPHTOR; the name of an island or country, whence sprang the people called in Scripture CAPHTORIMS. It is remarkable that the same people are also sometimes called Cherethims, or Cherethites, and Philistines. Gen. 10: 14. Deut. 2: 23. Jer. 47: 4, and Amos 9: 7. The authors of the Universal History, following Bochart, are of opinion, that by Caphtor was meant Cappadocia: but Calmet, who has entered largely into this question, in a dissertation prefixed to the first book of Samuel, endeavors to show that the ancient Caphtor was the isle of Crete, and that the Philistines, the Caphtorims, or the Cherethims, who afterwards settled in Palestine, came from thence. Compare Ezek. 25: 16. Zeph. 2: 5. 1 Sam. 30: 14. See Blayney's Jeremiah, 8vo. p. 414.—Jones.

CAPITO, (WOLFGANG FABRIEUS,) one of the reformers, was born in Alsace, 1478, of a family of rank, and after receiving an excellent education applied himself to the study of medicine, law, and divinity, in each of which he took his doctor's degree. At Heidelberg, he became acquainted with Oecolampadius, to whom he became united in the strongest ties of friendship; and their mutual communication was never interrupted but by death. Having completed a liberal circle of studies, Capito became a preacher, first in Spire, and afterwards in Basil, where he continued many years. From thence he was sent for by the elector Palatine, who made him his counsellor, and sent him on several embassies. Charles V. conferred on him the order of knighthood. At Strasburgh, however, whither he had followed Bucser, he astonished the world by avowing and preaching the reformed religion. His fame soon spread, and Margaret queen of Navarre, sister to the French king, sent James Faber and Gerard Rufus privately to hear him; and thus the Protestant doctrine was introduced into France. In 1525, he returned by request to his native country, where he preached the gospel in its purity. He was present at the dispute of 1528 at Berne, and at the diet of Ratishon in 1541 for the settling of religion, and greatly distinguished himself. He died of the plague in the end of 1541.

Capito was a very prudent and eloquent man, a great critic in Hebrew, and master of the whole circle of human knowledge. This, with the endowment of the highest wisdom—the knowledge of God and his truth—furnished him in the most eminent manner for the sacred function; and God blessed him accordingly. He left several valuable works.—Middleton's Biog. Eum.

CAPPADOCIA; a province of Lydia, in Asia, extending from mount Taurus to the Euxine sea. It was bounded on the east by the river Eurates and Armenia Major; on the south by Lycania and Armenia Major; on the west by Galatia; and on the north by Pontus; the river stretching from the thirty-eighth to the forty-first degree of north latitude. The name of the country, according to Pliny, was derived from the river Cappadox. It contained, besides the city of Mazaca, which was its metropolis, and which was afterwards called Caesaria, by Tiberius, in honor of Augustus, the following places of note: Comina, Diocæsaria, Necessaria, Tyana, Bastasia, and Sebastopolis. The principal rivers which fertilize this region are the Melas; the Iris; and the Hylas. The district on the south-east, which environs the Antitaurus, is mountainous and barren: the other parts are fertile, abounding with fruits of every kind; enriched with mines of silver, brass, iron, and alum; and producing alabaster, crystal, jasper, and onyx. The horses which were reared in this country were so excellent, that they were purchased by the surrounding nations, and at length became so famous at Rome, that none but the emperor was permitted to possess them. The natives are thought to have descended from Togarmah, and to be intended by those who traded with the Tyrians in "horses and mules," as mentioned in Ezek. 27: 14.

From the feeble light of ancient history, we find that this country was a province of Lydia, in the reign of Croesus, about 500 years before Christ. It continued a kingdom till about the birth of Christ, when it was conquered by the Romans, annexed to that empire, and its independence forever extinguished.

The religion of the Cappadocians, previous to the introduction of Christianity, seems to have been a mixture of the Persian and Grecian superstitions; which instead of promoting the happiness of the state by favoring useful employments, crowded into one temple, dedicated to Jupiter, no less than three thousand ministers, to loll in luxurious apathy, or to plot in ambitious cabals; and instead of directing men to the practice of virtue, incited them to the most senseless penances; to lacerate their bodies in honor of Bellona, or to offer human sacrifices to Diana, and other idols. And so proverbial did the wickedness of the Cappadocians ultimately become, that the neighboring nations denominated every person distinguished by his depravity a Cappadocian, as a term of reproach. Christianity, however, was early planted here, and Peter wrote his first epistle, amongst others, to the Christian converts in Cappadocia. See Acts 2: 9, and 1 Pet. 1: 1. The gospel long flourished in that country, and the existence of Christian churches is easily traced there till the ninth or tenth century. See Rollin's Ancient History, and Pridaux's Connexion.—Jones.

CAPTIVES. The treatment of persons taken in war among ancient nations, throws great light upon many passages of Scripture. The eastern conqueror often stripped his unhappy captives naked, shaved their heads, and made them travel in that condition, exposed to the burning heat of a vertical sun by day, and the chilling cold of the night. Such barbarous treatment was to modest women the height of cruelty and indignity; especially to those who had been educated in softness and elegance, who had figured in all the superfluities of ornamental dress, and whose faces had hardly ever been exposed to the sight of man. The prophet Isaiah mentions this as the hardest part of the sufferings in which female captives are involved: "The Lord will expose their nakedness." The daughter of Zion had indulged in all the softness of oriental luxury; but the offended Jehovah should cause her unrelenting enemies to drag her forth from her secret chambers into the view of an insolent soldiery; strip her of her ornaments, in which she so greatly delighted; take away her splendid and costly garments, discover her nakedness, and compel her to travel in that miserable plight to a far distant country, a helpless captive, the property of a cruel lord. Arrived in the land of their captivity, captives were often purloined at a very low price. The prophet Joel complains of the contemptuous cheapness in which the people of Israel were held by those who made them captives: "And they have cast lots for my people; and have given a boy for a harlot, and sold a girl for wine, that they might drink." The custom of casting lots for the captives taken in war appears to have prevailed both among the Jews and the Greeks. The same allusion occurs in the prophecy of Chabiah: "Strangers carried away captive his forces, and foreigners entered into his gates, and cast lots upon Jerusalem," Ob. 11. With respect to the Greeks, we have an instance in Tryphiodorus:—

"Shared out by lot the female captives stand,
The spoils divided with an equal hand;
Each to his ship conveys his rightful share,
Price of their tot, and trophies of the war."

2. By an inhuman custom, which is still retained in the East, the eyes of captives taken in war were not seldom put out, sometimes literally scooped or dug out of their sockets. This dreadful calamity Samson had to endure from the unrelenting vengeance of his enemies. In a posterior age, Zedekiah, the last king of Judah and Benjamin, after being compelled to behold the violent death of his sons and nobility, had his eyes put out, and was carried in chains to Babylon. The barbarous custom long survived the decline and fall of the Babylonian empire; for by the testimony of Mr. Maurice, in his history of Hindostan, the captive princes of that country were often treated in this manner by their more fortunate rivals; a red hot iron was passed over their eyes, which effectually deprived them of sight, and at the same time of their title and ability to reign. To the wretched state of such prisoners, the prophet Isaiah alludes in a noble prediction, where he describes in very glowing colors the character and work of the promised Messiah: "He hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised," as captives too frequently were by the weight of their fetters.

3. It seems to have been the practice of eastern kings, to command their captives taken in war, especially those that had, by the atrociousness of their crimes or the stoutness of their resistance, greatly provoked their indignation, to lie down on the ground, and then put to death a certain part of them, which they measured with a line, or determined by lot. This custom was not, perhaps, commonly practised by the people of God, in their wars with the nations around them; but one instance is recorded in the life of David, who inflicted this punishment on the Moabites: "And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive: and so the Moabites became David's servants, and brought gifts," 2 Sam. 8: 2. But the most shocking punishment which the ingenious cruelty of a haughty and unfeeling conqueror ever inflicted on the miserable captive, is described by Virgil in the ninth book of the Æneid; and which even a Roman, inured to blood, could not mention without horror:—

"Quid memorem infandas cedes? quid facta tyranni," &c.
L. i. 485.

"What words can paint those execrable times,
The subjects' sufferings, and the tyrant's crimes!
That blood, those murders, O ye gods! replace
On his own head, and on his impious race:
The living and the dead, at his command
Were coupled face to face, and hand to hand,
Till, choked with stench, in loathed embraces tied,
The lingering wretches pined away, and died!"—Dryden.

It is to this deplorable condition of a captive that the apostle refers, in that pathetic exclamation, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Who shall rescue me, miserable captive as I am, from this continual burden of sin which I carry about with me; and which is cumbersome and odious, as a dead carcase bound to a living body, to be dragged along with it wherever it goes?—Watson.

CAPTIVITY. God generally punished the sins and iniquities of the Jews by different captivities or servitudes. The first captivity is that of Egypt, from which they were delivered by Moses, and which should be considered rather as a permission of providence, than as a punishment for sin. Six captivities are reckoned during the government by judges: the first, under Chusban-rishabaim, king of Mesopotamia, which continued about eight years; the second, under Eglon, king of Moab, from which the Jews were delivered by Ehud; the third, under the Philistines, from which they were rescued by Shamgar; the fourth, under Jabin, king of Hazor, from which they were delivered by Deborah and Barak; the fifth, under the Midianites, from which Gideon freed them; and the sixth, under the Ammonites and Philistines, during the judicatures of Jephthah, Izban, Elon, Abdon, Eli, Samson, and Samuel. But the greatest and most remarkable captivities were those of Israel and Judah, under their regal government.

CAPTIVITIES OF ISRAEL. In the year of the world 3264, Tiglath-pileser took several cities, and carried away captives, principally from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, 2 Kings 15: 29. In the year of the world 3283, Shalmaneser took and destroyed Samaria, after a siege of three years, and transplanted the tribes that had been spared by Tiglath-pileser, to provinces beyond the Euphrates, 2 Kings 18: 10, 11. It is generally believed, there was no return of the ten tribes from this second captivity. But when we examine carefully the writings of the prophets, we find the return of at least a great part of Israel from the captivity clearly pointed out. Hosea says, "They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord," Hos. 11: 11. Amos says, "And I will bring again my people Israel from their captivity: they shall build their ruined cities, and inhabit them," &c., Amos 9: 14. Obadiah observes, "The captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites," &c., Ob. 18, 19. To the same purpose speak the other prophets. "The Lord shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah," Isa. 11: 12, 13. Ezekiel received an order from God to take two pieces of wood, and write on one, "For Judah and for the children of Israel;" and on the other, "For Joseph and for all the house of Israel;" and to join these two pieces of wood, that they might become one, and designate the re-union of Judah and Israel, Ezek. 37: 16. Jeremiah is equally express: "The house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel; and they shall come together out of the north, to the land which I have given for an inheritance to their fathers," Jer. 3: 18. See also Jer. 31: 7—9, 16, 17, 20. 16: 15. 49: 2, &c. Zech. 9: 13. 10: 6, 10. Mic. 2: 12. In the historical books of Scripture, we find that the Israelites of the ten tribes, as well as of Judah and Benjamin, returned from the captivity. Among those that returned with Zerubbabel are reckoned some of Ephraim and Manasseh, who settled at Jerusalem with the tribe of Judah. When Ezra numbered those who returned from the captivity, he only inquired whether they were of the race of Israel; and at the first passover which was then celebrated in the temple, was a sacrifice of twelve he-goats for the whole house of Israel, according to the number of the tribes, Ezra 6: 16, 17. 8: 35. Under the Maccabees, and in our Savior's time, we see Palestine peopled by Israelites of all the tribes indifferently. The Samaritan Chronicle asserts that in the thirty-fifth year of the pontificate of Abdesin, three thousand Israelites, by permission of king Sauradius, returned from captivity, under the conduct of Adus, son of Simon.

CAPTIVITIES OF JUDAH. The captivities of Judah are generally reckoned four: the first, in the year of the world 3398, under king Jehoiakim, when Daniel and others were carried to Babylon; the second, in the year of the world 3401, and in the seventh year of the reign of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar carried three thousand and twenty-three Jews to Babylon; the third, in the year of the world 3406, and in the fourth of Jehoiachin, when this prince, with part of his people, was sent to Babylon; and the fourth, in the year 3416, under Zedekiah, from which period begins the captivity of seventy years, foretold by the prophet Jeremiah. Dr. Hales computes that the first of these captivities, which he thinks formed the commencement of the Babylonish captivity, took place in the year before Christ 605. The Jews were removed to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, who, designing to render that city the capital of the East, transplanted thither very great numbers of people, subdued by him in different countries. In Babylon, the Jews had judges and elders, who governed them, and who decided matters in dispute juridically, according to their laws. Of this we see a proof in the story of Susanna, who was condemned by elders of her own nation. Cyrus, in the year of the world 3457, and in the first year of his reign at Babylon, permitted the Jews to return to their own country, Ezra 1: 1. However, they did not obtain leave to rebuild the temple; and the completion of those prophecies which foretold the termination of their captivity after seventy years, was not till the year of the world 3486. In that year, Darius Hystaspes, by an edict, allowed them to rebuild the temple. In the year of the world 3537, Artaxerxes Longimanus sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem. The Jews assert that only the refuse of their nation returned from the captivity, and that the principal of them continued in and near Babylon, where they had been settled, and where they became very numerous. It may, however, be doubted whether the refuse of Judah was really carried to Babylon. It appears from incidental observations in Scripture that some remained; and Major Rennell has offered several reasons for believing that only certain classes of the Jews were deported to Babylon, as well as into Assyria. Nebuchadnezzar carried away only the principal inhabitants, the warriors, and artisans of every kind; and he left the husbandmen, the laborers, and, in general, the poorer classes, that constitute the great body of the people.—Calmet.

CAPUCHINS; religious of the order of St. Francis. They owe their origin to Matthew de Bassi, a Franciscan of the duchy of Urbino; who, having seen St. Francis represented with a sharp-pointed capuche, or cowl, began to wear the like in 1525, with the permission of pope Clement VII. His example was soon followed by two other religious, named Lewis and Raphael de Fossembrun; and the pope, by a brief, granted these three monks leave to retire to some hermitage, and retain their new habit. The retirement they chose was the hermitage of the Camaldolites near Massacio, where they were very charitably received.

This innovation in the habit of the order gave great offence to the Franciscans, whose provincial persecuted these poor monks, and obliged them to flee from place to place. At last, they took refuge in the palace of the duke de Camerino, by whose credit they were received under the obedience of the Conventuals, in the quality of Hermits Minors, in the year 1527. The next year, the pope approved this union, and confirmed to them the privilege of wearing the square capuche, and admitting among them all who would take the habit. Thus the order of the Capuchins, so called from wearing the capuche, began in the year 1528.

Their first establishment was at Colmenzono, about a league from Camerino, in a convent of the order of St. Jerome, which had been abandoned. But, their numbers increasing, Lewis de Fossembrun built another small convent at Montmelon, in the territory of Camerino. The great number of conversions which the Capuchins made by their preaching, and the assistance they gave the people in a contagious distemper, with which Italy was afflicted the same year, 1528, gained them an universal esteem.

In 1529, Lewis de Fossembrun built for them two other convents; the one at Alvacina, in the territory of Fabriano, the other at Fossembrun, in the duchy of Urbino. Matthew de Bassi, being chosen their vicar-general, drew up constitutions for the government of this order. They enjoined, among other things, that the Capuchins should perform divine service without singing; that they should say but one mass a day in their convents: they directed the hours of mental prayer, morning and evening, the days of disciplining themselves, and those of silence: they forbade the monks to hear the confessions of seculars, and enjoined them always to travel on foot: they recommended poverty in the ornaments of their church, and prohibited in them the use of gold, silver, and silk: the pavilions of the altars were to be of stuff, and the chalices of tin.

This order soon spread itself all over Italy, and into Sicily. In 1573, Charles IX. demanded of pope Gregory XIII. to have the order of Capuchins established in France, which that pope consented to; and their first settlement in that kingdom was in the little town of Picpus, near Paris; which they soon quitted, to settle at Meudon, from whence they were introduced into the capital of the kingdom. In 1606, pope Paul V. gave them leave to accept of an establishment, which was offered them in Spain. They even passed the seas to labor on the conversion of the infidels; and their order is become so considerable that it is at present divided into more than sixty provinces, consisting of near 1,600 convents, and 25,000 monks, besides the missions of Brazil, Congo, Barbary, Greece, Syria, and Egypt.

Among those who have preferred the poverty and humility of the Capuchins to the advantages of birth and fortune, was the famous Alphonso d'Este, duke of Modena and Reggio, who, after the death of his wife Isabella, took the habit of this order at Munich, in the year 1626, under the name of brother John Baptist, and died in the convent of Castelnuovo, in 1644. In France likewise, the duke de Joyeuse, after having distinguished himself as a great general, became a Capuchin, in September, 1587.

Father Paul observes, that "the Capuchins preserve their reputation, by reason of their poverty; and that if they should suffer the least change in their institution, they would acquire no immovable estates by it, but would lose the alms they now receive." He adds: "It seems therefore as if here an absolute period were put to all future acquisitions and improvements in this gainful trade; for whoever should go about to institute a new order, with a power of acquiring estates, such an order would certainly find no credit in the world; and if a profession of poverty were a part of the institution, there could be no acquisitions made whilst that lasted; nor would there be any credit left when that was broke."

There is likewise an order of Capuchin nuns, who follow the rule of St. Clara. Their first establishment was at Naples, in 1538, and their foundress was the venerable mother Maria Laurentia Longa, of a noble family of Catalonia, a lady of the most uncommon piety and devotion. Some Capuchins coming to settle at Naples, she obtained for them, by her credit with the archbishop, the church of St. Euphelia, without the city; soon after which she built a monastery of virgins, under the name of "Our Lady of Jerusalem," into which she retired in 1534, together with nineteen young women, who engaged themselves, by solemn vows, to follow the third rule of St. Francis. The pope gave the government of this monastery to the Capuchins; and, soon after, the nuns quitted the third rule of St. Francis to embrace the more rigorous rule of St. Clara, from the austerity of which they had the name of "Nuns of the Passion," and that of "Capuchines" from the habit they took, which was that of the Capuchins.

After the death of their foundress, another monastery of Capuchins was established at Rome, near the Quirinal palace, and was called "The Monastery of the Holy Sacrament;" and a third, in the same city, built by cardinal Baronius. These foundations were approved, in the year 1600, by pope Clement VIII., and confirmed by Gregory XV. There were afterwards several other establishments of Capuchins; in particular one at Paris, in 1604, founded by the duchess de Mercœur, who put crowns of thorns on the heads of the young women whom she placed in her monastery.—Hend. Buck.

CAPUTIATI; a denomination which appeared in the twelfth century, so called from a singular kind of cap which distinguished their party. They wore upon their caps a leaden image of the virgin Mary, and declared publicly that their purpose was to level all distinctions, to abrogate magistracy, and to remove all subordination among mankind, and to restore that primitive liberty, that natural equality, which were the inestimable privilege of the first mortals.—Hend. Buck.

CARAVAN; the name given to a company of persons, who, in the eastern countries, travel through the deserts in a body, in order to be secure against the attacks of the Arabs and robbers with which they are infested. As it is by means of its caravans that almost the whole trade of Asia is carried on, as well as that of some of the northern parts of Africa, and as there are many allusions in the Old Testament to this mode of travelling, and of conducting their traffic, some acquaintance with the subject will be found very useful in throwing light upon that portion of the Holy Scriptures.

Every caravan is commanded by a chief, or aga, who has under him a sufficient number of janizaries or soldiers, belonging to the states through which they are to pass, for conducting them in safety to the place of their destination. Before a caravan can be formed, it is necessary to obtain a written permission from one sovereign prince, and it must have the sanction of at least two others. This license must specify the number of men and beasts of burden, as well as the quantity of merchandise of which it is composed. The owners of the caravan may choose the officers, and determine the regulations to be observed during its journey. There are commonly four principal officers attached to each caravan; the first is commander in chief; the second commands during the march; the third when it halts; and the fourth, should it happen to be attacked by any of the predatory tribes of Arabs, numbers of which are always lying in wait for that purpose, and who subsist by plunder. There is also a purser or treasurer, having under him a number of clerks and interpreters, whose business it is to keep accurate journals of whatever occurs, from which, signed by the principal officers, those concerned may form a judgment how far their interests have been attended to. As the greater part of the Arabian princes have no other revenue than what arises from plunder, they keep spies for the purpose of informing them of the departure of the caravans, which they often attack with superior force, and frequently succeed in carrying off considerable booty; if they succeed in defeating it, the whole is entirely pillaged, and the escort, whether pilgrims, travellers, or merchants, are carried away and sold for slaves. The gains of the merchants belonging to these caravans are often incredibly great; as an instance of which, we are told of a traveller, who, with goods for which he paid only thirty pounds, by repeated barter and exchanges, in the course of one journey gained six thousand! These immense profits, which are by no means uncommon, induce numerous adventurers to accompany the caravans, notwithstanding the hardships and inconveniences of the journey, which in many instances are extremely severe. Unwholesome food, intolerable water, and often none at all, long and fatiguing marches over burning sands, are circumstances with which they must invariably lay their account, besides being exposed to the thefts and robberies of a crowd of vagrants, who resort to the caravans for the sole purpose of living at the expense of the simple and unwary.

The long and toilsome journeys which these caravans perform through barren deserts and uninhabited wilds, and the hardship and fatigue which travellers sometimes endure, appear to us almost incredible. Provisions and water must be carried several hundred miles. In these parched regions there are few wells, and fewer still of rivers of water, while travellers are every hour exposed to the whirlwinds and the hordes of wandering Arabs. To accomplish such painful journeys, Providence has furnished the inhabitants of these countries with a beast of burden peculiarly fitted for traversing those burning wastes. From the persevering strength of the camel, which the Arabians emphatically called "the ship of the desert," from his moderation in the use of food, and from the singularity of his internal structure, by which he can lay up a supply of water for several days, he is enabled to traverse the most inhospitable climes, under the ponderous load of seven hundred weight; and with a pound of food, and short intervals of rest, he will travel sixteen hours a-day, performing with astonishing despatch a journey impracticable by any other animal. A caravan usually consists of several hundreds of those loaded camels, attended by Arabs, which are hired by the merchants at a low rate for the performance of the journey. See CAMEL.

Perhaps the following extract from the writings of a late traveller, may give the reader a more lively idea of one of those caravans, than many pages of detailed narrative, and preclude the necessity of any further enlarging. "It was midnight," says he, "when we arrived at the kam of Memmen. I perceived at a distance a great number of scattered lights; it was a caravan making a halt. On a near approach, I distinguished camels, some lying, others standing, some with their loads, others relieved from their burdens. Horses and asses without bridles, were eating barley out of leathern buckets; some of the men were still on horseback, and the women, veiled, had not alighted from their dromedaries. Turkish merchants were seated cross-legged on carpets, in groups round the fire, at which the slaves were busily employed in dressing plau. Other travellers were smoking their pipes at the door of the kam, chewing opium, and listening to stories. Here were people roasting coffee in iron pots; there bucksters going about from fire to fire, offering for sale, cakes, fruits, and poultry. Singers were amusing the crowd. Imams were performing their ablutions, prostrating themselves, rising again, and imploring the prophet (Mahomet), while the camel drivers lay snoring on the ground. The place was strewn with packages, bags of cotton, and couffis of rice. All these objects, now distinct, now confused, and enveloped in a half shade, exhibited a genuine scene of the Arabian nights." See M. Chateaubriand's Travels, vol. i. p. 303, 304; Jackson's Morocco, p. 237.—Jones.

CARAVANSERA. See INN.

CARAITES, or KARAITES; an ancient Jewish sect. The name signifies, "Textualists, or Scripturists," and was originally given to the school of Shammai, (about thirty years or more before Christ,) because they rejected "the traditions of the elders;" as embraced by the school of Hillel and the Pharisees, and all the fanciful interpretations of the cabala, which see. They claim, however, a much higher antiquity, and produce a catalogue of doctors up to the time of Ezra.

The rabbinites have been accustomed to call them Sadducees; but they believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures, the resurrection of the dead, and the final judgment. They believe that the Messiah is not yet come, and reject all calculations of the time of his appearance; yet they say, "it is proper that even every day they should receive their salvation by Messiah, the son of David." In the practice of their religion, they differ from the rabbinites in the observance of the festivals, and keep the Sabbath with more strictness. They extend their prohibition of marriage to more degrees of affinity, and admit not of divorce on any slight or trivial grounds.

The sect of Caraites still exists, but their number is "very inconsiderable." They are found chiefly in the Crimea, (where Dr. Edward Clarke visited a settlement of them,) Lithuania, and Persia; at Damascus, Constantinople, and Cairo. Their honesty in the Crimea is said to be proverbial; and Dr. Clarke visited one of their rabbies, whom he pronounces to be "highly esteemed, and exceeding well informed." CARBONARI, (literally, Charcoal-men;) a modern politico-religious sect, lately sprung up in Italy, supposed to originate from the Freemasons, and, like them, meeting in secret societies, and observing certain mystical rites and signs. Like the Freemasons, they pretend to derive their first principles from the Scriptures, and to adopt the morality of the gospel and the symbols of Christianity; the which, however, they apply politically, and, it is said, seditiously. The cross, for instance, rendered sacred by the sufferings of our divine Lord, they represent as the instrument to crucify those whom they designate as enemies and tyrants, against whom they vow eternal hatred; and they profess to reverence our Savior "as the most deplorable, and the most illustrious victim of despotism."

Before the counter-revolution in Naples, the nation had almost all become Carbonari; and the sect spread into Germany, Switzerland, and other countries; but they by no means ought to be considered as a religious denomination. When they grew numerous and powerful, another sect was formed to oppose and counteract them, who were called Calderari, (or Braziers, which see.) CARBUNCLE; a very elegant gem, the color of which is a deep red mingled with scarlet. It is commonly found in a pure and faultless state; and is of the same degree of hardness as the sapphire, which is second only to the diamond. It is naturally of an angular figure, and is found adhering by its base to a very heavy and ferruginous stone of the emery kind. Its common size is near a quarter of an inch in length, and two thirds of that in diameter. In its thickest parts, when held up against the sun, it loses its deep tinge, and in color resembles a burning charcoal, on which account the ancients gave it the name of anthrax. The fire produces no mutation in its color. Hitherto it has been found only in the East Indies, and there but rarely. (Hill's History of Fossils.)

The carbuncle was the third stone in the first row of precious stones composing the high-priest's breast-plate. Ex. 28: 17. See BREAST-PLATE.—Jones.

CARCHEMISH; and name of a town situated on the banks of the Euphrates, and belonging to the Assyrians, from whom it was taken by Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, 2 Chron. 35: 20. The Egyptians left a garrison in it, and in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, retook it and cut the garrison in pieces. The prodigious slaughter of the Egyptians which took place on this occasion, was foretold by the prophet Jeremiah in a very animated style, and with great poetic energy and liveliness of coloring. Jer. 46: 1—12. In the third and fourth verses of that chapter, the mighty preparations of the Egyptians for the contest are described, and the prophet, who foresees the defeat, is led to express his astonishment at an event so contrary to what might have been expected. But he accounts for it, (ver. 10,) by resolving the whole into the Divine disposal, Jehovah having decreed that neither swiftness nor strength should avail, or protect from the impending overthrow. In ver. 7, 8, 9, the king of Egypt is represented as coming up to the assistance of his garrison, animated with all the ostentation and insolence of anticipated success. He is compared to a mighty river such as the Nile, or the Euphrates, when they overflow their banks, and threaten to overwhelm the country with desolation and ruin. The prophet seems to hear him calling aloud to the nations of which his army is composed, giving them the signal for action, and rousing them to deeds of desperate valor; but all in vain, since the time is come for God to avenge himself of his ancient foes, who are doomed to slaughter, and fall a bloody sacrifice on the plains of the north. The whole concludes with an apostrophe to the daughter of Egypt, whose wound is pronounced incurable, and her disgrace universally known; forasmuch as the number of her warriors have only served to augment the scene of confusion, and more effectually to destroy each other, ver. 11, 12. See 2 Kings 23: 29.—Jones.

CARDINAL; an eminent dignitary in the Roman church. Among the Latins, the word cardinalis signifies principal, and in this sense were venti cardinales, four cardinal or chief winds; principes cardinales, a sovereign prince; missa cardinalis, and altare cardinale, for the great mass or great altar of a church. It was also a name that was given to certain officers of the emperor Theodosius, as to generals of armies: to the prefects in Asia and Africa, because they possessed the chief offices in the empire.—Hend. Buck.

CARDINAL, (ORIGIN OF THE OFFICE.) There were two sorts of churches in towns; one sort was as the parish churches of these times, and were called titles; the others were hospitals for the poor, and were called deaneries: the first were served by priests, and the other governed by deans; the other chapels in the towns were called oratories, where mass was celebrated without administering the sacraments. The chaplains of these oratories were called local priests, that is, priests that belonged to some particular place. And to put a greater distinction between these churches, the parish churches were called cardinales, or cardinal titles, and the priests that officiated in them, and administered the sacraments, were called cardinals. This was chiefly used at Rome, where the cardinals attended the pope whilst he celebrated mass, and in the processions, and therefore Leon IV. calls them preshyteros sui cardinis. In the council held at Rome in 853, the deacons who looked after the deaneries, had also the title of cardinals, either because they were the chiefest deacons, or because they assisted with the cardinals, i. e. priests at the pope's mass. The greatest function of the Roman cardinals was to go to the pope's council, and to the synods, and to give their opinions concerning ecclesiastical affairs. It was one of them that was generally chosen pope; for it was rare that any bishop was chosen in those days;—it being recorded in the ecclesiastical history, that pope Stephen VII., chosen in 896, caused his predecessor Formosus to be dug up again, and annulled all his ordinances, alleging that he was made pope against the disposition of the holy decrees in the time that he was bishop of Ostia.

Finally, these cardinals have engrossed to themselves the power of choosing a pope, since the council celebrated at Rome, in 1059, under Nicholas II. In process of time, the name of cardinal, which was common to all titular priests or curates, was appropriated to those of Rome, and afterwards to seven bishops of the neighborhood of Rome. All these cardinals were divided under five patriarchal churches, as St. John of Lateran, St. Mary Major, St. Peter of the Vatican, St. Paul's, and St. Lawrence's. In following times, the pope gave the title of cardinal to other bishops, besides those here mentioned; and it is said the first that had this honor conferred upon him was Conradus, archbishop of Mayence, who received it from pope Alexander III., who also conferred the same honor on Gardin of Sala, archbishop of Milan, in 1165, and since that some bishops were created cardinal priests of Rome, with one of the titles thereof; so William, archbishop of Rheims, was made cardinal, with the title of St. Sabine, by pope Clement III., or, according to others, by Alexander III. And finally, Clement V. and his successors gave the title of cardinal priests to many other bishops, which custom has been followed since. As for the deacon cardinals, it must be observed, that in the beginning there were seven in the church of Rome, and in the other churches, this number was augmented, at Rome, to fourteen, and at last they created eighteen, who were called cardinal deacons, or principal, to distinguish them from others that had not the care of deaneries. Afterwards were counted twenty-four deaneries in the city of Rome; and now there are fourteen affected to the deacon cardinals. The priest cardinals are to the number of fifty, which, with the six cardinal bishops of Ostia, Porro, Sabina, Palestrina, Frascati, and Albano, who have no other titles but those of their bishoprics, make generally the number of seventy. Innocent IV. gave the cardinals the red cap in the council of Lyons, held in 1243; Paul II. the red gown in 1464. Gregory XIV. bestowed the red cap upon the regular cardinals, who wore but a hat before. Urban VIII. gave them the title of eminence, for they had before but that of most illustrious. When the pope has a mind to create any cardinals, he writes their names that he designs for this dignity, and gets them read in the consistory, after he has told the cardinals, Frates habetis, that is, "You have for brothers," &c. The cardinal patron sends for those that are at Rome, and conducts them to his holiness to receive their red caps from him; until then they are incognito, and cannot come to the meeting; and as for those that are absent, the pope despatches one of his chambermen of honor to carry them their cap; but they are obliged to receive the hat at his own hands. When they come to Rome, they are received in cavalcade. The cardinal's dress is a satane, a rochet, a mantelet, or short purple mantle over their rochet; the mozette, and a papal cape over the rochet in public and solemn actions. The color of their garment differs according to the times: either it is red, or of the color of dried roses or violets. The regular cardinals wear no silk, nor any other color but that of their order, but the red hat and cap are common to them all. When cardinals are sent to princes' courts, it is in quality of legates a latere; and when they are sent to any town, their government is called legation. There are five legations, viz. that of Avignon, of Ferrara, of Bologna, of Ravenna, and of Perouse. Here follows Fr. Maimbourg's curious remarks upon this subject:—When the cathedral church was vacant, the pope sent one of the neighboring bishops to govern it, until another bishop was chosen, who took possession of it as of his proper church, and received its title, which the administering bishop, or he that took care of it during the vacancy, had not. This was what they called a cardinal bishop in those times, from the word cardo, which signifies a hinge, showing by that, that the titular bishop was tied to his church to exercise continually of his proper authority all the functions of his bishopric. This is what the word cardinal signifies in its natural and true interpretation, as can be clearly seen in many letters of St. Gregory the Great; for this pope understanding that the church of Aleria, in the isle of Corsica, was vacant, he wrote to a bishop of Corsica, called Leo, to go to govern it, and afterwards established Martin there to be the cardinal bishop thereof; so here is a succession of two bishops, whereof the one was but visiter or administrator, and the other titular. The same Gregory satisfied the clergy and nobility of Naples, that he approved their desire of having Paul bishop of Neri, and their visiter made their cardinal bishop; whence it is easy to see, that in this pope's time, and before him, all titular bishops, who by their ordination were tied to their church, were called cardinal bishops. The same may be said of the priests and deacons, to whom their priests had given some benefice or charge that tied them to any church in their diocese; and also the archdeacons, and the other dignities, were cardinals of the churches they governed. The other priests and deacons that had no such tie were not called cardinals. And it was for this reason that those the popes sent into provinces, and the nuncios he sent to Constantinople, were indeed deacons of the Roman church, but not cardinals. By this same reason, all the curates, tied by their titles to the parishes wherein they administered the sacraments, were called cardinal priests. He was also called a cardinal priest who officiated in chief in any great man's chapel or oratory; so that there were deacon, priest, and bishop cardinals in all the dioceses of the world. And as for the church of Rome, there was no other cardinal bishop in pope Gregory's time but he himself, who in quality of proper bishop of the particular church of Rome, was tied there as to his title. The priest cardinals were all the curates of Rome, and all the other priests that served in any other chapel or oratory. The deacons and cardinal archdeacons were such as had a title where to exercise their functions. This is what the cardinals of the church of Rome were in St. Gregory's time, and near four hundred years after him. But in the eleventh age, the popes, whose grandeur was much increased, taking crowns, which was begun the first time by pope Dalmatius II., in 1045; they began also to settle a court, and a regular council of cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons, different from those that had this title before. The cardinal bishops were they that were suffragans of the pope as metropolitan. The priest and cardinal deacons were chosen by the pope at pleasure, in all the provinces of Christendom, whether bishops, priests, abbots, princes, commanders, monks, or other religious, to whom he gave the title of churches, without obliging them to officiate in them. And so as the name of pope, which in the five or six first ages was common to all bishops, was afterwards appropriated to the Roman pontiff. So likewise the name of cardinal, which had been common to all titular bishops, priests, and deacons, in regard of the churches they were linked to, as St. Gregory speaks, does now belong only to the cardinals of the church of Rome, who are in the highest rank of that church. Nevertheless it is observed, that ever since the establishment of this college of cardinals, the bishops, maintaining their pre-eminence, have had the first place in assemblies and public meetings in the pope's own presence. This is seen in the act of the dedication of the church of Marmoutier, by pope Urban II., in 1090, when he came to France to keep the famous council of Clermont; for in that ceremony, Huges, archbishop of Lyons, was next the pope, and after him followed the other archbishops and bishops, followed by the priests and deacons that were cardinals, and of the pope's retinue. In 769, the council of Rome, held under pope Stephen IV., decreed, that none should be chosen pope but a priest or deacon cardinal. In 1130, the cardinals began to be masters of the pope's election under Innocent II., and made themselves the sole choosers, to the exclusion of the rest of the clergy of Rome, under Alexander III., in 1160. So rising more and more, it is at last come to this, that though they be but priests and deacons, yet the dignity of cardinal alone places them above bishops.—Hent. Buck.

CARE; thought, and concern about a thing. God's providence towards his creatures, especially his people, is called his care for them. He considers their ease, preserves their existence and powers, governs their acts, and promotes their welfare. Matt. 6: 26, 30. 1 Cor. 9: 9. 1 Pet. 5: 7. Men's care is either, (1.) lawful, consisting in a serious thought and earnest endeavor to please God, embracing his Son, obeying his law, turning from sin; and to promote our neighbor's temporal or spiritual advantage; and in a moderate endeavor to gain a competent portion of the good things of this life. 2 Cor. 7: 11, 12. Phil. 2: 20. 1 Pet. 5: 7. (2.) Sinful in endeavoring to fulfil sinful lusts or pleasures; and in immoderate concern and endeavor to obtain carnal advantages: such care is forbidden, Matt. 6: 34. Phil. 4: 6. The cares of this world, that choke the word of God, and render it unfruitful, are immoderate and anxious concern for earthly enjoyments, which prevents the word from having a proper effect on our hearts. Matt. 13: 22. To eat bread with care or carefulness, is to do it under pinching straits, and under apprehension of terrible judgments. Ezek. 4: 16, and 12: 18, 19. We are not careful to answer thee in this matter; we need give no answer in words, being ready to manifest our fixed resolution, by the endurance of suffering. Dan. 3: 16.—Brown.

CAREY, (FELIX,) son of Dr. William Carey the missionary, was born in 1786; assisted his father in his pious labors in Bengal; and died at Serampore, in 1822. Among his works were, a Grammar and Dictionary of the Burman Language, unfortunately lost at sea in 1812; a Pali Grammar; and other philological productions.—Davenport.

CARLETON, (GEORGE, D. D.) bishop of Chichester, was born at Norham, Northumberland, 1659, his father being then governor of that important castle. He was prepared for the university under the care of Bernard Gilpin, styled "the Northern Apostle." He graduated the first of his class, at Edmund hall, Oxford, 1680. While he remained at college, which he did for thirty-seven years after, he had the reputation of a great orator and poet, and subsequently, of a skilful theological disputant. In 1617, he was made bishop of Landaff. In 1618, he was sent by James I. with three other English divines, (Drs. Hall, Davenant, and Ward,) to the synod of Dort, where it seems he stood up for episcopacy. He received no answer in public; but several of the reformed ministers, he says, in private assured him they approved it, but that their state, being republican, could not admit of episcopacy. On his return, the States sent a letter to King James highly commending him and the rest of the divines for their virtue, learning, piety, and love of peace. He was advanced to the see of Chichester in 1619, of which he continued bishop until his death, in 1628. He was a man of solid judgment and various reading, particularly in the fathers and schoolmen; a strenuous opponent of Rome, and a steady, consistent Calvinist. Camden was his friend and admirer. He left many works.—Middleton.

CARMEL, in the southern part of Palestine, where Nabal the Carmelite, Abigail's husband, dwelt, Joshua 15: 55; 1 Sam. 25.—Watson.

CARMEL was also the name of a celebrated mountain in Palestine. Though spoken of in general as a single mountain, it ought rather to be considered as a mountainous region, the whole of which was known by the name of Carmel, while to one of the hills, more elevated than the rest, that name was usually applied by way of eminence. It had the plain of Sharon on the south; overlooked the port of Ptolemais on the north; and was bounded on the west by the Mediterranean sea; forming one of the most remarkable promontories that present themselves on the shores of that great sea. According to Volney, it is about two thousand feet in height, and has the shape of a flattened cone. Its sides are steep and rugged; the soil neither deep nor rich; and among the naked rocks stunted with plants, and wild forests which it presents to the eye, there are at present but few traces of that fertility which we are accustomed to associate with the idea of mount Carmel. Yet even Volney himself acknowledges that he found among the brambles, wild vines and olive trees, which proved that the hand of industry had once been employed on a not ungrateful soil. Of its ancient productiveness there can be no doubt; the etymology and ordinary application of its name being sufficient evidence of the fact. Carmel is not only expressly mentioned in Scripture as excelling other districts in that respect; but, every place possessed of the same kind of excellence obtained from it the same appellation in the language both of the prophets and the people. Mount Carmel is celebrated in the Old Testament, as the usual place of residence of the prophets Elijah and Elisha. It was here that Elijah so successfully opposed the false prophets of Baal, (1 Kings 18.) and there is a certain part of the mountain facing the west, and about eight miles from the point of the promontory, which the Arabs call Mansur, and the Europeans the place of sacrifice, in commemoration of that miraculous event. Near the same place is still shown a cave, in which it is said the prophet had his residence. The brook Kishon, which issues from mount Tabor, waters the bottom of Carmel, and falls into the sea towards the northern side of the mountain, and not the southern, as some writers have erroneously stated. Its greatest elevation is about one thousand five hundred feet; hence, when the sea-coast on one side, and the plain on the other, are oppressed with sultry heat, this hill is refreshed by cooling breezes, and enjoys a delightful temperature. The fastnesses of this rugged mountain are so difficult of access, that the prophet Amos classed them with the deeps of hell, the height of heaven, and the bottom of the sea: "Though they dig into hell," (or the dark and silent chambers of the grave,) "thence shall mine hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down; and though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them," Amos 9: 2, 3. Lebanon raises to heaven a summit of naked and barren rocks, covered for the greater part of the year with snow; but the top of Carmel, how naked and sterile soever its present condition, was clothed with verdure which seldom was known to fade. Even the lofty genius of Isaiah, stimulated and guided by the Spirit of inspiration, could not find a more appropriate figure to express the flourishing state of the Redeemer's kingdom, than "the excellency of Carmel and Sharon."—Watson.

CARMELETES, or WHITE FRIARS; religious of the order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. They pretend to derive their original from the prophets Elijah and Elisha; and this occasioned a very warm controversy between this order and the Jesuits, about the end of the seventeenth century, both parties publishing several works, and petitioning the popes Innocent XI. and Innocent XII.; the latter of whom silenced them both, by a brief of the 20th of November, 1698.

What we know of their original is, that, in the twelfth century, Almeric, legate of the holy see in the East, and patriarch of Antioch, collected together several hermits in Syria, who were exposed to the violence and incursions of the barbarians, and placed them on mount Carmel, formerly the residence of the prophets Elijah and Elisha; from which mountain they took the name of Carmelites. Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, gave them rules in 1205, which pope Honorius III. confirmed in 1244.

The peace concluded by the emperor Frederic II. with the Saracens, in the year 1229, so disadvantageous to Christendom, and so beneficial to the infidels, occasioned the Carmelites to quit the Holy Land, under Alan, the fifth general of the order. He first sent some of the religious to Cyprus, who landed there in the year 1238, and founded a monastery in the forest of Fortania. Some Sicilians, at the same time, leaving mount Carmel, returned to their own country, where they founded a monastery in the suburbs of Messina. Some English departed out of Syria, in the year 1440, to found others in England. Others of Provence, in the year 1244, founded a monastery in the desert of Aigualates, a league from Marseilles; and thus, the number of their monasteries increasing, they held their first European general chapter in the year 1245, at their monastery of Aylesford, in England.

After the establishment of the Carmelites in Europe, their rule was in some respects altered; the first time, by pope Innocent IV., who added to the first article a precept of chastity, and relaxed the eleventh, which enjoins abstinence at all times from flesh, permitting them, when they travelled, to eat boiled flesh. This pope likewise gave them leave to eat in a common refectory, and to keep asses or mules for their use. Their rule was again mitigated by the popes Eugenius IV. and Pius II. Hence the order is divided into two branches, viz. the Carmelites of the ancient observance, called the moderate or mitigated, and those of the strict observance, who are the barefooted Carmelites; a reform set on foot, in 1540, by St. Theresa, a nun of the convent of Avila, in Castile: these last are divided into two congregations, that of Spain, and that of Italy.

The habit of the Carmelites was at first white, and the cloak laced at the bottom with several lists; but pope Honorius IV. commanded them to change it for that of the minims. Their scapulary is a small woollen habit, of a brown color, thrown over their shoulders. They wear no linen shirts, but instead of them linsey-woolsey.—Hend. Buck.

CARNAL; fleshly, sensual, sinful. Worldly enjoyments are carnal, because they only minister to the wants and desires of the animal part of man, Rom. 15: 27. 1 Cor. 9: 11. The ceremonial parts of the Mosaic dispensation were carnal; they related immediately to the bodies of men and beasts, Heb. 7: 16; 9: 10. The weapons of a Christian's warfare are not carnal; they are not of human origin, nor are they directed by human wisdom, 2 Cor. 10: 4.—Wicked or unconverted men are represented as under the domination of a "carnal mind, which is enmity against God," and which must issue in death, Rom. 8: 6, 7. See AFFECTIONS.

CARNIVAL; a Roman festival. By pope Gregory the Great about 600, Ash Wednesday was made the beginning of the forty days fast, another day before was called fast-eve, because in the night of this day, at twelve o'clock the fast began. This fast was preceded by a feast of three days, called the carnival. This is the origin of the present carnival or Fasching, as it is called in the south of Germany, and which continues, in that country, from twelfth day to Ash Wednesday. The name carnival is derived from the Latin words carne and vale (according to Ducauge, from the Latin denomination of the feast in the middle ages, carne levamen.) because at that time people took leave of flesh. Previously to the commencement of their long abstinence, men devoted themselves to enjoyment, particularly during the three last days of the carnival. The carnival is nothing but the Saturnalia of the Christian Romans, who could not forget their pagan festivals. At least, it greatly resembles the Saturnalia, which were celebrated, annually, in December, with all kinds of mirth, pleasure, and freedom, in honor of Saturn, and the golden age when he governed the world, and to preserve the remembrance of the liberty and equality of men in the youth of the world. In Rome, the carnival brought to view, in a lively manner, the old Saturnalia in a new form. During the last days of the carnival, and particularly during the day which preceded the long fast, mummeries, plays, tricks, and freedom of every kind abounded. From Italy, the modern Saturnalia passed to the other Christian countries of Europe.

The carnival is celebrated, in modern times, with the greatest show and spirit at Venice and Rome. In the former place, it begins after Christmas. The diversions of it are shows, masquerades, the amusements of the place of St. Mark, and sometimes, in case of the visits of great princes, a regatta, or boat race. After this, there was a second carnival at Venice, the Venitian mass, called also the festival of the Ascension, and the Breucrant festival, because it commonly began on Ascension day, and because the celebration of the marriage of the doge with the Adriatic sea was connected with it. It continued fourteen days. No character-masks were worn there, except Venitian dominos. The carnival at Rome (see Goethe's excellent description, Das Römisch Carneval, and that of lady Morgan) continues but eight days, and is occupied mostly in masquerades and races. Since the return of peace, the carnival has been celebrated again in Cologne, on the Rhine, under the direction of the committee of fools, to the great satisfaction of all who were present. In Spain, the carnival is called carnevolendas.—Ency. Amer.

CAROLOSTADIANS, so called from Carlostadt, a colleague of Luther; but he denied the real presence in the eucharist, as taught by Luther, and raised a tumult at Wittemberg in his absence; on which account he was obliged to retire to Switzerland. Mosheim says he was a man of a warm enthusiastic temper, declaimed wildly against human learning, and countenanced some of the extravagancies of the German Anabaptists.—(See Mosheim's E. H. vol. iv. pp. 314—316.)—Williams.

CARPOCRATIANS, a denomination which arose to wards the middle of the second century; so called from Carpoocrates, whose philosophical tenets agreed in general with those of the Egyptian Gnostics. He acknowledged the existence of a supreme God, and of the aioms derived from him by successive generations. He maintained the eternity of matter, and the creation of the world from thence by angelic powers, as also the divine origin of souls unhappily imprisoned in mortal bodies, &c. He asserted that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary, according to the ordinary course of nature, and was distinguished from the rest of mankind by nothing but his superior fortitude and greatness of soul. In short, his sentiments appear to have corresponded with those of the modern Humanitarians, with whom they seem also to have agreed in the doctrine of philosophical necessity, which, probably, gave rise to their being charged with maintaining the innocence of vice, as arising from passions implanted in our nature by the Creator.

Irenæus charges them with reducing all the essentials of religion to two points, "faith and love," or charity: but do not the Scriptures assert the same? or what point of Christian morals is not herein included? They are also charged with licentiousness at their love-feasts, "putting out the candles," &c.; but this story has been too often repeated and refuted, to be now believed. Considering the ignorance of the times, there is more plausibility in the charge of their being superstitious and inclined to magic; but of this there is little proof. They are, however, certainly chargeable with erroneous doctrine, which probably led to some inconsistencies of practice, though by no means to the extent that their enemies pretended.—(See Turner's Hist. V. pp. 38—40. Lardner's Heretics, pp. 124—140.)—Williams.

CARROLL, (JOHN, D. D.) first Catholic bishop of the United States, was born in Maryland, in the year 1734. He was sent at the age of thirteen to the college of St. Omer's in Flanders, where he remained for six years, when he was transferred to the colleges of Liege and Bruges. In 1769, he was ordained a priest, and soon after became a Jesuit. He returned to America in 1775, and when the Roman Catholic clergy in the United States requested from the pope the establishment of a hierarchy, Mr. Carroll was appointed vicar-general, and fixed his residence at Baltimore. In 1789, he was named bishop, and in the ensuing year was consecrated in England. In the same year he returned to his native country, and from the seat of his episcopal see, assumed the title of bishop of Baltimore. A few years before his death he was raised to the dignity of archbishop. He was a man of the most amiable manners, and of deep evangelical piety, the American Fenelon. He died in 1815, much esteemed and regretted.—Davenport.

CARSON, (ALEXANDER,) a distinguished minister of Edinburgh, Scotland. His early life and ministry were among the Presbyterians of Ireland; but in 1802—3, at the sacrifice of his situation he embraced the views of the Independents in relation to church government, and published a powerful and eloquent defence of those views under the title of "Reasons for separating from the Ulster Synod." His disinterested love of truth led him to further inquiries respecting the New Testament model of the Christian church, the result of which was his union with the Baptists. The writings of Rev. Mr. Ewing and Dr. Wardlaw on Infant Baptism, brought him once more before the public in a work of singular ability, Baptism in its mode and subjects considered; a recent work which has gained a high reputation.

CARSTARES, (WILLIAM,) a native of Scotland, eminent as a divine and a politician, was born, in 1649, at Cathcart, near Glasgow, and completed his studies at the universities of London and Utrecht. While in Holland, he was introduced to the prince of Orange, who honored him with his confidence. After his return to England, he became connected with the party which strove to exclude James from the throne, and, on suspicion of being one of the Rye-house conspirators, he was put to the torture, which he bore with unshrinking firmness. On his liberation, he went back to Holland, and became one of the prince of Orange's chaplains. He accompanied William to England in 1688; was appointed king's chaplain for Scotland; and, till the death of the monarch, was consulted with on all Scotch affairs. Queen Anne made him principal of the university of Edinburgh. In favor of the union, and of the establishment of the house of Hanover, he took an active part. He died in 1715. Carstares was an honest, enlightened, and patriotic man, and of such benevolent feelings, that he delighted in succoring even those who professed principles diametrically opposite to his own. Nor was his charity the child of ostentation; for much of the good which he did was done by stealth.—Davenport.

CARTER, (ROBERT,) once a member of the Virginia executive council, and hence commonly called counsellor Carter, memorable for his philanthropy. He was one of the richest men in Virginia, having, as some say, seven or eight hundred negroes, besides immense bodies of land. He professed to experience the power of renewing grace about the year 1778, and joined the Baptist church under the eloquent Lewis Linnford. Some years after being baptized, he became conscientious about the lawfulness of hereditary slavery. In a letter written at this time to the Rev. Dr. Rippon of London, he says, "the toleration of slavery indicates very great depravity of mind." In conformity to this sentiment, he gradually emancipated the whole that he possessed. This was a sacrifice on the altar of humanity of probably more than a hundred thousand dollars; and so noble and disinterested an act, flowing from religious principle, is worthy to embalm his memory in the remembrance of mankind. Some years afterwards, he embraced the opinions of baron Swedenborg; and to propagate that novel and fanciful system, the good man moved to Baltimore, where some years ago he died. He expended large sums of money in the republication of Swedenborg's writings in this country.—Benedict's Hist. Bap.

CARTER, (MRS. ELIZABETH;) a lady of profound learning and sincere piety, was the eldest daughter of the Rev. Dr. Nicholas Carter, a clergyman in Kent, and born at Deal, December 10th, 1717. In early life, her faculties appeared dull, and her progress in knowledge very slow; but she afterwards became mistress of Latin, Greek, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Hebrew, and attained a partial knowledge of Arabic. At the age of seventeen, her poetical attempts appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine, and they were so eminently excellent, that the learned flocked around her with admiration; and at the age of twenty, the proprietor of that magazine published some of her poems in a quarto pamphlet. In 1741, she formed an intimacy with Miss Catharine Talbot, niece of the lord chancellor Talbot, who, distinguished for her piety and genius, greatly improved Mrs. Carter. To the celebrated Secker she also introduced her; and owing to that acquaintance may probably be traced her distinguished and justly estimated "Translation of Epictetus." In 1754, Mrs. Carter renewed a long existing intimacy with Mrs. Montague, and at her house frequently met with persons of elevated rank, unrivalled talents, and genuine piety. In 1756 Sir George Lyttleton visited her at Deal; and from that time an acquaintance commenced, which only terminated with life. She also became intimate with William Pulteney, earl of Bath, who was delighted by her society, and regarded her intellectual powers and attainments with admiration. In 1763, she accompanied lord Bath, Dr. Douglas, and others, to Spa, and made a short tour to Germany, and Holland. In 1768, she was greatly distressed by the loss of her friend and patron, the excellent Secker; and, in 1774, by that of her aged, but beloved father. Mrs. Carter was visited by the royal family, caressed by the great, and beloved by the good. Her learning was great, but her piety was more distinguished. As an authoress, she commands respect; but as a Christian, veneration and love. To the service of God she devoted her youth, her maturer years, and her old age. Her conscience was very scrupulous; her morality properly rigid; and her life unblemished. Her studies were various, but she never forgot her Bible. With that book she was intimately acquainted, and spent much time in daily devotions. A life spent in the service of God could not but end in peace and happiness; and those who wish to find an antidote to the cold, formal, and speculative professors of the present day, would do well to read the life, and study the character of the celebrated Mrs. Carter. She lived for many years, blessing her friends by her intercourse and her prayers; blessing society by her example; and blessing posterity by her writings. She expired on February the 19th, 1806, in the eighty-eighth year of her age, and was interred in the burial ground of Grosvenor chapel.

CARTESIANS; a philosophical sect, the followers of Renes des Cartes, a celebrated French philosopher of the seventeenth century, whose ingenious, but visionary opinions, excited considerable attention throughout Europe. He admitted two kinds of being,—body and mind; the latter of which, in man, exercised its authority over the body by means of the pineal gland of the brain. To other animals he denied, not only mind and reason, but even thought and sensation, and considered them as mere automata. He is supposed to have adopted "the notion of innate ideas, and of the action of the soul upon the body, from Plato; the doctrine of a plenum, from Aristotle; and the elements of the doctrine of vortices, from the atomic school of Democritus and Epicurus." Whatever opinions he adopted, he refined, so far indeed as often to render him obscure and inconsistent. His theories, however, much and generally as they were admired in the schools, have long since vanished; and his speculative mode of philosophizing has happily given place to the more sober methods of Bacon, Locke, and Newton. See DESCARTES. (Enfield's Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 510.)—Williams.

CARTHAGE; a celebrated city on the coast of Africa; a colony from Tyre. Ezekiel says, the Carthaginians traded to Tyre; but the Hebrew reads Tarshish, which rather signifies Tarsus, in Cilicia, or Tartessus, in Spain, formerly famous for trade. See TARSUS.—Calmet.

CARTHUSIANS; a religious order, founded in the year 1080, by one Bruno, a very learned man, of the bishopric of Cologne, and professor of philosophy at Paris. The occasion of its institution is related as follows:—A friend of Bruno's, who had been looked upon as a good liver, being dead, Bruno attended his funeral. Whilst the service was performing in the church, the dead man, who lay upon a bier, raised himself up and said, "By the just judgment of God, I am accused." The company being astonished at this unusual accident, the burial was deferred to the next day, when the concourse of people being much greater, the dead man again raised himself up, and said, "By the just judgment of God, I am damned." This miracle, it is pretended, wrought such an effect on Bruno, and six more, that they immediately retired to the desert of Chartreux, in the diocese of Greoble, in Dauphiné, where Hugh, bishop of that diocese, assigned them a spot of ground, and where Bruno built his first monastery, under the following rigid institutes:—

His monks were to wear a hair-cloth next their body, a white cassoock, and over it a black cloak: they were never to eat flesh; to fast every Friday on bread and water; to eat alone in their chambers, except upon certain festivals; and to observe an almost perpetual silence: none were allowed to go out of the monastery, except the prior and procurator, and they only about the business of the house.

The Carthusians, so called from the place of their first institution, are a very rigid order. They are not to go out of their cells, except to church, without leave of their superior. They are not to speak to any person, even their own brother, without leave. They may not keep any part of their portion of meat or drink till the next day, except herbs or fruit. Their bed is of straw, covered with a felt or coarse cloth; their clothing, two hair-cloths, two cowls, two pair of hose, a cloak, &c., all coarse. Every monk has two needles, some thread, scissors, a comb, a razor, a hone, an ink-horn, pens, chalk, two pumice-stones; likewise two pots, two porringers, a basin, two spoons, a knife, a drinking-cup, a water-pot, a salt, a dish, a towel; and, for fire, tinder, flint, wood, and an axe.

In the refectory, they are to keep their eyes on the meat, their hands on the table, their attention on the reader, and their heart fixed on God. When allowed to discourse, they are to do it modestly, not to whisper, nor talk loud, nor to be contentious. They confess to the prior every Saturday. Women are not allowed to come into their churches, that the monks may not see any thing which may provoke them to lewdness.

It is computed there are an hundred and seventy-two houses of Carthusians, whereof five are of nuns, who practise the same austerities as the monks. They are divided into sixteen provinces, each of which has two visitors. There have been several canonized saints of this order; four cardinals, seventy archbishops and bishops, and a great many very learned writers.

The story of the motive of St. Bruno's retirement into the desert was inserted in the Roman breviary, but was afterwards left out, when that breviary was reformed, by order of pope Urban VIII.; and this gave occasion to several learned men of the seventeenth century to publish writings on that subject, some to vindicate the truth of the story, and others to invalidate it.

In the year 1170, pope Alexander III. took this order under the protection of the holy see. In 1391, Boniface IX. exempted them from the jurisdiction of the bishops. In 1420, Martin V. exempted them from paying the tenths of the lands belonging to them; and Julius II., in 1508, ordered that all the houses of the order, in whatever part of the world they were situated, should obey the prior of the grand Chartreuse, and the general chapter of the order.

The convents of this order are generally very beautiful and magnificent: that of Naples, though but small, surpasses all the rest in ornaments and riches. Nothing is to be seen in the church and house but marble and jasper. The apartments of the prior are rather those of a prince, than a poor monk. There are innumerable statues, bas-reliefs, paintings, &c. together with very fine gardens; all which, joined with the holy and exemplary life of the good religious, draws the curiosity of all strangers, who visit Naples.

The Carthusians settled in England about the year 1180. They had several monasteries, particularly at Witham in Somersetshire, Hinton in the same county, Beaulieu in Nottinghamshire, Kingston upon Hull, Mount-Grace in Yorkshire, Eppewort in Lincolnshire, Shene in Surrey, and one near Coventry. In London they had a famous monastery, since called, from the Carthusians who were settled there, the Charter-house.—Hend. Buck.

CARTWRIGHT, (THOMAS); an eminent divine, was born in Hertfordshire, about 1535, and was educated at St. John's and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was greatly admired as a preacher; but, being of puritan principles, he was repeatedly persecuted by Whitgift, Grindall, and Aylmer; was more than once imprisoned, and was compelled to reside abroad for two years. He died in 1603. Besides controversial tracts, he wrote a Latin Harmony of the Gospels; a Commentary on the Proverbs; a Confutation of the Rhenish Testament; and other works.—Davenport.

CARVER, (JOHN); first governor of Plymouth colony, was a native of England, and was among the emigrants to Leyden, who composed Mr. Robinson's church in that place. When a removal to America was contemplated, he was appointed one of the agents to negotiate with the Virginia company in England for a suitable territory. He obtained a patent in 1619, and in the following year came to New England with the first company. Two vessels had been procured, the one called the Speedwell, and the other the May-flower, which sailed from Southampton, carrying one hundred and twenty passengers, August 5, 1620. As one of the vessels proved leaky, they both put into Dartmouth for repairs. They put to sea again, August 21; but the same cause, after they had sailed about one hundred leagues, obliged them to put back to Plymouth. The Speedwell was there pronounced unfit for the voyage. About twenty of the passengers went on shore. The others were received on board the May-flower, which sailed with one hundred and one passengers, besides the ship's officers and crew, Sept. 6. During the voyage the weather was unfavorable, and the ship being leaky, the people were almost continually wet. One young man died at sea, and a child was born, the son of Stephen Hopkins, which was called Oceanus. November 9, they discovered the white, sandy shores of cape Cod. As this land was northward of Hudson's river, to which they were destined, the ship was immediately put about to the southward; but the appearance of breakers and the danger from shoals, together with the eagerness of the women and children to be set on shore, induced them to shift their course again to the north. The next day, the northern extremity of the cape was doubled, and the ship was safely anchored in the harbor of cape Cod. As they were without the territory of the south Virginia company, from whom they had received the charter, which was thus rendered useless, and as they perceived the absolute necessity of government, it was thought proper before they landed, that a political association should be formed, intrusting all powers in the hands of the majority. Accordingly, after solemn prayers and thanksgiving, a written instrument was subscribed, November 11, 1620, by forty-one persons out of the whole number of passengers of all descriptions on board. Mr. Carver's name stood first, and he was unanimously elected governor for one year. Among the other names were those of Bradford, Winslow, Brewster, Allerton, Standish, Alden, Fuller, Warren, Hopkins, White, Rogers, and Cook. Government was thus regularly established on a truly republican principle.

On Monday, December 11, they surveyed the bay, and went ashore upon the main land at the place, which they called Plymouth; and a part of the very rock on which they first set their feet, is now in the public square of the town, and is distinguished by the name of the Forefathers' rock. The day of their landing, the 22d of December in the new style, is in the present age regarded as an annual festival. Several of the discourses on the occasion have been published.

After the treaty with the Indian sachem, Massasoit, was ratified in the spring of 1621, a few laws were enacted, and Mr. Carver was confirmed as governor for the following year. In the beginning of April, twenty acres of land were prepared for the reception of Indian corn, and Samoset and Squanto taught the emigrants how to plant, and dress it with herrings, of which an immense quantity came into the brooks. Six acres were sowed with barley and peas. While they were engaged in this labor, April 5th, the governor came out of the field at noon, complaining of a pain in his head, caused by the heat of the sun. In a few hours it deprived him of his senses, and in a few days put an end to his life, to the great grief of the infant plantation. He was buried with all the honors which could be paid to his memory. The men were under arms, and fired several volleys over his grave. His wife, overcome by her loss, survived him but six weeks. When he arrived, there were eight persons in his family.

Governor Carver was distinguished for his prudence, integrity, and firmness. He had a good estate in England, which he spent in the emigration to Holland and America. He exerted himself to promote the interests of the colony; he bore a large share of its sufferings; and the people confided in him as their friend and father. Piety, humility, and benevolence, were eminent traits in his character. In the time of the general sickness, which befell the colony, after he had himself recovered, he was assiduous in attending the sick, and performing the most humiliating services for them without any distinction of persons or characters.—*Belknap's Amer. CARY, (Lorr,) an African minister, was born a slave about thirty miles below Richmond, Virginia, on the estate of Wm. A. Christian. In 1804, he was hired out in Richmond as a common laborer. He was profane and much addicted to intoxication. But about the year 1807, it pleased God to bring him to repentance, and he became a member of the Baptist church, of which his father was a pious member. As yet he was not able to read. But having a strong desire to read the third chapter of John, on which he had heard a sermon, he procured a New Testament, and commenced learning his letters in that chapter. He learned to read and write. Being employed in a tobacco warehouse, and for his singularly faithful and useful services receiving a liberal reward, and being also assisted by a subscription, he was able, soon after the death of his first wife in 1813, to ransom himself and two children for eight hundred and fifty dollars. He soon became a preacher, and was employed every Sabbath among the colored people on plantations near Richmond. His desire to promote the cause of religion in Africa induced him to accompany the first band of emigrants to Africa, sent out by the Colonization society in 1821. He made a sacrifice for this object, for in 1820 he received a salary for his services in Richmond, of eight hundred dollars; and this would have been continued to him. It was probably his resolution, that at an early period prevented the abandonment of the colony of Monserado. In the battles of November and December, 1822, he bravely participated. He said, "there never has been a minute, no, not when the balls were flying around my head, when I could wish myself again in America." He was health officer and general inspector. During the prevalence of the disease of the climate, he acted as a physician, the only one at the time, having obtained some medical information from Dr. Ayres, and made liberal sacrifices of his property for the poor, the sick, and afflicted. In March, 1824, he had one hundred patients. About 1815, he had assisted in forming in Richmond an African Missionary society. In Africa he did not forget its objects, but most solicitously sought access to the native tribes, that he might instruct them in the Christian religion. Through his agency, a school was established about seventy miles from Monrovia. Before he sailed for Africa, a church was formed at Richmond of eight or nine persons, of which he became the pastor. In September, 1826, he was elected vice-agent of the colony. Mr. Ashmun, who had perfect confidence in his integrity, good sense, public spirit, decision, and courage, cheerfully committed the affairs of the colony to his hands, when ill health compelled him to withdraw. For six months he was the able and faithful chief of Liberia. He was killed by a sudden explosion of powder in the agency house, November 19, 1823; yet will he deserve a perpetual remembrance in the colony, whose foundation he assisted in laying.

"Thy meed shall be a nation's love!
Thy praise the free-man's song!
And in thy star-wreathed home above,
Thou mayst the theme prolong;
For hymns of praise from Afric's plains
Shall mingle with seraphic strains."

Some of the letters of Mr. Cary are published in the Amer. Bap. Magazine, and in the African Repository for Sept., 1828.—Afr. Repos. i. 233; iv. 162, 209; v. 10, 64; Allen.

CASAS, (BARTHOLOMEW LAS,) bishop of Chiapa, was born at Seville, in 1474, and was of French extraction. His father, Antonio, who went to Hispaniola with Columbus, in 1493, and returned rich to Seville, in 1498, made him a present of an Indian slave, while he was pursuing his studies at Salamanca. All the slaves being sent back to their country by the command of Isabella, Las Casas became deeply interested in their favor. In 1502, he accompanied Ovando to Hispaniola, and, witnessing the cruel treatment experienced by the natives, he devoted his whole subsequent life, a period of more than sixty years, to the vindication of their cause, and the melioration of their sufferings. As a missionary, he traversed the wilderness of the new world. As the champion of the natives, he made voyages to the court of Spain, and vindicated their cause with his lips and his pen. He was made bishop of Chiapa in 1544, and returned to Spain in 1551. After a life of apostolic intrepidity and zeal, he died in 1566, at the age of ninety-two, and was buried at Madrid, at the church of the Dominican convent of Atocha, of which fraternity he was a member. He has been justly reproached for lending his encouragement to the slavery of the Africans in 1517. The traffic existed before that period: in 1511, Ferdinand had ordered many Africans to be transported from Guinea to Hispaniola, since one negro could perform the work of four Indians. It was to spare the Indians, undoubtedly, that Las Casas recommended to cardinal Ximenes the introduction of negro slaves, the number being limited to four thousand. In this he trespassed on the grand rule, never to do evil for the sake of supposed good. He published "A brief relation of the destruction of the Indians," about 1542. There was published at London, in 1656, Tears of the Indians, being a translation from Las Casas. A French version of his Voyages of the Spaniards, appeared in 1697. J. A. Llorente has published a memoir of Las Casas, prefixed to the collection of his works. The most important work of Las Casas is a general history of the Indies, from their discovery in 1520, in three volumes, in manuscript. It was commenced in 1527, at fifty-three years of age, and finished in 1559, at eighty-five. This work, which was consulted by Herrera and Mr. Irving, exists only in manuscript, the publication of it never having been permitted in Spain on account of its too faithful delineation of Spanish cruelty.—Irving's Columb. iv. : Allen.

CASAUBON, (ISAAC,) a celebrated critic and Calvinist theologian, was born at Geneva, in 1559, and made an early and extraordinary progress in his classical studies. After having held the chair of Greek professor at Geneva for fourteen years, he removed to Montpellier, and thence to Paris, where Henry IV. appointed him royal librarian. On the death of Henry, Casaubon settled in England, where James I. made him a prebend of Westminster and Canterbury, and gave him a pension. He died in 1614, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His liberality of feeling induced many to accuse him wrongfully of leaning towards popery. He published editions of Strabo, Polyænus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Polybius, and several other ancient authors; and produced some original works, among which are nearly one thousand two hundred letters.—Davenport.

CASIPHIA. Ezra says, that when returning to Judea, he sent to Iddo, who dwelt at Casiphia; perhaps mount Caspius, near the Caspian sea, between Media and Hyrcania, where were many captives. Ezra 8: 17. See CASPIAN MOUNTAINS.—Calmet.

CASSIA. In Exodus 30: 24, Cassia is prescribed as one of the ingredients for composing the holy anointing oil. It is the bark of a tree of the bay tribe, which now grows chiefly in the East Indies. This bark was made known to the ancients, and highly esteemed by them; but, since the use of cinnamon has been generally adopted, the cassia bark has fallen into disrepute, on account of its inferiority. It is thicker and more coarse than cinnamon, of weaker quality, and abounds more with a viscid mucilaginous matter. For many purposes, however, cassia, as being much less expensive, is substituted for cinnamon, but more particularly for the preparation of what is called oil of cinnamon.

Cassia was one of the articles of merchandise in the markets of Tyre. Ezek. 27: 19. The cassia mentioned in Psalm 45: 8, is thought to have been an extract, or essential oil, from the bark.—Abbott.

CASTE; certain classes whose burdens and privileges are hereditary. The word is derived from the Portuguese casta, and was originally applied, by the conquerors of the East Indies, to the Indian families, whose occupations, customs, privileges, and duties are hereditary. This term has been sometimes applied to the hereditary classes in Europe; and we speak of the spirit or the prerogatives and usurpations of a caste, to express particularly that unnatural constitution of society, which makes distinction dependent on the accidents of birth or fortune. The division into castes among the people of the old world, comes to us from a period to which the light of history does not extend; hence its origin cannot be clearly traced; but it is highly probable, that, wherever it exists, it was originally grounded on a difference of descent, and in the modes of living, and that the separate castes were originally separate races of people. This institution is found among many nations.

CASTES, or CASTS, the four principal classes, or tribes, into which the Hindoos are divided, and which are said mystically to have sprung from the head, the heart, the thigh, and the feet of their great god Bramha. 1. The sacred, or braminal class, including the priests, or brahmins, who are also their philosophers and men of letters. 2. The military, or protecting class, commonly called the Sittri, from Chatriya, protectors of evil. 3. The Beise tribe, (from Vaisyas,) includes merchants, tradesmen, husbandmen, &c., which are considered, according to their derivation, as the nourishers of the state. 4. The Sudras, (or Sudders,) who, as proceeding from the feet of Bramha, are servants to the higher orders, mechanics, &c.

Beside these orders, which are divided into families, under a great variety of rules, there are a number of mixed castes, occasioned by intermarriages, &c.; and lastly, the Hari, or outcasts, which are held in utter detestation by all the others.—(See Ward's Hindoos, vol. iii. ch. 2. CASTELL, (EDMUND,) a divine and lexicographer, was born at Hatley, in Cambridgeshire, in 1606, and was educated at Immanuel and St. John's colleges. While at the university, he compiled his Dictionary of Seven Languages, on which he bestowed the labor of seventeen years. The publication of it ruined him. He was, however, rescued from poverty, by being appointed king's chaplain and Arabic professor at Cambridge, to which was afterwards added a prebend of Canterbury and some livings. He died in 1685, rector of Higham Gobion, in Bedfordshire. Dr. Walton was assisted by him in the Polyglot Bible.—Davenport.

CASTOR and POLLUX. It is said that the vessel which carried Paul to Rome had the sign of Castor and Pollux. Acts 28: 11. Castor and Pollux were sea-gods, and invoked by sailors; and even the light balls or meteors which are sometimes seen on ships, were called Castor and Pollux. An inscription in Gruter proves that seamen implored Castor and Pollux in dangers at sea. It is to be observed, that St. Luke does not mention the name, but the sign, of the ship. By the word sign, the sacred writer meant a protecting image of the deity, to whom the vessel was in some sort consecrated; as at present in Catholic countries, most of their vessels were named after some saint, St. Xavier, St. Andro, St. Dominique, &c. It appears to be certain, that the figure which gave name to the ship was at the head, and the tutelary deity was placed on the poop.—Watson.

CASUALTY; an event that is not foreseen or intended. See CONTINGENCY.—Hend. Buck.

CASUIST; one that studies and settles cases of conscience. The Jesuits Escobar, Sanchez, Suarez, Busenbaum, and others, have acquired notorious celebrity by their ingenuity in the invention of such cases, and for the ambiguity and singularity of their solutions. Escobar made a collection of the opinions of all the casuists before him. M. Le Feore, preceptor of Louis XIII., called the books of the casuists "the art of quibbling with God;" which does not seem far from truth, by reason of the multitude of distinctions and subtleties with which they abound. Mayer has published a bibliotheca of casuists, containing an account of all the writers on cases of conscience, ranged under three heads; the first comprehending the Lutheran, the second the Calvinist, and the third the Romish casuists.—Hend. Buck.

CASUISTRY, called by Kant the dialectics of conscience, is the doctrine and science of conscience and its cases, with the rules and principles of resolving the same; drawn partly from natural reason or equity, and partly from the authority of Scripture, the canon law, councils, fathers, &c. To casuistry belongs the decision of all difficulties arising about what a man may lawfully do or not do; what is sin or not sin; what things a man is obliged to do in order to discharge his duty, and what he may let alone without breach of it.

The schoolmen delighted in this species of intellectual labor. They transferred their zeal for the most fanciful and frivolous distinctions in what respected the doctrines of religion to its precepts; they anatomized the different virtues; nicely examined all the circumstances by which our estimate of them should be influenced; and they thus rendered the study of morality inextricable, confounded the natural notions of right and wrong, and so accustomed themselves and others to weigh their actions, that they could easily find some excuse for what was most culpable, whilst they continued under the impression that they were not deviating from what, as moral beings, was incumbent upon them. The corruption of manners which was introduced into the church during the dark ages, rendered casuistry very popular: and, accordingly, many who affected to be the most enlightened writers of their age, and perhaps really were so, tortured their understanding or their fancy in solving cases of conscience, and often in polluting their own imaginations and those of others, by employing them on possible crimes, upon which, however unlikely was their occurrence in life, they were eager to pronounce a decision. The happy change which the Reformation produced upon the views of men respecting the sacred Scriptures, tended to erect that pure standard of duty which for ages had been laid in the dust. Yet for a considerable time, Protestant divines occupied themselves with the intricacies of casuistry; thus in some degree shutting out the light which they had fortunately poured upon the world. The Lutheran theologians walked very much in the track which the schoolmen had opened, although their decisions were much more consonant with Christianity; and it was not uncommon in some countries for ecclesiastical assemblies to devote part of their time to the resolution of questions which might have been safely left unnoticed, which now are almost universally regarded as frivolous, and about which almost the most ignorant would be ashamed to ask an opinion. Even after much of the sophistry, and much of the moral perversion connected with casuistry, were exploded, the form of that science was preserved, and many valuable moral principles in conformity to it delivered. The venerable bishop Hall published a celebrated work, to which he gave the appellation of "Cases of Conscience practically resolved;" and he introduces it with the following observations addressed to the reader: "Of all divinity, that part is most useful which determines cases of conscience; and of all cases of conscience, the practical are most necessary, as action is of more concernment than speculation; and of all practical cases, those which are of most common use are of so much greater necessity and benefit to be resolved, as the errors thereof are more universal, and therefore more prejudicial to the society of mankind. These I have selected out of many; and having turned over divers casuists, have pitched upon those decisions which I hold most conformable to enlightened reason and religion; sometimes I follow them, and sometimes I leave them for a better guide." He divides his work into four parts,—Cases of profit and traffic; cases of life and liberty; cases of piety and religion; and cases matrimonial: under each of these solving a number of questions, or rather giving a number of moral dissertations.

Casuistry, as a systematic perversion of Christian morality, is now, in the Protestant world, very much unknown; though there still is, and perhaps always will be, that softening down of the strict rules of duty, to which mankind are led either by self-deceit, or by the natural desire of reconciling, with the hope of the divine favor, considerable obliquity from that path of rectitude and virtue which alone is acceptable to God. But the most striking specimen of the length to which casuistry was carried, and of the dangerous consequences which resulted from it, is furnished by the history of the maxims and sentiments of the Jesuits, that celebrated order, which combined with profound literature, and the most zealous support of popery, an ambition that perverted their understandings, or rather induced them to employ their rational powers in the melancholy work of poisoning the sources of morality, and of casting the name and the appearance of virtue over a dissoluteness of principle and a profligacy of licentiousness, which, had they not been checked by sounder views, and by feelings and habits favorable to morality, would have spread through the world the most degrading misery. See JESUITS.

Some suppose that all books of casuistry are as useless as they are tiresome. One who is really anxious to do his duty must be very weak, it is said, if he can imagine that he has much occasion for them; and with regard to one who is negligent of it, the style of those writings is not such as is likely to awaken him to more attention. The frivolous accuracy which casuists attempt to introduce into subjects which do not admit of it, almost necessarily betray them into dangerous errors; and at the same time render their works dry and disagreeable, abounding in abstruse and metaphysical distinctions, but incapable of exciting in the heart any of those emotions which it is the principal use of books of morality to produce.

On the other hand, we think it may be observed, that, though these remarks may apply to some, they cannot apply to all books of casuistry. It must be acknowledged that nice distinctions, metaphysical reasonings, and abstruse terms, cannot be of much service to the generality, because there are so few who can enter into them; yet, when we consider how much light is thrown upon a subject by the force of good reasoning, by viewing a case in all its bearings, by properly considering all the objections that may be made to it, and by examining it in every point of view: if we consider, also, how little some men are accustomed to think, and yet at the same time possess that tenderness of conscience which makes them fearful of doing wrong; we must conclude that such works as these, when properly executed, may certainly be of considerable advantage.

Although the morality of the gospel is distinguished by its purity and by its elevation, it is necessarily exhibited in a general form; certain leading principles are laid down; but the application of these to the innumerable cases which occur in the actual intercourse of life, is left to the understanding and conscience of individuals. Had it been otherwise, the Christian code would have swelled to an extent which would have rendered it in a great degree useless; it would have been difficult or impossible to recollect all its provisions; and minute as these would have been, they would still have been defective,—new situations or combinations of circumstances modifying duty continually arising, which it would have been impracticable or hurtful to anticipate. When the principles of duty are rightly unfolded, and when they are placed on a sound foundation, there is, to a fair mind, no difficulty in accommodating them to its own particular exigencies. A few cases, it is true, may occur, where it is a matter of doubt in what way men should act; but these are exceedingly rare, and the lives of vast numbers may come to an end without any of them happening to occasion perplexity. Every man may be, and perhaps is, sensible, that his errors are to be ascribed, not to his having been at a loss to know what he should have done, but to his deliberately or hastily violating what he saw to be right, or to his having allowed himself to be confounded, by vain and subtle distinctions, what, in the case of any one else, would have left in his mind no room for hesitation.

CATABAPTISTS; opposers of baptism, (the Greek preposition, kata, being here used in the sense of against;) either persons who oppose baptism as a rite altogether obsolete, or as applicable only to converts from another religion to Christianity. See ANTYBAPTISTS.—Williams.

CATAPHRYGIAN HERESY; the citreous system of Montanus, and so called, because that heresiarch began to exercise his pretended prophetic gifts in the lower or more southerly part of Phrygia. See MONTANUS.—Hend. Buck.

CATECHESIS; the science which teaches the proper method of instructing beginners in the principles of the Christian religion by question and answer, which is called the catechetical method. Hence catechist and catechize. The art of the catechist consists in being able to elicit and develop the ideas of the youthful minds of learners. This part of religious science was first cultivated in modern times, and Rosenmüller, Dinter, Schmid, Wolrath, Doltz, Gräffe, Daut, Winter, Henrich, Müller, and others, have particularly distinguished themselves by their writings upon it.—Ency. Austr.

CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS; institutions for the elementary instruction of Christian teachers, of which there were many in the Eastern church, from the second to the fifth century. They were different from catechumenical schools, which were attached to almost every church, and which were intended only for the popular instruction of proselytes, and of the children of Christians; whereas the catechetical schools were intended to communicate a scientific knowledge of Christianity. The first and most renowned was established about the middle of the second century, for the Egyptian church at Alexandria, on the model of the famous schools of Grecian learning in that place. (See ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL.) Teachers like Pantænus, Clement, and Origen, gave them splendor, and secured their permanence. They combined instruction in rhetoric and oratory, in classical Grecian literature, and the eclectic philosophy, with the principal branches of theological study, exegesis, the doctrines of religion, and the traditions of the church; distinguished the popular religious belief from the gnosis, or the thorough knowledge of religion; established Christian theology as a science, and finally attacked the dreams of the Chiliasts, (believers in a millennium;) but by blending Greek speculations and Gnostic fantasies with the doctrines of the church, by an allegorical interpretation of the Bible, and the assumption of a secret sense in the Scriptures, different from the literal, contributed to the corruption of Christianity. The distraction of the Alexandrian church by the Arian controversies proved the destruction of the catechetical schools in that place, about the middle of the fourth century. The catechetical school at Antioch appears not to have been a permanent institution, like the Alexandrian, but only to have been formed around distinguished teachers, where there happened to be any in the place. There were some distinguished teachers in Antioch, about the year 220. We have no certain information, however, of the theological teachers in that place, such as Lucian, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, until the latter part of the fourth century. These teachers were distinguished from the Alexandrian by more sober views of Christianity, by confining themselves to the literal interpretation of the Bible, by a cautious use of the types of the Old Testament, and by a bolder discussion of doctrines. The Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, in the fifth century, drew after them the ruin of the schools at Antioch. Of a similar character were the catechetical schools instituted at Edessa, in the third century, and destroyed in 489, and the school afterwards established at Nisibis, by the Nestorians, in its stead; both of which were in Mesopotamia. To these catechetical schools, succeeded, at a later date, the cathedral and monastic schools, especially among the western Christians, who, as late as the sixth century, made use of the heathen schools, and had never established catechetical schools even at Rome.—*Ency. CATECHISING; instructing by asking questions and correcting the answers. Catechising is an excellent means of informing the mind, engaging the attention, and affecting the heart, and is an important duty incumbent on all who have children under their care. Children should not be suffered to grow up without instruction, under the presence that the choice of religion ought to be perfectly free, and not biassed by the influence and authority of parents, or the power of education. As they have capacities, and are more capable of knowledge by instruction than by the exercise of their own reasoning powers, they should certainly be taught. This agrees both with the voice of nature and the dictates of revelation. Deut. 6: 7. Prov. 22: 5. Eph. 6: 4. The propriety of this being granted, it may next be observed, that, in order to facilitate their knowledge, short summaries of religion extracted from the Bible, in the way of question and answer, may be of considerable use. 1. Hereby, says Dr. Watts, the principles of Christianity are reduced into short sentences, and easier to be understood by children. 2. Hereby, these principles are not only thrown into a just and easy method, but every part is naturally introduced by a proper question; and the rehearsal of the answer is made far easier to a child than it would be if the child were required to repeat the whole scheme of religion. 3. This way of teaching has something familiar and delightful in it, because it looks more like conversation and dialogue. 4. The very curiosity of the young mind is awakened by the question to know what the answer will be; and the child will take pleasure in learning the answer by heart, to improve its own knowledge. (See next article.)—Head. Buck.

CATECHISM; a form of instruction by means of questions and answers. There have been various catechisms published by different authors, but many of them have been but ill suited to convey instruction to juvenile minds. Catechisms for children should be so framed as not to puzzle and confound, but to let the beams of divine light into their minds by degrees. They should be accommodated as far as possible to the weakness of their understandings; for mere learning sentences by rote, without comprehending the meaning, will be of but little use. In this way they will know nothing but words; it will prove a laborious task, and not a pleasure; confirm them in a bad habit of dealing in sounds instead of ideas; and, after all, perhaps, create in them an aversion to religion itself. Dr. Watts advises that different catechisms should be composed for different ages and capacities; the questions and answers should be short, plain and easy; scholastic terms and logical distinctions should be avoided; the most practical points of religion should be inserted; and one or more well-chosen texts of Scripture should be added to support almost every answer, and to prove the several parts of it. The doctor has admirably exemplified his own rules in the catechism he has composed for children at three or four years of age; that for children at seven or eight; his assembly's catechism, proper for youth at twelve or fourteen; his preservative from the sins and follies of childhood; his catechism of Scripture names; and his historical catechism. These are superior to any we know, and which we cannot but ardently recommend to parents and all those who have the care and instruction of children.

The catechism of the church of England is drawn up by way of question and answer. Originally it consisted of no more than a repetition of the baptismal vow, the creed, and the Lord's prayer; but king James I. ordered the bishops to add to it a short and plain explanation of the sacraments, which was accordingly performed by bishop Overal, then dean of St. Paul's, and approved by the rest of the bishops.

The times appointed for catechising are Sundays and holidays. By the first book of king Edward VI. it was not required to be done above once in six weeks. But, upon Bucer's objecting to the interval of time as too long, the rubric was altered, but expressed, notwithstanding, in indefinite terms, leaving it to be done as often as occasion requires. Indeed, the fifty-ninth canon enjoins every parson, vicar, or curate, upon every Sunday and holiday, to teach and instruct the youth and ignorant persons of his parish, in the catechism set forth in the Book of Common Prayer; and that under pain of a sharp reproof for the first omission, suspension for the second, and excommunication for the third. See CATECHIST and CATECHISING.—Head. Buck.

CATECHIST; one whose charge is to instruct by questions, or to question the uninstructed concerning religion. The catechists of the ancient churches were usually ministers, and distinct from the bishops and presbyters; and had their catechumena, or auditories, apart. But they did not constitute any distinct order of the clergy, being chosen out of any order. The bishop himself sometimes performed the office; at other times presbyters, readers, or deacons. It was his business to expose the folly of the pagan superstition; to remove prejudices, and answer objections; to discourse on behalf of the Christian doctrines; and to give instruction to those who had not sufficient knowledge to qualify them for baptism.—Head. Buck.

CATECHUMENS; the lowest order of Christians in the ancient, but not primitive church. They were called catechumens from the Greek word katecheo, which signifies to instruct in the first rudiments of any art or science. They had some title to the common name of Christian, being a degree above pagans and heretics, though not consummated by baptism. They were admitted to the state of catechumens in the fourth and fifth centuries, by imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross. The children of believing parents were admitted catechumens as soon as ever they were capable of instruction; but at what age those born of heathen parents might be admitted, is not so clear. As to the time of their continuance in this state, there was no general rule fixed about it; but the practice varied according to the difference of times and places, and the readiness and proficiency of the catechumens themselves. The council of Elberis appointed two years' probation for new converts; and Justinian, in one of his Novella, prescribes the same length of time. The apostolical constitutions lengthen the term to three years. Sometimes it was limited to the forty days of lent. Socrates observes, that, in the conversion of the Burgundians, the French bishop, who converted them, took only seven days to catechise them, and then baptized them. But, in case of sickness or imminuent death, the catechumens were immediately baptized with what they called clinic baptism.

There were four orders or degrees of catechumens. The first were the exōthoumenoi, or those who were instructed privately without the church, and kept at a distance from the privilege of entering into the church, for some time, to make them the more eager and desirous of it. The next degree above these were the ahouōmenoi, audientes, or hearers. They were so called from being admitted to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church, but were not allowed to partake of the prayers. The third sort of catechumens were the gonu-kinōntes, genu-flectentes, or kneelers; so called because they receive imposition of hands, kneeling upon their knees. The fourth order was the baptizomenoi, photizomenoi, the competentes and electi, which denote the immediate candidates of baptism, or such as were appointed to be baptized the next approaching festival: before which strict examination was made into their proficiency under the several stages of catechetical exercises. After examination, they were exercised for twenty days together, and were obliged to fasting and confession. They were to get the creed and Lord's prayer by heart, and to repeat them before the bishop at their last examination. Some days before baptism they went veiled, or with their faces covered; and it was customary to touch their ears, saying, Ephphata, "be opened;" as also to anoint their eyes with clay; both ceremonies in imitation of our Savior's practice, and intended to shadow out to the catechumens their condition both before and after admission into the Christian church.

That part of divine service which preceded the common prayers of the communicants at the altar, that is, the psalmody, the reading of the Scriptures, the sermon, &c. was called missa catechumenorum; because the catechumens had the liberty of being present only at this part of the service.

The ancients speak of the sacrament of the catechumens; and some modern writers, by mistake, suppose, that, though they were not allowed to partake of the eucharist, they had something like it, which they call enlogia panis, or panis benedictus. But it appears from St. Augustine, that this sacrament was not the consecrated bread, but only a little taste of salt; intimating to them by that symbol, that they were to purge and cleanse their souls from sin, salt being the emblem of purity and incorruption. They called this a sacrament, after the custom of the primitive Christians, who gave that name to every thing that was mysterious, or had a spiritual signification in it.—Hend. Buck.

CATENA; a Greek word signifying a chain, in biblical criticism is an exposition of a portion of the Scriptures, formed from collections from several authors. Thus we have Catene of the Greek fathers on the Octateuch, by Procopius; on the book of Job, by Olympiodorus; and on the Octateuch, the books of Samuel and Kings, by Nicephorus. These were Greek writers themselves. Beside them, compilations of this sort were made from the early fathers by many later authors, such as Fraucis Zephyr, Lepomannus, Patriek, Juuius, Corderus, &c. Poole's Synopsis may be regarded as a catena of the modern interpretations of the whole Scriptures, as Wolfius is of a still more ancient class on the New Testament.—Hend. Buck.

CATERPILLAR. (chesil.) The word occurs Deut. 28: 38; Psalm 68: 46; Isaiah 33: 4; 1 Kings 8: 37; 2 Chron. 6: 28; Joel 1: 4; 2: 25. In the four last cited texts, it is distinguished from the locust, properly so called; and in Joel 1: 4, is mentioned as "eating up" what the other species had left, and therefore might be called the consumer, by way of eminence. But the ancient interpreters are far from being agreed what particular species it signifies. The Septuagint in Chronicles, and Aquila in Psalms, render it brouchos: so the Vulgate in Chronicles and Isaiah, and Jerome in Psalms, bruchus, the chaffer, which is a great devourer of leaves. From the Syriac version, however, Michaëlis is disposed to understand it the taupe grillon, "mole cricket," which, in its grub state, is very destructive to corn and other vegetables, by feeding on their roots. See LOCUST.—Watson.

CATHARINE, (SAINT,) a virgin and martyr of Alexandria, equally illustrious for her learning, eloquence, and piety. She suffered martyrdom in the persecution under the emperor Maximin, in the fourth century.

There are two other Catharines distinguished by the same qualities; one of Sienna, who died in 1380; and the other at Bologna died in 1463, who wrote many religious works in Latin and Italian.—Betham.

CATHARI, or CATHARISTS, i. e. Puritans, a term applied, in different ages, to persons who distinguished themselves by aiming (or, at least, professing to aim) at greater purity than the mass of Christians around them. It was especially applied to the Paulicians of the seventh and following centuries, by way of reproach. They were charged with the errors of the Manichæans; as were, generally, all who separated from the church of Rome. See PAULICIANS.

Speaking of the Cathari of the twelfth century, the learned and excellent Mr. Milner says, "They were plain, unassuming, harmless, and industrious Christians; condemning, by their doctrine and manners, the whole apparatus of the reigning idolatry and superstition; placing true religion in the faith and love of Christ, and retaining a supreme regard for the divine word."—See Milner's Church Hist. vol. iii. p. 385.—Williams.

CATHEDRAL; the chief church of a diocese; a church wherein is a bishop's see. The word comes from kathedra, "chair;" the name seems to have taken its rise from the manner of sitting in the ancient churches or assemblies of private Christians. In these the council, i. e. the elders and priests, were called presbyterium; at their head was the bishop, who held the place of chairman, cathedrolis or cathedraticus; and the presbyters, who sat on either side, also called by the ancient fathers assessores episcoporum. The episcopal authority did not reside in the bishop alone, but in all the presbyters, whereof the bishop was president. A cathedral, therefore, originally was different from what it is now; the Christians, till the time of Constantine, having no liberty to build any temple. By their churches they only meant assemblies; and by cathedrals, nothing more than consistories.—Hend. Buck.

CATHOLIC, denotes any thing that is universal or general. 1. The Epistles of James, Peter, Jude, and John, are called the seven Catholic Epistles, either because they were not written to any particular person, or church, but to Christians in general, or to Christians of several countries; or because, whatever doubts may at first have been entertained respecting some of them, they were all acknowledged by the catholic or universal church, at the time this appellation was attached to them, which we find to have been common in the fourth century. 2. The rise of heresies induced the primitive Christian church to assume to itself the appellation of catholic, being a characteristic to distinguish itself from all sects, who, though they had party names, sometimes sheltered themselves under the name of Christians. The Romish church now distinguishes itself by Catholic, in opposition to all who have separated from her communion, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics, and herself only as the true and Christian church. In the strict sense of the word, there is no catholic church in being; that is, no universal Christian communion.—Hend. Buck.

CATHOLIC, or GENERAL EPISTLES. They are seven in number; namely, one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. They are called catholic, because directed to Christian converts generally, and not to any particular church. Hug, in his "Introduction to the New Testament," takes another view of the import of this term, which was certainly used at an early period, as by Origen and others:—"When the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles constituted one peculiar division, the works of Paul also another, there still remained writings of different authors, which might likewise form a collection of themselves, to which a name must be given. It might most aptly be called the common collection, katholikōn syntag- ma, of the apostles, and the treatises contained in it, koinai and katholikai, which are commonly used by the Greeks as synonymous. For this we find a proof even in the most ancient ecclesiastical language. Clemens Alexandrinus calls the epistle which was despatched by the assembly of the apostles, (Acts 15: 23,) the "catholic epistle," as that in which all the apostles had a share. Hence our seven epistles are catholic, or epistles of all the apostles who are authors."—Watson.

CATHOLICISM; that liberality of sentiment, which arises from an enlarged spirit of Christian philanthropy, and which, passing beyond the limits of a sect, embraces in its affectionate regards and good opinion all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. It is that noble disposition which tends to the broadest and most comprehensive views of Christianity, and of its interests in the world; and which prompts a man to sympathize with every portion of the true church of Christ, whatever be its denomination, or its incidental errors. It is opposed to sectarianism. See LIBERALITY OF SENTIMENT.

The term is sometimes used improperly to denote the belief of the church of Rome.

CAVES, or CAVERNNS. The country of Judea, being mountainous and rocky, is in many parts full of caverns, to which allusions frequently occur in the Old Testament. At Engedi, in particular, there was a cave so large, that David, with six hundred men, hid themselves in the sides of it, and Saul entered the mouth of the cave without perceiving that any one was there, 1 Sam. 24. Josephus tells us of a numerous gang of banditti, who, having infested the country, and being pursued by Herod with his army, retired into certain caverns, almost inaccessible, near Arbela in Galilee, where they were with great difficulty subdued. "Beyond Damascus," says Strabo, "are two mountains, called Trachones, from which the country has the name of Trachonitis; and from hence, towards Arabia and Iturea, are certain rugged mountains, in which there are deep caverns; one of which will hold four thousand men." Tavernier, in his "Travels in Persia," speaks of a grotto between Aleppo and Bir, that would hold near three thousand horse. And Maundrel assures us, that "three hours distant from Sidon, about a mile from the sea, there runs along a high rocky mountain, in the sides of which are hewn a multitude of grottoes, all very little differing from each other. These are entrances about two feet square. There are of these subterranean caverns two hundred in number. It may, with probability, at least, be concluded that these places were contrived for the use of the living, and not of the dead." These extracts may be useful in explaining such passages of Scripture as the following: "Because of the Midianites, the children of Israel made them dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds," Judges 6: 2. To these they betook themselves for refuge in times of distress and hostile invasion:—"When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait, for the people were distressed, then the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits," 1 Sam. 13: 6. See also Jer. 41: 9. "To enter into the holes of the rocks and into the caves of the earth," became with the prophets a very proper and familiar image to express a state of terror and consternation. Thus Isa. 2: 19. "They shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth."—Watson.

CAVE, (WILLIAM;) a learned divine, and ecclesiastical historian of some eminence. He was the son of a clergyman, and born at Pickwell, in Leicestershire, in 1637. He received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge, and took the degree of master of arts in 1660. The vicarage of Islington was bestowed on him in 1662; soon after which he was made chaplain to Charles the Second, on which he took the degree of doctor of divinity; and, having distinguished himself by his writings, he was promoted to a canonry of Windsor, with the vicarage of Isleworth, Middlesex. He died in 1713, and was interred in Islington church, where a monument was erected to his memory. Dr. Cave was a man of extensive learning, an ingenious writer, and a popular preacher; but he was deficient in point of judgment, and was disposed to place too much reliance on the authority of the Christian fathers and early writers; on which account Dr. Jortin, in his "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History," styles him "the whitewasher of the ancients." Le Clerc also made a somewhat similar complaint of Cave, in his "Bibliothèque Universelle," which gave occasion to a warm controversy between these learned men; but which of the two had the better in the dispute, is not to be here decided. His principal works are "Primitive Christianity; or, the Religion of the Ancient Christians, in the first Ages of the Gospel." "Antiquitates Apostolicæ; or, the History of the Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the Apostles, &c." folio. "Ecclesiastici; or, the Lives of the Fathers of the Fourth Century," folio. "Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Historia Literaria," two vols., folio, 1688—1698, republished at Geneva, and, in a posthumous, enlarged, and improved edition, at Oxford, in two vols. folio, 1740, 1743.—Jones's Chr. Bing.

CAUCASUS, the name of a series of mountains of which Ararat is a part; and another part of which is named Taurus; or the names of Taurus and Ararat are general throughout the ridge, and denote nearly, or altogether, the same as Caucasus. This is not easily determined, as ancient authors seem to use the names without sufficient precision to direct our opinion. We may, however, consider Tannus as a mountain forming part of Caucasus. Capt. Wilford gives the following account of its Hindoo appellation: "The true Sanscrit name of this mountain is C'hasa-giri, or the mountain of the C'hasas, a most ancient and powerful tribe, who inhabited this immense range, from the eastern limits of India to the confines of Persia; and most probably as far as the Euxine and Mediterranean seas. They are often mentioned in the sacred books of the Hindoos. Their descendants still inhabit the same regions, and are called to this day, C'hasas, and in some places, C'hasyas and Cossais. They belonged to the class of warriors, or Cshettris; but now they are considered as the lowest of the four classes, and were thus degraded, according to the institutes of Menu, by their omission of the holy rites, and by seeing no Brahmins.

If we reflect, that, after leaving the ark on mount Ararat, a great part of mankind travelled westward, (see ARARAT,) we shall find, that with respect to them mount Taurus assumed, and preserved, an easterly bearing, of course; and the east being that quarter of the heavens in which the sun rose, every rising sun would remind such western migrators, that in that direction resided their great ancestor.—Hence, among other causes, their idolatrous worship of the rising luminary; wherein they paid homage to their distant parent; and hence, they continued to worship the rising sun, as it reminded them of their origin, and of him whom they peculiarly venerated. For this reason we often find on medals a bull with a star (or sun) between his horns, i. e. the sun on the head of mount Taurus. The same principle explains the standard of the great Mogul, which is, the sun rising behind a lion;—implying, that in the original country where the royal race was native, the sun rose behind "mount Lion." Much the same may be thought respecting the moon, which also rising in the east, reminded western nations of their eastern connections. The idolatry of the nations east of mount Caucasus adopted these ideas but little, if at all, because the course they had taken was contrary to these principles, which are strictly geographical. That the worship of Boodha, with other Hindoo notions, has been carried eastward in subsequent ages, is no impeachment of this argument.—Calmet.

CAUSEY, a raised way, or path, 1 Chron. 26: 16. 2 Chron. 9: 4. One of these prepared ways is no doubt referred to in Isaiah 62: 10. which Mr. Taylor thus renders—

Pass, pass, the gates;

Level (even) the way for the people;

Throw up, throw up, the causey—lit. raise, raise, the raised way;

Clear it from every stone;

Display a standard to the people.

Mr. Harmer would refer the fourth member of this sentence, to the heaping up stones by the way of landmarks, to direct travellers in their way. Without impugning his instances, Mr. Taylor very properly hints that where a causey had already levelled and fixed the road, that further labor of raising mounts was unnecessary. As to the nature of these causeys, (called in this place meselen.) George Herbert gives this information (p. 170.) "A word of our last night's journey, [in Illyrcania, i. e. Persia; the country to which Isaiah alludes.] The most part of the night we rode upon a paved causey, broad enough for ten horses to go abreast; built by extraordinary labor and expense, over a part of a great desert; which is so even that it affords a large horizon: howbeit being of a boggy loose ground upon the surface, it is covered with white salt, in some places a yard deep, a miserable passage! for, if either the wind drive the loose salt abroad, which is like dust; or that by accident the horse or camel forsake the causey, the bog is not strong enough to uphold them, but suffers them to sink past all recovery." He then compares this to the Roman via militaris, whose foundations were laid with huge piles, or stakes, pitched into a bog, and fastened together with branches or withes of wood: upon which rubbish was spread, and gravel or stones afterward laid, to make the ground more firm and solid.

But another purpose to which the foregoing description of a causey may be applied, is, an attempt to illustrate that very obscure passage, Ps. 84: 6, 7. Under the article ALTAR, something has been said respecting the illustration of the foregoing verses. To ascertain the sense of these, Mr. Taylor thus analyzes them: Happy the man whose source of exertion, strength, and ability for perseverance in the journey of life, and duty, is in thee [God]: he esteems it more, and it more strengthens his heart, than meeting with a raised causey in a difficult, boggy moor, rejoices and accommodates the traveller: it invigorates his mind more than travellers are invigorated who pass through the valley of Bekaa, even at the very time when they find overflowing water for their refreshment, in the numerous pools with which that valley abounds."

It is very natural, he observes, that the Psalmist, envying, as it were, the inmates in the tabernacle of God, should direct his thoughts to those who were travelling towards that holy place, and almost envy them, also, their happy privilege. If this be admitted, the pathos of the ode will appear very forcible, and the progressive climax of ideas very happy, as directed to, (1.) the birds who may build at the altar; (2.) the residents in the holy place; (3.) those pious persons who were travelling towards it, though at present far from it:—

How lovely are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts!

My soul length, and desireth even to fainting, towards the courts of the LORD;

Whereas, the bird hath found a dwelling, and the dove a nest for herself,

Where she may lay her young; in thy sacrificatory, O LORD of hosts!

Happy the resident dwellers in thy house! they are ever praising thee!

Happy the man, whose power is in thee! it exceeds in their hearts the smoothest causey:

They travel, as if in the valley of Bekaa;

Where also the rains overflow the reservoirs.

They advance from one place of refreshment to another place of refreshment.

To appear before the God of gods in Zion!

How travellers might be accommodated by a causey, we have seen above; and causeys being constructed in boggy, wet places, the transition of thought to the valley abundant in springs is easy. The value of springs in the East, may be gathered from many expressions in Scripture.

It remains only to hint, that the valley of Bekaa is among the mountains of Lebanon. (See BACA.) Was the Psalmist at this time in a dry and thirsty land where no water was? and further from Zion than even Bekaa itself, though in a different direction?

It is usually understood that the prophet Isaiah (chap. 40: 3.) alludes to the custom of sending persons, as we might say, laborers, pioneers, before a great prince, to clear the way for his passage.

The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness,
"Prepare ye the way of the LORD;

(Smooth the surface of a way for the LORD: the way of our God we have before rendered—level (EVEN) the way for the people. Make straight IN THE DESERT a causey for our God; (the word for causey is, as before, meselen.)

Every valley shall be raised;
And every mountain and hill shall be lowered;
And the winding paths shall be made straight;
And the broken—rough—places into a continued level."

The following is from Sir Thomas Roe's chaplain, (p. 468.) and affords a happy comment on the passage. "I, waiting upon my lord ambassador two years, and part of a third, and travelling with him in progress with that king, [the Mogul,] in the most temperate months there, 'twixt September and April, was in one of our progresses 'twixt Mandoa and Amadavar, nineteen days, making but short journeys IN A WILDERNESS, where by a very great company sent before us, to make those passages and places fit to receive us, A WAY WAS CUT OUT, AND MADE EVEN, broad enough for our convenient passage; and in the place where we pitched our tents a great compass of ground was rid, and made plain for them, by grubbing a number of trees and bushes; yet there we went as readily to our tents as we did when they were set up in the plains."—Calmet.

CEASE. To cease from our own works, is to leave off obedience to our will as our rule; and forbear resting on our own works as our righteousness before God; and depend on Jesus' fulfilment of the law in our stead, and obey the law as a rule in the strength of his grace. Heb. 4: 10. He that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin; he that is held in law as snuffering with Christ, is freed from the guilt of sin; he that hath experienced the power of Christ's death on his conscience, is ceased from the love and voluntary service of sin: he that has suffered, cordially, a violent death for Christ's sake, has entirely got rid of sin, his worst burden. 1 Pet. 4: 1. Without ceasing, frequently, earnestly. 2 Tim. 1: 3. 1 Thess. 5: 17.—Bronn.

CECIL, (RICHARD, M. A.), was born in Chiswell street, London, November 8, 1748. His father was scarlet dyer to the East India company, and was an intelligent man. His mother was the only child of Mr. Grosvenor, a respectable merchant in London, and niece of the Rev. Dr. Grosvenor, the celebrated author of the "Mourner." His father was a member of the church of England, and took his son with him regularly to church on a Sunday. His mother was a dissenter, and a woman of real piety; she, however, appears to have been not sufficiently attentive to the cultivation of the understanding of her son; though for the concerns of religion she habitually displayed a just attention. His education was private, but his intellectual powers were very superior. His father, intending him for business, placed him in two respectable mercantile houses; but as he was attacked by disease, and was averse to trade, he devoted his time to literature and the arts. At an early age, he wrote many essays, which were inserted in the periodical publications of the day. His father was a man of extensive reading and classical education, and was surprised and delighted at the discovery which he unexpectedly made, that his son was a poet. To painting he was also peculiarly attached; and, unknown to his parents, at an early age he visited France, solely from a desire to inspect the performances of the great masters. On his return, his father consented that he should visit Rome, in order that his knowledge of that art might be improved. An unexpected circumstance, however, prevented that plan from being carried into effect, and he continued to reside with his father. His conduct was at this period very bad: to the perusal of works of infidelity and irreligion he devoted much time, and soon became a professed infidel. But his mind at length was illumined by the Spirit of God—his conscience was aroused—he began to pray, and to read his Bible. He consulted his mother—attended the preaching of the gospel—and was assisted, gradually to discover his own character, his necessities, his danger, and his remedy. His father, who was a bigot, now cautioned him against becoming a dissenter, but promised to assist him, provided he became a minister of the church of England. To the advice of his father he paid attention; and on May the 19th, 1773, was entered at Queen's college, Oxford. During his residence at the university, he acquired much information and knowledge; but experienced great difficulties in openly and habitually making a profession of religion. On the 22d of September, 1776, he was ordained deacon, on the title of the Rev. Mr. Pugh, of Rauceley, in Lincolnshire. In the Lent term following, he took the degree of bachelor of arts; and on the 23d of February, 1777, was admitted to priest's orders. With Mr. Pugh he staid but for a short time, and, at his request, went to officiate in the churches of Thornton, Bagworth, and Markfield, in Leicestershire. His ministry at those places was eminently useful; and through his instrumentality a general attention to the gospel was excited among the people; and at length a flourishing congregation was formed in each church. On Mr. Cecil's return to Rauceley, he received a letter, informing him that two small livings had been procured by his friends for him at Lewes, in Sussex. Both those livings, however, brought in only about eighty pounds per annum. In 1777, he was much afflicted by the death of his mother; as also, subsequently, in 1779, by that of his father. At Lewes he was attacked by rheumatism, owing to the dampness of the place; and with that complaint was so much troubled, that he was at length compelled to quit it, and to reside at Islington, near London. During his residence at that place, he preached at various churches and chapels; and he was singularly instrumental in the conversion of sinners, and in the edification of saints. For some years he preached a lecture at Lothbury, at six o'clock on the Sunday evening, which was attended by many excellent persons. At the same time he had also the whole duty to perform of St. John's chapel, Bedford row, and an evening lecture at Orange street chapel, which was then a chapel of ease. His ill health, however, compelled him reluctantly to decline the lecture in Lothbury. Soon after, Orange street chapel was also resigned; but he united with his friend the Rev. Henry Foster, in performing the duty of Long Acre chapel. In 1787, he accepted the office of lecturer at Christ church, Spitalfields; and zealously and affectionately performed his duties, not indeed for the pecuniary remuneration he received, since by that lecture his circumstances were unimproved; but for the glory of God and the welfare of man. In Long Acre chapel he labored for some time with eminent success to immense congregations; but his health and duties compelled him, in 1801, to resign it. His labors at St. John's were most arduous, but from them he did not shrink, and seldom did he allow any one to occupy his place. About the year 1800, he established an annual sermon at that chapel, to be preached on May day to young persons. He actively engaged in every institution of benevolence, and first suggested the plan, as he afterwards assisted the establishment, of the Rupture society. In 1800, Mr. Cecil was requested by Samuel Thornton, Esq. to accept the livings of Cobham and Bisle; but for a long time he declined so to do, because he could not, during the winter season, officiate as minister therein; but he was at length persuaded to accept them, and to perform duty there in the summer. In 1808, he was attacked by a paralytic seizure, and was compelled to visit Clifton. The journey did not much, however, improve his health; and he retired in May, 1809, to Tunbridge wells. But all the measures resorted to for his recovery were unattended with success; and on the 15th of August, 1810, aged sixty-two, he expired. The exertions of Mr. Cecil, as a preacher, were immense: his talents were eminent; his eloquence was impassioned, yet solemn, and sometimes argumentative. As a Christian, he was habitually spiritually minded: modest and unassuming, he never intruded his capacities on the attention of mankind. He was contented with doing good, and getting good; and his works, though few, are valuable for their sterling sense and genuine piety. No Christian student, or Christian minister, or private Christian, should be without "Cecil's Remains." Few men have ever been so beloved by their friends, or respected by the world, as Mr. Cecil; and his Letters, Essays, Sermons, and Remains, cannot but be perused with feelings of interest, by all who can estimate the value of a good man, and the excellence of sincere and unaffected piety. See Memoirs of Rev. Mr. Cecil; prefixed to his works, collected and revised by Josiah Pratt, B. D.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

CECILIA; a young lady of a good family in Roue, was married to a gentleman named Valerian. Being a Christian herself, she soon persuaded her husband to embrace the same faith; and his conversion was speedily followed by that of his brother Tiburtius. These things drew upon them all, the vengeance of the civil magistrate: the two brothers were beheaded; and the officer who led them to execution, becoming their convert, suffered the same fate. Cecilia being apprehended was put to death by being placed naked, in a scalding bath, where having continued a considerable time, her head was struck off with a sword, A. D. 222.—Fur.

CEDAR TREE. The cedar is a large and noble evergreen tree. Its lofty height, and its far-extended branches, afford spacious shelter and shade, Ezek. 31: 3, 6, 8. The wood is very valuable; is of a reddish color, of an aromatic smell, and reputed incorruptible. This is owing to its bitter taste, which the worms cannot endure, and to its resin, which preserves it from the injuries of the weather. The ark of the covenant, and much of the temple of Solomon, and that of Diana at Ephesus, were built of cedar. The tree is much celebrated in Scripture. It is called, "the glory of Lebanon," Isa. 40: 13. On that mountain it must in former times have flourished in great abundance. There are some cedars still growing there which are prodigiously large. But the travellers who have visited the place within these two or three centuries, and who describe trees of vast size, inform us that their number is diminished greatly; so that, as Isaiah says, "a child may number them," Isa. 37: 36. Maundrell measured one of the largest size, and found it to be twelve yards and six inches in girth, and yet sound; and thirty-seven yards in the spread of its boughs. Gabriel Sionita, a very learned Syrian Maronite, who assisted in editing the Paris Polyglot, a man worthy of all credit, thus describes the cedars of mount Lebanon, which he had examined on the spot: "The cedar grows on the most elevated part of the mountain, is taller than the pine, and so thick, that five men together could scarcely encompass one. It shoots out its branches at ten or twelve feet from the ground: they are large and distant from each other, and are perpetually green. The wood is of a brown color, very solid and incorruptible, if preserved from wet. The tree bears a small cone like that of the pine."—Watson.

CEDRON, or KIDRON; so called from Kedar, black, dark, gloomy. This was the memorable brook, into which Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah cast the ashes of the accursed things used in idolatrous worship, (2 Chron. 15: 16. 30: 14. 2 Kings 23: 1—4;) which David crossed barefoot, and weeping, when fleeing from Absalom, (2 Sam. 15: 30;) and over which the great Redeemer passed, to enter the garden of Gethsemane, the night before his sufferings and death. Here, indeed, Jesus often walked, for he loved the sacred haunts of that hallowed ground, where he knew his last agony, in the conflicts with Satan, was to take place. John 18: 1, 2. See JERUSALEM.

"Here," says Dr. Hawker, "would my soul take frequent wing, and, by faith alight near the hallowed spot. And if Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples, here, methinks, would my soul delight to roam and see the place, and the memorable brook Jesus drank of by the way." Ps. 110: 7. See GETHSEMANE.—Hawker's Concordance.

CELESTINS; a religious order, so called from their founder Peter de Meuron, afterwards raised to the pontificate under the name of Celestin V.

This Peter, who was born at Isernia, a little town in the kingdom of Naples, in the year 1215, of but mean parents, retired very young to a solitary mountain, in order to dedicate himself wholly to prayer and mortification. The fame of his piety brought several, out of curiosity, to see him; some of whom, charmed with his virtues, renounced the world, to accompany him in his solitude. With these he formed a kind of community, in the year 1254; which was approved by pope Urban IV., in 1264, and erected into a distinct order, called the Hermits of St. Damien.

Peter de Meuron governed this order till 1286, when his love of solitude and retirement induced him to quit the charge. In July, 1294, the great reputation of his sanctity raised him, though much against his will, to the pontificate. He then took the name of Celestin V., and his order that of Celestins, from him. By his bull he approved their constitutions, and confirmed all their monasteries, which were to the number of twenty. But he sat too short a time in the chair of St. Peter to do many great things for his order; for, having governed the church five months and a few days, and considering the great burthen he had taken upon him, to which he thought himself unequal, he solemnly renounced the pontificate, in a consistory held at Naples.

After his death, which happened in 1296, his order made great progress, not only in Italy, but in France likewise; whither the then general Peter of Tivoli sent twelve religious, at the request of king Philip the Fair, who gave them two monasteries—one in the forest of Orleans; and the other in the forest of Compeigne, at mount Chartres. This order likewise passed into several provinces of Germany. They have about ninety-six convents in Italy, and twenty-one in France, under the title of priories. The Celestins of the province of France have the privilege, by a grant of the popes Martin V. and Clement VII., of making new statutes whenever they think proper, for the regulation of their order. By virtue of this power, they drew up new constitutions, which were received in a provincial chapter in 1667. They are divided into three parts:—the first treats of the provincial chapters, and the elections of superiors; the second contains the regular observances; and the third the visitation and correction of the monks.

The Celestins rise two hours after midnight, to say matins. They eat no flesh at any time, except when they are sick. They fast every Wednesday and Friday, from Easter to the feast of the exaltation of the holy cross; and, from that feast to Easter, every day. As to their habit, it consists of a white gown, a capuche, and a black scapulary. In the choir, and when they go out of the monastery, they wear a black cowl with the capuche: their shirts are of serge.

Celestins, likewise, is the name given to certain hermits, who, during the short pontificate of Celestin V., obtained of the pope permission to quit the order of Friars Minors, to which they belonged, and retire into solitude, there to practise the rule of St. Francis, in its utmost strictness. The superiors, being disgusted at this separation, took all methods to reduce these hermits to the obedience of the order; to avoid which persecution, they retired into Greece, and continued some time in an island of Achaia. But pope Boniface VIII., who succeeded Celestin, being imperturbed by the order of Friars Minors, revoked the grant of his predecessor, and ordered the Celestin hermits to return to the obedience of their superiors. Accordingly, Thomas Sola, lord of the island where they had fixed, drove them out; and this he did in a time of famine, by which these poor religious were exposed to great misery and want in their journeys, especially as they passed through the countries of the Latins, who looked upon them as schismatics. They were something better treated in the countries of the Greeks, among whom they continued for two years unmolested; but the patriarch of Constantinople, being returned from Venice, excommunicated them twice, because they did not submit to their superiors; nevertheless, these solitaries did not want for protectors; and the archbishop of Patras particularly interested himself in their cause.

Brother James du Mont, one of these hermits, returning from Armenia, where he had resided some time, without knowing what had passed in relation to his brethren, came into Italy, and made his submission to the general, who soon after sent him on a mission to the East. Being arrived at Negropont, and hearing of the persecution raised against the Celestine hermits, he endeavored to accommodate matters, and managed the affair with so much prudence, that the fathers of Romania consented that all these hermits should acknowledge him as their superior, under the dependence of the general. This the general would not consent to; which obliged brother Liberatus and his companions to come into Italy, and represent to the pope, that he and his brethren had been always faithful to the church, and that all the accusations against them were mere calumnies.

A chapter general, held at Toulouse, in 1307, obtained an order from Charles II., king of Naples, to the inquisitor of that state, to act against brother Liberatus and his companions. Accordingly, the inquisitor examined them, and declared them innocent; at the same time advising them to retire to Anciano, where he granted them his protection against the pursuits of their enemies. But afterwards, being gained over by their enemies, he cited them a second time before him, and found a pretence to condemn them as heretics and schismatics. In consequence of which sentence they were first imprisoned, and then banished.—Hend. Buck.

CELIBACY; the state of unmarried persons. Celibate, or celibacy, is a word chiefly used in speaking of the single life of the popish clergy, or the obligations they are under to abstain from marriage. The church of Rome imposes a universal celibacy on all her clergy, from the pope to the lowest deacon and subdeacon. The advocates for this usage pretend that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient church as a condition of ordination, even from the earliest apostolic ages. But the contrary is evident from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony, without any prejudice to their ordination or their function. Neither our Lord nor his apostles laid the least restraint upon the connubial union—on the contrary, the Scriptures speak of it as honorable in all, without the least restriction as to persons. Heb. 13: 4. Matt. 19: 10, 12. 1 Cor. 7: 2, 9. Paul even assigns forbidding to marry as characteristic of the apostasy of the latter times. 1 Tim. 4: 3. The fathers, without making any distinction between clergy and laity, asserted the lawfulness of the marriage of all Christians. Marriage was not forbidden to bishops in the Eastern church till the close of the seventh century. Celibacy was not imposed on the Western clergy in general till the end of the eleventh century, though attempts had been made long before. Superstitious zeal for a sanctimonious appearance in the clergy seems to have promoted it at first; and crafty policy, armed with power, no doubt riveted this clog on the sacerdotal order in later periods of the church. Pope Gregory VII. appears in this business to have had a view to separate the clergy as much as possible from all other interests, and to bring them into a total dependence upon his authority; to the end that all temporal power might, in a high degree, be subjugated to the papal jurisdiction. Forbidding to marry, therefore, has evidently the mark of the beast upon it. SEE MARRIAGE.—Hend. Buck.

CELLITES, or "Brethren and Sisters of St. Alexius;" pious Christians, who, in the early part of the fourteenth century, when the clergy were shamefully negligent in their religious duties, supplied their "lack of service" by visiting the sick and attending funerals. (SEE LOLLARDS.) They received the name of Cellites, from the retired manner in which they lived in cells, and sequestered from the world, though they did not (like the monks) spend their time in religious idleness. (SEE Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. p. 357, Note; Haweis's Ch. Hist. vol. ii. p. 302.)—Williams.

CELSUS; a philosopher of the second century, and of the Epicurean school, who composed a book against Christianity, to which he gave the title of Alethes logos, which Origen, in his refutation of it, has, to a considerable extent, rescued from oblivion. It is invaluable, on account of the admissions of the grand facts and doctrines of the gospel, as preached by the apostles, and contained in their writings, by an enemy, who lived little more than one hundred and thirty years after the ascension of our Lord. He has nearly eighty quotations from the books of the New Testament, which he not only appeals to as existing, but as universally received by the Christians of that age as credible and divine. He is most minute in his references to the circumstances of the life of Christ and his apostles, which shows that he was well acquainted with them, and that no one denied them. He every where ridicules the idea of our Lord's divinity, contrasting with it that of his poverty, sufferings, and death; which proves not only that the Christians of that early age avowed their belief in the doctrine, but that Celsus himself, though an unbeliever, found it in the documents to which he refers, as the source of his acquaintance with the Christian system. "Did your God, when under punishment," he asks, "say any thing like this?" "You will have him to be God," he insists, "who eaded an infamous life with a miserable death." "If," he proceeds, "he thought fit to undergo such things; and if, in obedience to the Father, he suffered death, it is apparent they could not be painful and grievous to him, he being a God, and consenting to them," &c. See LARDNER, and ORIGEN, con. Cels.—Hand. Buch.

CEMETERY; a place set apart for the burial of the dead. Anciently, none were buried in churches or churchyards; it was even unlawful to inter in cities, and the cemeteries were without the walls. Among the primitive Christians, these were held in great veneration. It even appears from Eusebius and Tertullian, that in the early ages they assembled for divine worship in the cemeteries. Valerian seems to have confiscated the cemeteries and other places of divine worship; but they were restored again by Gallienus. As the martyrs were buried in these places, the Christians chose them for building churches on, when Constantine established their religion; and hence some derive the rule which still obtains in the church of Rome, never to consecrate an altar without putting under it the relics of some saint.—Hand. Buch.

CENCHREA; a seaport belonging to the city of Corinth, in the Archipelago. Though situated on the Saronic gulf at the distance of nine miles from the city, it was nevertheless considered to be a part of its suburbs. When Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, there seems to have been a Christian church planted in it, independent of that which existed in the city of Corinth, for in Rom. 16: 1, he recommends to their Christian regard at Rome, Phœbe, a deaconess of the church which is in Cenchrea. The apostle embarked from this port on his voyage to Jerusalem, having his hair cut off at Cenchrea in compliance with a vow that he had made. Acts 18: 18.—Jones.

CENSER; a vessel in which fire and incense were carried in certain parts of the Hebrew worship. It appears from numerous instances, that the services of divine worship, under the Mosaic dispensation, resembled those usually addressed to monarchs and sovereigns among the Orientals; and there can be little doubt, that the Hebrews directed them to a person understood to be resident in the sanctuary, before which, and in which, they were performed. This notion of Jewish services was so strong among the heathen, that we find they reported the object of worship in the temple at Jerusalem to be an old man with a long beard. That report might possibly originate in the description of the Ancient of days, by the prophet Daniel. However that might be, it is generally concluded that the attendants on the temple were nearly similar to the attendants on royalty and dignity in general; and many external acts of worship were of the same appearance and import. We have no custom of burning perfumes, as a mode of doing honor; and though the church of Rome has adopted the use of the censer, and fumigation, it is as a part of sacred worship, not of civil gratulation. On the contrary, in the East, fumigation forms a part of civil entertainment, and is never omitted when it is intended to compliment a guest. Being thus general, and indeed indispensable, in Asiatic manners, it was received anciently into divine worship; and the priests in their ordinary service, as well as the high-priest in the most solemn acts of his public administration, used incense—a cloud of incense, in approaching to the more immediate presence of God.

In Lev. 16: 12, we find Aaron directed "to take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and to bring it within the veil, and to put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, so that the cloud of the incense might cover the mercy seat, which was over the ark of the testimony." The apostle in Heb. 9: 4, speaks of the golden censer as a thing which belonged to the tabernacle. It has been observed that the original word thumiatieron, which we translate "a censer," may as well be rendered "the altar of incense," which was all overlaid with beaten gold, and was one of the most important vessels of the tabernacle. The high-priest was not allowed to enter the most holy place, nor to perform any service in it, without first taking incense with him, which he was to bring in a censer from this altar. "The manner of the service of this altar," says Dr. Owen, "was briefly thus: The high-priest, once a year, namely, on the solemn day of expiation, took a golden censer from this altar: after which, going out of the sanctuary, he put fire into it, taken from the altar of burnt-offerings, without the tabernacle, in the court where the perpetual fire was preserved. Then returning into the holy place, he filled his hands with incense taken from this altar, the place of the residence of the spices; which incense he put upon the fire in the censer, and so entered the holy place with a cloud of the smoke thereof." (Exposition on Heb. 9: 4.) See INCENSE.

Little is known on the form and nature of the ancient Hebrew censer. What censers have been received from heathen antiquity, and those used in the Romish worship also, being suspended by chains, they give, not unfrequently, erroneous ideas of this sacred utensil, as employed among the Jews. The Hebrew has two words, both rendered censer in our translation. The first, (mekateh, or mechatet), describes the censers of Aaron, and of Korah and his company, Lev. 10: 1. Num. 16: 6.

From 2 Chron. 26: 19, we learn that king Uzziah attempted to "burn incense in the house of the Lord, having a censer in his hand." The word is different from the former, (mekatheret), and seems to import an implement of another shape. It deserves notice, that those who used these mekatheret, are described as holding them in their hands: but this position is not, that we recollect, ascribed to the mekateh, or censer of Aaron. This leads to the conclusion, that the mekatheret may be considered as a kind of censer, carried in the hand; not alone, as the heat arising from the burning incense it contained would be disagreeably great, but in a kind of dish, which dish, with the censer in it, was placed on the altar of incense, and there left, diffusing a smoke, morning and evening, during the trimming of the lamps, &c. Ex. 30: 7, 8. Apparently, this was regarded as an inferior kind of censer, appropriate to the priests, and common to them all; but whether the other kind (the mekateh) was peculiar to the high-priest, is not clear: we find it used by the sons of Aaron, (Lev. 10: 1.) but that was an irregularity, and was punished as such. It is mentioned, also, as being employed by two hundred and fifty of the associates of Korah; but that was in rebellion, and proved fatal to the transgressors.

A similar distinction of censers is observed in the New Testament; for the twenty-four elders (Rev. 5: 8.) had golden vials full of odors;—but (chap. 8: 2.) the angel had a golden censer. These vials were not small bottles, such as we call vials; which idea arises instantly by association in our minds; but they were of the nature of the censers and dishes, above spoken of, (compared by Doddridge to a tea-cup and saucer.) This gives a very different idea to chap. 15: 8. 16: 1. &c. of the same book, where the vials having the wrath of God, are poured out; for if they contained fire, that is a fit emblem of wrath; and burning embers may be described as poured out from a censer, with great propriety. Nothing can be more apparent, if we suppose, for instance, the covering of the censer to be wholly removed; in which state the bowl of it, perhaps, may be that described by the Apocalyptic writer as a vial; and it might conveniently contain the fire to be poured out from it. This is perfectly agreeable to its form and services as a censer, and to the nature and use of the ancient mekatheret.

We ought also to remark, that bearing censers is an office of servants, in attendance on their superiors;—the same office anciently, in the temple, no doubt, denoted waiting on the Deity—being occupied in his service—in attendance on him. This action, therefore, demonstrates the devotedness to false gods, of those who worshipped them, by bearing censers to honor their images: especially, when it is recollected, that offering incense was connected with addresses and prayers.—Calmet; Jones.

CENSURE; the act of judging and blaming others for their faults. Faithfulness in reproving another differs from censoriousness: the former arises from love to truth, and respect for the person; the latter is a disposition that loves to find fault. However just censure may be where there is blame, yet a censorious spirit, or rash judging, must be avoided. It is usurping the authority and judgment of God. It is unjust, uncharitable, mischievous, productive of unhappiness to ourselves, and often the cause of disorder and confusion in society. See, РАШ СУДИТИЕ.—Hend. Durk.

CENTURIES OF MAGDEBURG; the first comprehensive work of the Protestants on church history, and so called because it was divided into centuries, each volume containing a hundred years, and was first written at Magdeburg. Matthias Flaccius formed the plan of it in 1532, in order to prove the agreement of the Lutheran doctrine with that of the primitive Christians, and the difference between the latter and that of the Catholics. John Wigand, Matth. Juxey, Basil Faber, Andrew Corvins, and Thomas Holzner, were, after Flaccius, the chief writers and editors. Some Lutheran princes and noblemen patronized it, and many learned men assisted in the work, which was drawn with great care and fidelity, from the original sources, compiled with sound judgment, and written in Latin. It was continued by the centuriatores, as the editors were called, only to the year 1300; and was published at Basle, 1559—1574, in thirteen volumes, folio. A modern edition by Baumgarten and Semler, but which reaches only to the year 500, appeared at Nuremberg, 1757—1765, in six volumes, quarto. A good abridgment was prepared by Lucas Osiander; the Tubingen edition of which (1607—1608) comprehends the period from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century. The Catholics, finding themselves attacked in this alarming way, and confuted by matters of fact, Baronius wrote his Annals, in opposition to the Centurie.—Ency. Amer.; Hend. Buck.

CENTURION; an officer commanding a hundred soldiers, similar to our captain in modern times. In the Old Testament, chief of a hundred men.—Calmet.

CEPHAS; a name given to Peter, which by the Greeks was rendered Petros, and by the Latins Petrus, both signifying a stone, or small rock. See PETER.—Calmet.

CERASTES; a serpent so called, because it has horns on its forehead. It hides in the sand, is of a sandy color, crawls slanting on its side, and seems to hiss when in motion. The word occurs only in Gen. 49: 17. "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, a cerastes (in the English text adder, in the margin arrow-snake, that is, the dart-snake, or jaculus) in the path." The Hebrew shephiphon is by some interpreted asp, by others basilisk; but Bochart prefers the cerastes. See ADDER.—Calmet.

CERDONIANS; a sect in the first century, so called from Cerdon, who flourished 140 or 141, and came to Rome from Syria. His disciples espoused most of the opinions of Simon Magus and the Manichæans. They asserted two principles, good and bad. The first they called the Father of Jesus Christ; the latter the Creator of the world. They denied the incarnation and the resurrection, and rejected the books of the Old Testament.—Hend. Buck.

CEREMONIAL LAW. See LAW.

CEREMONY; an assemblage of several actions, forms, and circumstances, serving to render a thing magnificent and solemn. Applied to religious observances, it signifies the external rites and manner wherein the ministers of religion perform their sacred functions. In 1646, M. Ponce published a history of ancient ceremonies, tracing the rise, growth, and introduction of each rite into the church, and its gradual advancement to superstition. Many of them were borrowed from Judaism, but more from paganism. Dr. Middleton has given a fine discourse on the conformity between the pagan and popish ceremonies, which he exemplifies in the use of incense, holy water, lamps and candles before the shrines of saints, votive gifts round the shrines of the deceased, &c. In fact, the altars, images, crosses, processions, miracles, and legends, nay, even the very hierarchy, pontificate, religious orders, &c. of the present Romans, he shows, are all copied from their heathen ancestors. An ample and magnificent representation in figures of the religious ceremonies and customs of all nations in the world, designed by Picart, is added, with historical explanations, and many curious dissertations.

It has been a question, whether we ought to use such rites and ceremonies, which are merely of human appointment. On the one side it has been observed, that the desire of reducing religious worship to the greatest possible simplicity, however rational it may appear in itself, and abstractedly considered, will be considerably moderated in such as bestow a moment's attention upon the imperfection and infirmities of human nature in its present state. Mankind, generally speaking, have too little elevation of mind to be much affected with those forms and methods of worship in which there is nothing striking to the outward senses. The great difficulty here lies in determining the length which it is prudent to go in the accommodation of religious ceremonies to human infirmity; and the grand point is to fix a medium in which a due regard may be shown to the senses and imagination, without violating the dictates of right reason, or tarnishing the purity of true religion. It has been said, that the Romish church has gone too far in its condescension to the infirmities of mankind; and this is what the ablest defenders of its motley worship have alleged in its behalf. But this observation is not just; the church of Rome has not so much accommodated itself to human weakness, as it has abused that weakness, by taking occasion from it to establish an endless variety of ridiculous ceremonies, destructive of true religion, and only adapted to promote the riches and despotism of the clergy, and to keep the multitude still hoodwinked in their ignorance and superstition. How far a just antipathy to the church puppet-shows of the Papists has unjustly driven some Protestant churches into the opposite extreme, is a matter that certainly deserves a serious consideration.

On the other side it has been observed, that Christ alone is king in his church; he hath instituted such ordinances and forms of worship as he hath judged fit and necessary; and to add to them seems, at least, to carry in it an imputation on his wisdom and authority, and hath this unanswerable objection to it, that it opens the door to a thousand innovations (as the history of the church of Rome hath sufficiently shown), which are not only indifferent in themselves, but highly absurd, and extremely detrimental to religion. That the ceremonies were numerous under the Old Testament dispensation, is not argument; for, say they, 1. We respect Jewish ceremonies, because they were appointed of God; and we reject human ceremonies because God hath not appointed them. 2. The Jewish ceremonies were established by the universal consent of the nation; human ceremonies are not so. 3. The former were fit and proper for the purposes for which they were appointed; but the latter are often the contrary. 4. The institutor of the Jewish ceremonies provided for the expense of it; but no provision is made by God to support human ceremonies, or what he has not appointed. See Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. with McLane's Note, vol. 1. p. 203. quarto edition; Jones's Works, vol. iv. p. 267; Dr. Stennett's Ser. on Conformity to the World; Robinson's Ser. on Ceremonies; Booth's Essay on the Kingdom of Christ.—Hend. Buck.

CERINTHUS; one of the earliest heretics, by birth a Jew, who, after having studied philosophy in Egypt, went into Asia Minor, where he disseminated his erroneous doctrines. Various opinions have obtained respecting the time at which he flourished, but it is now pretty generally agreed, that it must have been in the first century. Waterland, Michaelis, and others, are decided in their conviction, that the apostle John wrote to confute his heresy; and, indeed, it seems impossible to entertain a doubt on the subject, considering the direct bearing of many passages of his writings on the principles of which it consisted; and especially the express declaration of Irenæus, who was well acquainted with Polycarp, that "John wished, by the publication of his Gospel, to remove the error which had been sown in men's minds by Cerinthus." Some have asserted that he was one of the Judaizers referred to in the New Testament; but without sufficient foundation. He was a Gnostic in his notion of the creation of the world, which he conceived to have been formed by angels; and his attachment to that philosophy may explain what otherwise seems inconsistent, that he retained some of the Mosaic ceremonies, such as the observance of Sabbaths and circumcision, though, like other Gnostics, he ascribed the law and the prophets to the angel who created the world. What gave most eminence to his name was the fresh change which he introduced in the notion concerning Christ, while the Gnostics had all of them been Docetæ; Cerinthus maintained that Jesus had a real body, but that he was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary. In other points he agreed with the Gnostics, and believed that Christ was one of the Æons who descended on Jesus at his baptism. The notion of Jesus being born of human parents was taught by him with precision, and not without success. He is also regarded as the first person who held the doctrine of a mundane millennium, and is said to have promised his followers the grossest pleasures, and the most sensual gratifications. It is likely that it is to this part of his views that we are to ascribe the opinion which he maintained, contrary to the generality of the Gnostics, that Christ had not yet risen, but that he would rise hereafter viz. at the period of the millennium. It is not improbable that Paul is combating this very heresy in the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians. If he received any part of the New Testament, it is likely it was the Gospel of Matthew, and that not in its pure state, but as it existed kath' Hebraïous.

According to Irenæus, "there were some who had heard Polycarp tell that John the disciple of our Lord, being at Ephesus, and going to bathe, and seeing Cerinthus in the place, hurried out of the bath without bathing, and added, Let us flee, lest even the bath should fall to pieces, while Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, is in it." Theodoret and Epiphanius relate the same story, which has nevertheless been questioned by Lampe and Oeder; but it is credited by Mosheim and other eminent moderns. Jerome is stated to have added that, according to Irenæus, the bath actually fell; but no such passage is to be found in the works of Jerome.—Hend. Buck.

CERINTHIANs; the followers of Cerinthus.
CÆSAR, the name assumed by, or conferred upon, all the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar. In the New Testament, the reigning emperor is generally called Cæsar, omitting any other name which might belong to him. Christ calls the emperor Tiberius simply Cæsar, (Matt. 22: 21.) and Paul thus mentions Nero, "I appeal to Cæsar."—Calmet.

CÆSAREA, in Palestine, formerly called Strato's Tower, was situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, and had a fine harbor. It is reckoned to be thirty-six miles south of Acre, thirty north of Jaffa, and sixty-two north-west of Jerusalem. Cæsaræa is often mentioned in the New Testament. Here king Agrippa was smitten, for neglecting to give God the glory, when flattered by the people. Cornelius the centurion, who was baptized by Peter, resided here, Acts 16. At Cæsaræa, the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul, that he would be bound at Jerusalem, Acts 21: 10, 11. Paul continued two years prisoner at Cæsaræa, till he could be conveniently conducted to Rome, because he had appealed to Nero. Whenever Cæsaræa is named, as a city of Palestine, without the addition of Philippi, we suppose this Cæsaræa to be meant.

Dr. Clarke did not visit Cæsaræa; but viewing it from off the coast, he says, "By day-break the next morning we were off the coast of Cæsaræa; and so near with the land that we could very distinctly perceive the appearance of its numerous and extensive ruins. The remains of this city, although still considerable, have long been resorted to as a quarry, whenever building materials are required at Acre. Djeddar Pasha brought from thence the columns of rare and beautiful marble, as well as the other ornaments of his palace, bath, fountain, and mosque at Acre. The place at present is only inhabited by jackals and beasts of prey. As we were becalmed during the night, we heard the cries of these animals until day-break. Pocke mentions the curious fact of the existence of crocodiles in the river of Cæsaræa. Perhaps there has not been in the history of the world an example of any city, that in so short a space of time rose to such an extraordinary height of splendor as did this of Cæsaræa, or that exhibits a more awful contrast to its former magnificence, by the present desolate appearance of its ruins. Not a single inhabitant remains. Its theatres, once resounding with the shouts of multitudes, echo no other sound than the nightly cries of animals roaming for their prey. Of its gorgeous palaces and temples, enriched with the choicest works of art, and decorated with the most precious marbles, scarcely a trace can be discerned. Within the space of ten years after laying the foundation, from an obscure fortress, it became the most celebrated and flourishing city of all Syria. It was named Cæsaræa by Herod, in honor of Augustus, and dedicated by him to that emperor, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign. Upon this occasion, that the ceremony might be rendered illustrious, by a degree of profusion unknown in any former instance, Herod assembled the most skillful musicians and gladiators from all parts of the world. The solemnity was to be renewed every fifth year. But, as we viewed the ruins of this memorable city, every other circumstance respecting its history was absorbed in the consideration that we were actually beholding the very spot where the scholar of Tarsus, after two years' imprisonment, made that eloquent appeal, in the audience of the king of Judea, which must ever be remembered with piety and delight. In the history of the acts of the holy apostles, whether we regard the internal evidence of the narrative, or the interest excited by a story so wonderfully appealing to our passions and affections, there is nothing that we call to mind with fuller emotions of sublimity and satisfaction. 'In the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power,' the mighty advocate for the Christian faith had before reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, till the Roman governor, Felix, trembled as he spoke. Not all the oratory of Tertullus, nor the clamor of his numerous adversaries, not even the countenance of the most profligate of tyrants, availed against the firmness and intrepidity of the oracle of God. The judge had trembled before his prisoner; and now a second occasion offered, in which, for the admiration and triumph of the Christian world, one of its bitterest persecutors, and a Jew, appeals, in the public tribunal of a large and populous city, to all its chiefs and its rulers, its governor and its king, for the truth of his conversion, founded on the highest evidence, delivered in the most fair, open, and illustrious manner."

Cæsaræa Palestina was inhabited by Jews, heathen, and Samaritans; hence parts of it were esteemed unclean by the Jews; some of whom would not pass over certain places; others, however, were less scrupulous. Perpetual contests were maintained between the Jews and the Syrians, or the Greeks; in which many thousand persons were slain.

The Arab interpreter thinks this city was first named Hazor, Joshua 11: 1. Rabbi Abbn says, "Cæsaræa was the daughter of Edom; situated among things profane; she was a goad to Israel in the days of the Grecians; but the Ashmonean family overcame her." Herod the Great built the city to honor the name of Cæsar, and adorned it with most splendid houses. Over against the mouth of the haven, made by Herod, was the temple of Cæsar, on a rising ground, a superb structure; and in it a statue of Cæsar the emperor. Here was also a theatre, an amphitheatre, a forum, &c. all of white stone, &c. (Joseph. de Bell. lib. i. cap. 13.)

After he had finished rebuilding the town, Herod dedicated it to Augustus, and procured the most capable workmen to execute the medals struck on the occasion, so that these are of considerable elegance. The port was called Sebasteis, that is, Augustus. The city itself was made a colony by Vespasian, and is described on its medals as, COLONIA PRIMA FLAVIA AUGUSTA CÆSARÆA; Cæsaræa, the first colony of the Flavian (or Vespasian) family.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, (before called Paneas, and now Banias,) was situated at the foot of mount Paneus, near the springs of Jordan. It has been supposed, that its ancient name was Dan, or Laish; and that it was called Paneas by the Phœnicians only. Eusebius, however, distinguishes Dan and Paneas as different places. Cæsarea was a day's journey from Sidon, and a day and a half from Damascus. Philip the tetrarch built it, or, at least, embellished and enlarged it, and named it Cæsarea, in honor of the emperor Tiberius; but afterwards, in compliment to Nero, it was called Neronias. The woman who had been troubled with an issue of blood, and was healed by our Savior, (Matt. 9: 20. Luke 7: 43.) is said to have been of Cæsarea Philippi, and to have returned thither after her cure, and erected a statue to her benefactor. The present town contains, according to Burckhardt, about one hundred and fifty houses, inhabited mostly by Turks. The goddess Astarte was worshipped here, as appears from the medals extant. The Greek language was more used in this city than the Latin; yet it struck medals in each language. It seems to have been made a Roman colony, though not mentioned as such by any writer. It is likely that Cæsarea Libanus was among the most forward cities to compliment Severus, since several authors report that it was his birth-place. Lampridius even says, that he was named Alexander, because his mother was delivered of him in a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great, on a festival in honor of that hero, at which she had assisted with her husband. The editor of the Modern Traveller has industriously collected and judiciously compared the several notices of this place which are found in modern writers. Palestine, pp. 353—363.—Calmet.

CESTERTIANS; an order of monks, founded in the ninth century, by St. Robert, abbot of Molême, but, after some time, became so far relaxed in their discipline, that the founder himself forsook them, till ordered by the pope to return and resume his government.—Nightingale's Rel. Cer. p. 549; Williams.

CHAFF; the refuse of winnowed corn. The ungodly are represented as the chaff: a simile most forcible and appropriate. Whatever defence they may afford to the saints, who are the wheat, they are in themselves worthless and inconstant, easily driven about with false doctrines, and will ultimately be driven away by the blast of God's wrath, Psalm 1: 4. Matt. 3: 12, &c. False doctrines are called chaff; they are unproductive, and cannot abide the trial of the word and spirit of God, Jer. 23: 28.—Calmet.

CHAIN. With chains idols were fixed in their shrines, (Isa. 40: 19); and criminals in their prison or servitude, Jer. 52: 11. Pride is a chain which keeps men under its power; and by a discovery of it in their conduct, they use it as if ornamental to them. Psalm 73: 6. Chains of gold were worn as ornaments of the neck. Gen. 41: 42. God's law is a chain; it restrains from sinful liberty; is uneasy to corrupt men; and is a great ornament to the saints who obey it. Prov. 10: 9.—Brown.

CHALCEDONY; (chalkēdōn, Rev. 21: 19;) a precious stone. Arethas, who has written an account of Bithynia, says that it was so called from Chalcedon, a city of that country, opposite to Byzantium; and it was in color like a carbuncle. Some have supposed this also to be the stone translated "emerald," Exodus 28: 18.—Watson.

CHALDEA, or BABYLONIA; the country lying on both sides the Euphrates, of which Babylon was the capital; and extending southwards to the Persian gulf, and northwards into Mesopotamia, at least as far as Ur, which is called Ur of the Chaldees. This country had also the name of Shinar. See BABYLON.—Watson.

CHALDEANS; in a more extended sense, the inhabitants of Babylonia generally; but in a more correct and restricted sense, their priests and philosophers, who chiefly resided in that part of the country next to Arabia Deserta, and which was therefore called "the Land of the Chaldeans," and is said to have received its name from Chaled, the fourth son of Nahor. The Chaldeans (thus understood) were astronomers, astrologers, and soothsayers. They boast, like the Chinese of their extraordinary antiquity and early science, pretending to carry back their astronomical observations, according to Cicero, four hundred and seventy thousand years, or, according to Epigenes, in Pliny, seven hundred and twenty thousand years; which, even supposing their years to be only months, extend much farther back than the creation of our world: but no probable method of calculation will give them a higher antiquity than two thousand years before the Christian era, which was soon after the foundation of the Assyrian monarchy.

These Chaldeans were not only astronomers and astrologers, but in pursuance of the latter profession, were diviners and soothsayers, professing to predict events, to interpret dreams, and, in short, to all the science and learning of the East.—See Univ. Hist. vol. i. book i. ch. 9.—Calmet; Williams.

CHALDEAN PHILOSOPHY claims attention on account of its very high antiquity. The most ancient people, next to the Hebrews, among the eastern nations, who appear to have been acquainted with philosophy, in its more general sense, were the Chaldeans; for though the Egyptians have pretended that the Chaldeans were an Egyptian colony, and that they derived their learning from Egypt, there is reason to believe that the kingdom of Babylon, of which Chaldea was a part, flourished before the Egyptian monarchy; and that the Egyptians were rather indebted to the Chaldeans, than the Chaldeans to the Egyptians. Nevertheless, the accounts that have been transmitted to us by the Chaldeans themselves, of the antiquity of their learning, are blended with fable, and involved in considerable uncertainty. There are other circumstances, independently of the antiquity of the Chaldean philosophy, which render our knowledge of it imperfect and uncertain. We derive our acquaintance with it from other nations, and principally from the Greeks, whose vanity led them to despise and misrepresent the pretended learning of barbarous nations. The Chaldeans also adopted a symbolical mode of instruction, and transmitted their doctrines to posterity under a veil of obscurity, which it is not easy to remove. To all which, we may add that, about the commencement of the Christian era, a race of philosophers sprung up, who, with a view of gaining credit to their own wild and extravagant doctrines, passed them upon the world as the ancient wisdom of the Chaldeans and Persians, in spurious books, which they ascribed to Zoroaster, or some other eastern philosopher. Thus, the fictions of these impostors were confounded with the genuine dogmas of the ancient eastern nations. Notwithstanding these causes of uncertainty, which perplex the researches of modern inquirers into the distinguishing doctrines and character of the Chaldean philosophy, it appears probable that the philosophers of Chaldea were the priests of the Babylonian nation, who instructed the people in the principles of religion, interpreted its laws, and conducted its ceremonies. Their character was similar to that of the Persian magi, and they are often confounded with them by the Greek historians. Like the priests in most other nations, they employed religion in subserviency to the ruling powers, and made use of imposture to serve the purposes of civil policy. Accordingly, Diodorus Siculus relates, that they pretended to predict future events by divination, to explain prodigies, and interpret dreams, and to avert evils, or confer benefits, by means of augury and incantations. For many ages, they retained a principal place among diviners. In the reign of Marcus Antoninus, when the emperor and his army, who were perishing with thirst, were suddenly relieved by a shower, the prodigy was ascribed to the power and skill of the Chaldean soothsayers. Thus accredited for their miraculous powers, they maintained their consequence in the courts of princes. The principal instrument which they employed in support of their superstition, was astrology. The Chaldeans were probably the first people who made regular observations upon the heavenly bodies, and hence the appellation of Chaldean became afterwards synonymous with that of astronomer. Nevertheless, all their observations were applied to the sole purpose of establishing the credit of judicial astrology; and they employed their pretended skill in this art, in calculating natiivities, foretelling the weather, predicting good and bad fortune, and other practices usual with impostors of this class. While they taught the vulgar that all human affairs are influenced by the stars, and professed to be acquainted with the nature and laws of their influence, and consequently to possess a power of prying into futurity, they encouraged much idle superstition, and many fraudulent practices. Hence other professors of these mischievous arts were afterwards called Chaldeans, and the arts themselves were called Babylonian arts. Among the Romans, these impostors were so troublesome, that, during the time of the republic, it became necessary to issue an edict requiring the Chaldeans, or mathematicians, (by which latter appellation they were commonly known,) to depart from Rome and Italy within ten days; and, afterwards, under the emperors, these soothsayers were put under the most severe interdiction.

The Chaldean philosophy, notwithstanding the obscurity that has rendered it difficult of research, has been highly extolled, not only by the orientals and Greeks, but by Jewish and Christian writers: but upon recurring to authorities that are unquestionable, there seems to be little or nothing in this branch of the barbaric philosophy which deserves notice. The following brief detail will include the most interesting particulars. From the testimony of Diodorus, and also from other ancient authorities, collected by Eusebius, it appears, that the Chaldeans believed in God, the Lord and Parent of all, by whose providence the world is governed. From this principle sprung their religious rites, the immediate object of which was a supposed race of spiritual beings or demons, whose existence could not have been imagined, without first conceiving the idea of a supreme Being, the source of all intelligence. The belief of a supreme Deity, the fountain of all the divinities which were supposed to preside over the several parts of the material world, was the true origin of all religious worship, however idolatrous, not excepting even that which consisted in paying divine honors to the memory of dead men. Besides the supreme Being, the Chaldeans supposed spiritual beings to exist, of several orders; gods, demons, heroes: these they probably distributed into subordinate classes, agreeably to their practice of theurgy or magic. The Chaldeans, in common with the eastern nations in general, admitted the existence of certain evil spirits, clothed in a vehicle of grosser matter; and in subduing or counteracting these, they placed a great part of the efficacy of their religious incantations. These doctrines were the mysteries of the Chaldean religion, imparted only to the initiated. Their popular religion consisted in the worship of the sun, moon, planets, and stars, as divinities, after the general practice of the East, Job 31: 27. From the religious system of the Chaldeans were derived two arts, for which they were long celebrated; namely, magic and astrology. Their magic, which should not be confounded with witchcraft, or a supposed intercourse with evil spirits, consisted in the performance of certain religious ceremonies or incantations, which were supposed, by the interposition of good demons, to produce supernatural effects. Their astrology was founded upon the chimerical principle, that the stars have an influence, either beneficial or malignant, upon the affairs of men, which may be discovered, and made the certain ground of prediction, in particular cases; and the whole art consisted in applying astronomical observations to this fanciful purpose, and thus imposing upon the credulity of the vulgar.—Watson.

CHALDEAN PARAPHRASE, in the rabbinical style, is called Targum. There are three Chaldee paraphrases in Walton's Polyglot, viz. 1. of Onkelos; 2. of Jonathan, son of Uziel; 3. of Jerusalem; but there are seventeen in all.—Hend. Buck.

CHALICE; the cup used to administer the wine in the sacrament, and by the Roman Catholics in the mass. The use of the chalice, or communicating in both kinds, is by the church of Rome denied to the laity, who communicate only in one kind, the clergy alone being allowed the privilege of communicating in both kinds; in direct opposition to our Savior's words,—“Drink ye all of it.”—Hend. Buck.

CHAM; Egypt; but, whether so called from the patriarch Ham may be doubted, although the English translation says “land of Ham.” It denotes heat, heated; black, or sun-burnt, Psalm 105: 23—27; 106: 22. The heathen writers called this country Chemia, and the native Coptu at this day call it Chemi. See Egypt.—Calmet.

CHAMBER; an apartment of a house. Some were inner chambers, to which, one had to go through part of the house, and were more secret. 1 Kings 20: 30. Some were upper chambers, or garrets, where it seems they laid their dead, and where the Jews sometimes had idolatrous altars; and where the Christians, in the apostolic age, had often their meetings for worship. Acts 9: 37. 20: 8, and 1: 13. 2 Kings 23: 12. Some were for beds, others for entertaining guests, at the three solemn feasts or on other occasions.—Matt. 9: 15. 2 Kings 6: 12. Mark 9: 14. God's chambers are clouds, where he lays up his treasures of rain, snow, hail, wind; and where he mysteriously displays his wisdom and power. Psalm 104: 3—13. To apply ourselves to earnest prayer and supplication, and to depend on God's promises, perfections, and providence for special protection, is to enter into our chambers, that we may be safe, as the Hebrews were in their houses, from the destroying angel. Isa. 26: 20. The chambers of the south are the constellations or clusters of stars belonging to the southern part of the firmament, which are often hid from us, and whose appearance is ordinarily attended with storms. Job 9: 9.—Brown.

CHAMBERLAIN; (1.) a keeper of the king's bed-chamber; or a steward. Esth. 1: 10. (2.) City-treasurer. Rom. 16: 23.—Brown.

CHAMOIS. Our translators have evidently erred in inserting the chamois in Dent. 14: 5. The Hebrew word is tzamor, which the LXX render “Camelopardalis;” the Vulgate and the Arabic do the same, the latter rendering “Ziraffe.” The ziraffe, or giraffe, however, being a native of the torrid zone, and of southern Africa, it is equally unlikely that it should be abundant in Judea, and used as an article of food, as that the chamois which inhabits the chilly regions of mountains only, and seeks their most retired heights, to shelter it from the warmth of summer, preferring those cool retreats where snow and ice prevail, should be known among the population of Israel. We must yet wait for authorities to justify a conclusive opinion on this animal. The class of antelopes bids fairest to contain it.—Calmet.

CHANCEL; a particular part of the fabric of a church. Eusebius, describing that of Panlinus, says, “It was divided from the rest by certain rails of wood, curiously and artificially wrought in the form of net-work, to make it inaccessible to the multitude.” These rails the Latins call cancelli, whence comes the English word cancel.

The chancel in England is the rector's freehold, and part of his glebe, and therefore he is obliged to repair it; but where the rectory is inappropriate, the impropricator must do it.—Hend. Buck.

CHANCELLOR; a lay officer under a bishop, who is judge of his court. In the ages after Constantine, the bishop had those officers, who were called church lawyers, and were bred up in the knowledge of the civil and canon law: their business was to assist the bishop in his diocese.

We read of no chancellors in England during all the Saxon reigns, nor after the conquest, till the reign of Henry II., but that king requiring the attendance of the bishops in his councils of state, and other public affairs, it was thought necessary to substitute chancellors in their room for the despatch of those causes which were proper for their jurisdiction.

A bishop's chancellor hath his authority from the law; and his jurisdiction is not, like that of a commissary, limited to a certain place, and certain causes, but extended throughout the whole diocese, and to all ecclesiastical matters; not only for reformation of manners, in punishment of criminals, but in all cases concerning marriages, last wills, administrations, &c.—Hend. Buck.

CHANDLER, (DR. SAMUEL,) was born at Hungerford, in 1693. At an early age his genius and wonderful abilities were very conspicuous to his delighted and admiring friends. His father being a dissenting minister of great piety, young Chandler was early taught those lessons of religion, which afterwards, when in operation, threw such a radiance around him, as dimmed the lustre of his other rare and brilliant acquirements. His excellent and pious father, desirous that he should also proclaim tidings of peace and good-will towards men, placed him at a respectable academy at Bridgewater, where his moral and religious character would be attended to. There, however, he did not long remain, but was removed to Gloucester, and placed under the judicious guidance of Mr. Samuel Jones, a dissenting minister of very considerable attainments and sound judgment. Under that excellent individual, Chandler greatly improved his understanding; received serious and permanent impressions, as to the concerns of his everlasting welfare; studied attentively; read with seriousness; and, in a few years became alike a Christian, and a classical, biblical, and oriental scholar.

The time, however, at length arrived, when Mr. Chandler was compelled to leave the instructions and guidance of this excellent tutor, for the more trying duties of life. Then indeed he discovered, as he appreciated, the advantages of those acquirements and habits and principles, received while under his peculiar care: and in July, 1714, he entered on the important work of the Christian ministry. In 1716, he was chosen minister of the Presbyterian congregation at Peckham, near London. At that place his labors were useful and valuable. It was there he entered into the conjugal state, and was blessed with a numerous family; when his joys were damped, and his prospects in some degree blighted by the South sea scheme of 1720, in which he lost the whole of the fortune received with his wife. This unforeseen circumstance, united to the demands of a young family, and to the comparative smallness of the salary he received from his congregation, compelled him to engage in the trade of a bookseller; and he continued in that business for three years.

In the course of the year 1717, a weekly lecture was instituted at the Old Jewry, for the winter, which was to be delivered half a year, by two of the most eminent ministers of that day. Mr. Chandler and the famous Dr. Lardner were appointed. The subjects given to discuss were the evidences of natural and revealed religion; and they were required to answer the principal objections made to Christianity. Those sermons he afterwards enlarged, and published in the form of a treatise, in 1725, under the title of "A Vindication of the Christian Religion, in two parts; 1st, A Discourse of the Nature and Use of Miracles; and 2nd, An Answer to a late Book, entitled 'A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion.'" A copy of that work he forwarded to archbishop Wake, who eulogized it, in a letter to Mr. Chandler, in terms the most flattering and sincere. For this production Mr. Chandler gained considerable and deserved reputation; and in consequence of it, he was requested to become minister of the congregation in the Old Jewry. That invitation he accepted, and there continued to labor for forty-one years. Mr. Chandler was frequently requested to accept a diploma; but the honor, from modesty, he for a long time refused to accept. He, however, some time afterwards received it, being conferred on him with every mark of respect by the two universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. He was shortly afterwards elected F. R. S. and A. S. S.

In the year 1760, he preached and published a sermon on the death of George the Second, and in it compared that monarch with king David. This was speedily attacked by some enemies to Christianity, who ventured impudently to assert, that David and Nero were more similar, and, indeed, actually compared them. Conduct so wicked, Dr. Chandler determined to expose; and in the course of the next year, he published a "Review of the History of the Man after God's own heart;" and which was succeeded by a larger work, in two volumes octavo, under the following title, "A Critical History of the Life of King David; the chief objections of Mr. Bayle, and others, against the character of this Prince, wherein the Scriptural Account of Him, and the Occurrences of his Reign, are Examined and Refuted, and the Psalms which refer to him Explained." This work was justly regarded as far superior to all his other productions; and posterity has ratified the approbation of prior generations.

The health of Dr. Chandler now rapidly declined: he had long been the subject of a very painful disorder, which he bore with the piety and fortitude of a Christian, waiting to be released from a body, which incumbered a spirit of such dignity and purity. He expired on the eighth of May, 1766, at the advanced age of seventy-three, and was interred in Bunhill Fields burying-ground. His remains were attended by many eminent ministers, who, during his life, appreciated his merits, and at his death paid him those honors which his virtues and piety so justly deserved. Dr. Chandler was the first who established the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of poor Protestant dissenting ministers. His charities were as extensive as his income would admit, and as his domestic demands rendered prudent. See Life of Chandler.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

CHANGE. Antichrist changes times and laws, when he alters the constitutions and laws of Christ's church, and pretends to make things holy or profane as he pleases. Dan. 7: 25. Night is changed into day, when men can obtain no rest or sleep therein. Job 17: 12. Changes and war against men, denote afflictive alterations of their circumstances. Job 10: 17. Psalm 55: 19. Joshua the high-priest's change of raiment, does not merely denote the putting on a suit of fine clothes instead of his filthy ones, but the removal of sin, through the imputation of our Savior's finished obedience and suffering, and the qualifying of him to be a faithful high-priest. Zech. 3: 4. The living at the last day are changed, when their bodies are rendered immortal. 1 Cor. 15: 51.—Broten.

CHANT, is used for the vocal music of churches. In church history we meet with divers kinds of these; as, 1. Chant Ambrosian, established by St. Ambrose; 2. Chant Gregorian, introduced by pope Gregory the Great, who established schools of chanters, and corrected the church music. This, at first, was called the Roman song; afterwards the plain song, as the choir and people sing in unison.—Hend. Buck.

CHANTRY; a little chapel, or particular altar, in a cathedral church, built and endowed for the maintenance of a priest to sing masses, in order to release the soul of the donor out of purgatory. There were many of these in England before the reformation; and any man might build a chantry without the leave of the bishop. In the thirty-seventh year of Henry VIII. the chantries were given to the king, who had power to issue commissions to seize those endowments; but that being the last year of his reign, several chantries escaped being seized by virtue of those commissions; but they were afterwards vested in his successor, Edward VI.—Hend. Buck.

CHAOS; according to the signification of the word, the vast void, or the confused mass of elements, from which, in the opinion of certain ancient philosophers, the world was formed. In later times, the word is used to denote the unformed mass of primeval matter described in Gen. 1: 2, which was reduced to order and beauty by the power of the Creator.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPEL; a place of divine worship so called. The word is derived from the Latin capella. In former times, when the kings of France were engaged in war, they always carried St. Martin's hat into the field, which was kept in a tent as a precious relic; from whence the place was called capella, and the priests, who had the custody of the tent, capellani. Afterwards the word capella became applied to private oratories.

There are various kinds of chapels in Britain. 1. Domestic chapels, built by noblemen or gentlemen for private worship in their families. 2. Free chapels, such as are founded by kings of England. They are free from all episcopal jurisdiction, and only to be visited by the founder and his successors, which is done by the lord chancellor: yet the king may license any subject to build and endow a chapel, and by letters patent exempt it from the visitation of the ordinary. 3. Chapels in universities, belonging to particular universities. 4. Chapels of ease, built for the ease of one or more parishioners that dwell too far from the church, and are served by inferior curates, provided for at the charge of the rector, or of such as have benefit by it, as the composition or custom is. 5. Parochial chapels, which differ from parish churches only in name: they are generally small, and the inhabitants within the district few. If there be a presentation ad ecclesiam instead of capellam, and an admission and institution upon it, it is no longer a chapel, but a church for themselves and families. 6. Chapels which adjoin to and are part of the church: such were formerly built by honorable persons as burying places. 7. The places of worship used by the Methodists and Protestant dissenters, otherwise denominated meeting-houses, are now almost universally called chapels; with respect to which it is required by law, that they shall be certified in the court of quarter sessions, or to the bishop's court, when, on the payment of a small sum, the registration takes place. The doors are not permitted to be kept locked during the time of worship; and, to prevent the congregation from being disturbed, whoever molests it, or interrupts the worship, is, on conviction at the sessions, to forfeit twenty pounds by statute 1 of William and Mary.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPELS, UNION; places of worship in which the church of England service is performed in the morning, and the usual dissenting mode of worship is used in the evening. They were designed to unite persons of both parties: hence their name.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPTERS; ornaments on the tops of pillars, walls, &c., somewhat resembling a human head. Exod. 36: 38. 1 Kings 7: 16.

CHAPLAIN; a person who performs divine service in a chapel, or is retained in the service of some family to perform divine service.

The origin of the term is generally explained in the following manner:—Bishop Martin is said to have worn a hood (capa), which was regarded as possessing miraculous powers, and was, therefore, preserved after his death in a separate house, called, from this hood, capella (chapel), and the person stationed in the chapel to show it to superstitious spectators was termed chaplain. Charlemagne is reported to have possessed St. Martin's hood among the relics, and to have erected a chapel, called by the name of St. Martin, at the place in Germany where Fürth afterwards arose. He also built similar chapels at Nuremberg and Altenfurch. Another less probable derivation of the word deduces it indeed from capella, but explains it to signify the box in which the Romish missionaries carried the requisites for celebrating the mass, who were thence denominated chaplains.

According to a statute of Henry VIII. the persons vested with the power of retaining chaplains, together with the number each is allowed to qualify, are as follow:—an archbishop, eight; a duke, or bishop, six; marquis or earl, five; viscount, four; baron, knight of the garter, or lord chancellor, three; a duchess, marchioness, countess, baroness, the treasurer or comptroller of the king's house, clerk of the closet, the king's secretary, dean of the chapel, almoner, and master of the rolls, each of them two; chief justice of the king's bench, and warden of the cinque ports, each one. All these chaplains may purchase a license or dispensation, and take two benefices, with cure of souls. A chaplain must be retained by letters testimonial under hand and seal, for it is not sufficient that he serve as chaplain in the family.

In England, there are forty-eight chaplains to the king, who wait four each month, preach in the chapel, read the service to the family, and to the king in his private oratory, and say grace in the absence of the clerk of the closet. While in waiting, they have a table and attendance, but no salary. In Scotland, the king has six chaplains with a salary of fifty pounds each; three of them having, in addition, the deanery of the chapel royal divided between them, making up above one hundred pounds to each. Their only duty at present is to say prayers at the election of peers for Scotland to sit in parliament.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPLET; a certain instrument of monkish piety, made use of by the Roman Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and other eastern communions. It is a string of beads, by which they measure, or count, the number of their prayers. The invention of it is ascribed, by the historians of the crusades, to Peter the Hermit, who first taught those warriors to pray by tale. St. Dominic, founder of the Dominicans, greatly raised the credit of this devout instrument, by giving out that the blessed Virgin had brought him one from heaven. If Peter the Hermit first taught it the Roman Catholics, it is probable he himself borrowed it from the Turks, who to this day, make use of a chaplet, or strings of beads, in their prayers; and the Turks seem to have had it from the East Indians, who likewise make use of a kind of chaplet. It is also used by the Lamas.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPTER; from the Latin caput, head, signifies,—

1. One of the principal divisions of a book, and in reference to the Bible, one of the larger sections into which its books are divided. This division, as well as that consisting of verses, was introduced to facilitate reference, and not to indicate any natural or accurate division of the subjects treated in the books. The invention has been by some ascribed to Lanfranc, by others to Langton, both archbishops of Canterbury; but it is now pretty generally agreed that the real inventor was Hugo de St. Caro, or Cher, who lived in the thirteenth century, and wrote a commentary on the Scriptures, and first introduced it, when preparing a concordance of the Latin Vulgate.

2. A community of ecclesiastics belonging to a cathedral or collegiate church. The chief or head of the chapter is the dean: the body consists of canons or prebends. In England, as elsewhere, the deans and chapters had the right to choose the bishops; but Henry VIII. assumed this right as a prerogative of the crown. The chapter has now no longer a place in the administration of the diocese during the life of the bishop, but succeeds to the whole episcopal jurisdiction during the vacancy of the see. In Prussia, Protestant bishops have been lately elected, and still more recently an archbishop, without the vote of a chapter, by a mere order of government.—Hend. Buck.

CHAPTERS. The New Testament was early portioned out into certain divisions, which appear under various names. The custom of reading it publicly in the Christian assemblies after the law and the prophets, would soon cause such divisions to be applied to it. The law and the prophets were for this end already divided into parashim and haptarath, and the New Testament could not long remain without being treated in the same way. The distribution into church-lessons was indeed the oldest that took place in it. The Christian teachers gave the name of pericopes to the sections read as lessons by the Jews. Justin Martyr avails himself of this expression, when he quotes prophetic passages. Such is the case also in Clemens of Alexandria; but this writer also gives the name of perikopai to larger sections of the Gospels and St. Paul's Epistles. Pericopes therefore were nothing else but anagnōsmata, church-lessons, or sections of the New Testament, which were read in the assemblies after Moses and the prophets. In the third century, another division also into perikopai, or chapters, occurs. Dionysius of Alexandria speaks of them in reference to the Apocalypse, and the controversies respecting it. Some, says he, went through the whole book, from chapter to chapter, to show that it bore no sense. In the fifth century, Euthalius produced again a division into chapters, which was accounted his invention. He himself however lays claim to nothing more than having composed the summaries of the contents of the chapters in the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles.

Such in older times was the practice in Asia also; for Justin says, that the believers there assemble themselves for prayer and reading on Sunday only, en tē tou hēliou hēmera. Since then, the whole New Testament was distributed into so few sections, these must necessarily have been great, and a pericope in Euthalius sometimes includes in it four, five, and even six chapters.

Our present chapters come, as it is well known, from cardinal Hugo de St. Cher, who in the thirteenth century composed a concordance, and to this end distributed the Bible according to his own discretion into smaller portions. They are now moreover generally admitted in the editions of the Hebrew and Greek texts. The verses, however, are from Robert Stephens, who first introduced them in his edition of the New Testament, A. D. 1551. His son, Henry Stevens, was the first to record this for the information of posterity, in the preface to his Greek Concordance to the New Testament; in which he says, that two facts connected with it equally demand our admiration: "The first is, that my father, while travelling from Paris to Lyons, finished this division of each chapter into verses, and indeed the greater part of it (inter equitandum) in the course of his journey. The second fact is, that, a short time prior to this journey, while he had the matter still in contemplation, almost all those to whom he mentioned it told him plainly that he was an indiscreet man, as though he had a wish to spend his time and labor on an affair which would prove utterly useless, and which would not obtain for him any commendation, but on the contrary, would expose him to much ridicule. But behold the result: in opposition to the opinion which condemned and discountenanced my father's undertaking, as soon as his invention was published, every edition of the New Testament, whether in the Greek, Latin, French, German, or in any other language, which did not adopt it, was immediately discarded."—Watson.

CHAPTERS, THE THREE; an appellation given in the sixth century to the following productions:—The writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia. 2. The books which Theodore of Cyrus wrote against the twelve anathemas which Cyril had published against the Nestorians. 3. The letter which Ibas of Edessa had written concerning the council of Ephesus, and the condemnation of Nestorius. These writings being supposed to favor the Nestorian doctrine, Theodore, bishop of Cæsarea, who was a zealous Monophysite, prevailed on the emperor Justinian to publish an edict in the year 544, in which they were ordered to be condemned. This edict was opposed by the African and Western bishops, especially by Vigilius, the Roman pontiff; the consequence of which was that the pontiff was ordered to appear at Constantinople, where he first rejected, and then retracted his rejection of the chapters. They were afterwards condemned anew by Justinian.—Hend. Buck.

CHARGE: 1. A sermon preached by the bishop to his clergy. 2. Among Dissenters, it is a sermon preached, or an address delivered, to a minister at his ordination, generally by some aged or able preacher, and containing a view of the Christian ministry in its nature, duties, trials, and encouragements.—Hend. Buck.

CHARIOTS OF WAR. The Scripture speaks of two sorts of these chariots, one for princes and generals to ride in, the other used to break the enemy's battalions, by letting them loose armed with iron, which made dreadful havoc among the troops. The most ancient chariots of which we have any notice are Pharaoh's, which were overwhelmed in the Red sea, Exod. 14: 7. The Canaanites, whom Joshua engaged at the waters of Merom, had cavalry and a multitude of chariots, Josh. 11: 4. Sisera, the general of Jabin, king of Hazor, had nine hundred chariots of iron in his army, Judges 4: 3. The tribe of Judah could not get possession of all the lands of their lot, because the ancient inhabitants of the country were strong in chariots of iron. The Philistines, in the war carried on by them against Saul, had thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, 1 Sam. 13: 5. David, having taken one thousand chariots of war from Hadozer, king of Syria, hamstringed the horses, and burned nine hundred chariots, reserving only one hundred to himself, 2 Sam. 8: 4. Solomon had a considerable number of chariots, but we know of no military expedition in which they were employed, 1 Kings 10: 26. As Judea was a very mountainous country, chariots could be of no great use there, except in the plains; and the Hebrews often evaded them by fighting on the mountains. The kings of the Hebrews, when they went to war, were themselves generally mounted in chariots, from which they fought, and issued their orders; and there was always a second chariot empty, which followed each of them, that if the first was broken, he might ascend the other, 2 Chron. 34: 24. Chariots were sometimes consecrated to the sun; and the Scripture observes, that Josiah burned those which had been dedicated to the sun by his predecessors, 2 Kings 23: 11. This superstitious custom was borrowed from the heathens, and principally from the Persians.—Watson.

CHARITY; one of the three grand theological graces, consisting in the love of God and our neighbor, or the habit or disposition of loving God with all our heart, and our neighbor as ourselves. "Charity," says an able writer, "consists not in speculative ideas of general benevolence floating in the head, and leaving the heart, as speculations often do, untouched and cold; neither is it confined to that indolent good-nature which makes us rest satisfied with being free from inveterate malice, or ill will to our fellow-creatures, without prompting us to be of service to any. True charity is an active principle. It is not properly a single virtue, but a disposition residing in the heart as a fountain; whence all the virtues of benignity, candor, forbearance, generosity, compassion, and liberality, flow as so many native streams. From general goodwill to all, it extends its influence, particularly to those with whom we stand in nearest connexion, and who are directly within the sphere of our good offices. From the country or community to which we belong, it descends to the smaller associations of neighborhood, relations, and friends, and spreads itself over the whole circle of social and domestic life. I mean not that it imports a promiscuous undistinguishing affection which gives every man an equal title to our love. Charity, if we should endeavor to carry it so far, would be rendered an impracticable virtue, and would resolve itself into mere words, without affecting the heart. True charity attempts not to shut our eyes to the distinction between good and bad men; nor to warm our hearts equally to those who offend and those who injure us. It reserves our esteem for good men, and our complacency for our friends. Towards our enemies it inspires forgiveness and humanity. It breathes universal candor and liberality of sentiment. It forms gentleness of temper, and dictates affability of manners. It prompts corresponding sympathies with them who rejoice and them who weep. It teaches us to slight and despise no man. Charity is the comforter of the afflicted, the protector of the oppressed, the reconciler of differences, the intercessor for offenders. It is faithfulness in the friend, public spirit in the magistrate, equity and patience in the judge, moderation in the sovereign, and loyalty in the subject. In parents, it is care and attention; in children, it is reverence and submission. In a word, it is the soul of social life. It is the sun that enlivens and cheers the abodes of men; not a meteor which occasionally glares, but a luminary, which in its orderly and regular course dispenses a benignant influence."

Charity, considered as a Christian grace, ought in our translation, in order to avoid mistake, to have been translated love. It is the love of God, and the love of our neighbor flowing from the love of God, and is described with wonderful copiousness, felicity, and even grandeur, by St. Paul, (1 Cor. 13:) a portion of Scripture which, as it shows the habitual temper of a true Christian, cannot be too frequently referred to for self-examination, and ought to be constantly present to us as our rule. In the popular sense, charity is almsgiving; a duty of practical Christianity which is solemnly enjoined, and to which special promises are annexed. Buck*; Watson.

CHARLOTTE, (PRINCESS,) daughter of George IV., and heiress apparent to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland, was born 1795, and died Nov. 6, 1817, aged 22. She was married to Leopold, prince of Saxe-Coburg; and her untimely death in connexion with that of her infant child, clothed the nation in mourning, changed the succession of the throne, and drew forth, among other able funeral discourses, one by the Rev. Robert Hall, which is a master-piece of eloquence, probably never equalled on any similar occasion. When informed of the death of her child a little before her own, she said, "I feel it as a mother naturally should!"—adding, "It is the will of God! praise to Him in all things!" Mr. Hall mentions as traits of her character, "that she visited the abodes of the poor, and learned to weep with those who weep; that surrounded with the fascinations of pleasure, she was not inebriated by its charms; that she resisted the strongest temptations to pride, preserved her ears open to truth, was impatient of the voice of flattery: in a word, that she sought and cherished the inspirations of piety, and walked humbly with her God. This is fruit which survives when the flower withers—the only ornaments and treasures we can carry into eternity.”—Clusoid; Works of Robt. Hall, vol. i. 189.

CHARM; a kind of spell, supposed by the ignorant to have an irresistible influence, by means of the concurrence of some infernal power, both on the minds, lives, and properties of those whom it has for its object.

“Certain vain ceremonies,” says Dr. Doddridge, “which are commonly called charms, and seem to have no efficacy at all for producing the effects proposed by them, are to be avoided; seeing if there be indeed any real efficacy in them, it is generally probable they owe it to some bad cause; for one can hardly imagine that God should permit good angels in any extraordinary manner to interpose, or should immediately exert his own miraculous power on trifling occasions, and upon the performance of such idle tricks as are generally made the condition of receiving such benefits.” See DIVINATION.—Hend. Buck.

CHARNOCK, (STEPHEN, D. D.) was born in London, in the year 1628.—His father, Mr. Richard Charnock, was an eminent solicitor, descended from an ancient and respectable family in Lancashire. He received his earliest instructions from his father; and, when very young, he entered upon a course of preparatory studies in Emmanuel college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. William Sancroft. Whilst pursuing his literary studies at the university, his mind became enlightened, and his heart regenerated; and from that time to the end of his life, the consistency of his spirit and deportment, and the excellence of his general character, were evident to the world. On quitting that university, in the year celebrated for the commencement of the civil war between the unfortunate Charles and his parliament, Mr. Charnock commenced his labors as a Christian minister in Southwark, and was there, in the conversion of several persons, by means of his preaching, honored with that decisive evidence of his usefulness which encouraged him to persevere in his appointed course with renewed ardor and hope. Southwark, he, however, soon quitted for New college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship from the visitors appointed by parliament; and in the year 1652, “became senior proctor of the university, and discharged the duties of his office with great reputation and applause.” When Mr. Charnock left the classic retirements of Oxford, he visited Ireland, and resided some time with Sir Henry Cromwell. During that time he preached once every Lord’s day, at Dublin, with great acceptance, to large, attentive, and improved congregations. At length, ejected by the act of uniformity, Mr. Charnock returned to England, and took up his residence in London, where he preached to congregations of dissenters for the period of fifteen years. Those sermons now constitute the principal part of his works; and whilst on the doctrines they contain, being decidedly Calvinistic, a variety of opinions are entertained, yet it is universally admitted that they are distinguished by great originality and genius, and are well deserving of the widely-spread attention they have so long received. His reasonings are nervous, and his appeals affecting. His judgment was sound; his taste correct; his imagination lively; his piety undissembled. He was grave, without being dull, and perspicuous without being wearisome. His “Treatise on the Attributes of God,” is acknowledged to be incomparably the best in the English language. Useful was his life; but his usefulness has survived him. His works remain, to convince the judgment and reform the heart. The libraries of divines are incomplete without his works; and every theologian, controversialist, and biblical critic consults his writings, either to refute or admire them. His days were, however, comparatively few; for, at the age of fifty-two, he expired in London, and was buried in St. Michael’s church, Cornhill. As a man, he was distinguished for his learning, industry, gravity, and amiability of temper; and as a scholar, a theologian, and an author, for all that is venerable in erudition, great in learning, serious and wise in expression, and profound in knowledge. For further account of this learned and pious man, see his Works, and Life prefixed, by Edward Parsons; also Calamy’s Non-conformists’ Memorial.—Jones’ Christ. Biog.

CHASIDIM, or “PIETISTS,” a Jewish sect, which we must not confound with the party who took the same name in the time of the Maccabees, and rendered themselves famous by the zeal with which they contended for the national institutions. This sect dates its origin no farther back than the year 1740, when its doctrines were first broached by Israel Baalsham, in the small country town of Plussty, in Poland. In the course of about twenty years, his fame, as an exorcist, and master of the cabala, spread to such a degree, that he obtained a great number of followers in Poland, Moldavia, and Wallachia. This rabbi gave out that he alone was possessed of the true mystery of the sacred name; that his soul at certain times left the body, in order to receive revelations in the world of spirits; and that he was endowed with miraculous powers, by which he was able to control events, both in the physical and intellectual world. His followers were taught to look to him for the absolution of every crime they might commit; to repress every thing like reflection on the doctrines of religion; to expect the immediate appearance of the Messiah; and, in sickness, to abstain from the use of medicine, assured that their spiritual guides, of whom several made their appearance on the death of the founder, were possessed of such merits as would procure for them instant recovery. The accusations of gross immorality brought against the members of this sect by the Lithuanian rabbi, Israel Loebel, have been called in question, and are supposed rather to have originated in prejudice, than to have any foundation in truth; but it is affirmed by one who has had the best opportunities of investigating, that their morals are most obnoxious, and that the representations that have been given of them are by no means exaggerated. They are not only at enmity with all the other Jews, but form the bitterest and most bigoted enemies of the Christian religion. They believe that the Messiah, whom they are hourly expecting, will be a mere man, but will come with such an effulgence of glory, as to produce a complete regeneration in the heart of every Jew, and deliver them thenceforth from every evil. To their rabbins, whom they honor with the name of Zadiks, or “Righteous,” they pay almost divine homage. The extravagance of their gestures during their public service entitles them to the appellation of the “Jewish Jumpers.” Working themselves up into ecstasies, they break out into fits of laughter, clap their hands, jump up and down the synagogue in the most frantic manner; and turning their faces towards heaven, they clench their fists, and, as it were, dare the Almighty to withhold from them the objects of their requests. This sect has so increased of late years, that in Russian Poland and European Turkey, it is reported to exceed in number that of the Rabbinites in these countries.—Hend. Buck.

CHASTEN; chastise, correct. (1.) To strike or afflict one for his advantage and correction; and to refuse, or despise chastisement, or correction, is to undervalue it, and be not reformed by it. Jer. 2: 30, and 7: 28. Heb. 12: 5. The overthrow of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, was the chastisement of a cruel one: it was very severe, and inflicted by cruel instruments. Jer. 30: 14. (2.) To punish in just wrath. Lev. 26: 28. Thus the chastisement of our peace was laid on Christ; that punishment by the bearing of which our reconciliation with God is effected, was laid on him as our surety. Isa. 53: 5. To chasten one’s self, is to be exercised before God, in self-abasement, fasting, and prayer. Dan. 10: 12. The Scriptures are for correction: by their powerful influence they pierce a man to the heart, and make him amend his evil courses. 2 Tim. 3: 16.—Brown.

CHASTITY; purity from fleshly lust. In men it is termed continence. See CONTINENCE. There is a chastity of speech, behavior, and imagination, as well as of body. Grove gives us the following rules for the conservation of chastity: 1. To keep ourselves fully employed in labors either of the body or the mind: idleness is frequently the introduction to sensuality. 2. To guard the senses, and avoid every thing which may be an incentive to lust. Does the free use of some meats and drinks make the body ungovernable? Does reading certain books debauch the imagination and inflame the passions? Do temptations often enter by the sight? Have public plays, dancing, effeminate music, idle songs, loose habits, and the like, the same effect? He who resolves upon chastity cannot be ignorant what his duty is in all these and such like cases. 3. To implore the Divine Spirit, which is a spirit of purity; and by the utmost regard to his presence and operations to endeavor to retain him with us.—Grove's Moral Philos. p. 2, sec. 6; Hend. Buck.

CHAUCER, (GEOFFREY,) who has been called the day-star and the father of English poetry, is believed to have been born in London, in 1328, to have been educated both at Oxford and Cambridge, and to have studied law in the Temple. He was patronized by John of Gaunt, the sister of whose mistress he married. He was appointed to various lucrative offices, and more than once was sent upon missions to foreign countries. Having, however, imbibed the doctrines of Wickliffe, he was compelled to fly to Zealand, whence want of resources soon obliged him to return. Imprisonment awaited him at home, and he regained his liberty only by disclosures which drew down upon him the indignation of his party. At length, he recovered the pensions of which he had been deprived, and the remainder of his life was spent in retirement, first at Woodstock, and next at Donnington castle. He died in 1400, in London, to which city he had journeyed upon business. Considered merely with reference to his own merits, Chaucer ranks high among poets; compared with his predecessors, his contemporaries, and many of his successors, he is absolutely unrivalled. His great work, The Canterbury Tales, was not begun till he was far advanced in years; but it displays all the freshness, vigor, and variety of youth.—Davenport.

CHAUNCEY, (CHARLES,) second president of Harvard college, was born in England, in 1589. He received his grammar education at Westminster, and took the degree of M. D. at the university of Cambridge. He emigrated to New England in 1638, and after serving for a number of years in the ministry at Scituate, was appointed, in 1654, president of Harvard college. In this office he remained till his death, in 1671, performing all its duties with industrious fidelity. He was eminent as a physician, and was of opinion that there ought to be no distinction between physic and divinity.—Davenport.

CHAZINZARIANS; a sect which arose in Armenia, in the seventh century. They are so called from the Armenian word chazus, which signifies a cross, because they were charged with adoring the cross.—Hend. Buck.

CHEBĀR; a river of Assyria, which falls into the Euphrates, in the upper part of Mesopotamia. Ezek. 1: 1.—Calmet.

CHECKER-WORK; that in which the images of flowers, sprigs, leaves, and fruits are curiously wrought together. 1 Kings 7: 17.—Brown.

CHECKLEY, (SAMUEL,) minister in Boston, was graduated at Harvard college in 1715. He was ordained the first minister of the New South church in Summer street, November 22, 1719, and died December 1, 1769, in the fifty-first year of his ministry, aged seventy-three. In his preaching he was plain and evangelical. The great subject of his discourses was Jesus Christ, as a divine person, and as the end of the law for righteousness to all that believe. He frequently dwelt upon the fall of man, the necessity of the influences of the Spirit of God, the freeness and richness of divine grace, the necessity of regeneration, justification by faith, and faith as the gift of God. He was careful also to insist upon the importance of the Christian virtues. These he exhibited in his own life. Discountenancing all parade in religion, it gave him pleasure to encourage the humble and diffident. As he did not consider it of little importance what principles were embraced, he was tenacious of his sentiments. During his last sickness he enjoyed the supports of religion, and anticipated the blessedness of dwelling with his Savior, and with his pious friends, who had been called before him into eternity. Renouncing his own righteousness, he trusted only in the merits of Christ. He published a sermon on the death of king George I., 1727; of Rev. Wm. Waldron, 1727; of Lydia Hutchinson, 1748; at the election, 1755.—Bowen's Fun. Sermon; Collect. Hist. Soc. iii. 361; Allen.

CHEORLAOMER, king of the Elymæans, or Elamites, (i. e. either the Persians, or a people bordering on them,) was one of the four kings who confederated against the five kings of the Pentapolis of Sodom, who had revolted from his power, A. M. 2092.—Calmet.

CHEEVER, (SAMUEL,) the first minister of Marblehead, was graduated at Harvard college in 1659. In November, 1668, he first visited the town, in which he was afterwards settled, when the people were few. He continued preaching with them sixteen years before his ordination, August 13, 1684. He received Mr. Barnard as his colleague in 1716. He died in 1724, when he was eighty-five years of age. Mr. Cheever possessed good abilities, and was a constant and zealous preacher, a man of peace and of a catholic mind. Never was he sick. For fifty years he was not taken off from his labors one Sabbath. When he died, the lamp of life fairly burned out. He felt no pain in his expiring moments. He published the election sermon, 1712.—Coll. Hist. Soc. viii. 65, 66; x. 168; Allen.

CHEMARIM. This word occurs only once in our version of the Bible: "I will cut off the remnant of Baal, and the name of the Chemarims (Chemarim) with the priests," Zeph. 1: 4; but it frequently occurs in the Hebrew, and is generally translated "priests of the idols," or "priests clothed in black," because chamar signifies blackness. By this word the best commentators understand the priests of false gods, and in particular the worshippers of fire, because they were, it is said, dressed in black. Le Clerc, however, declares against this last opinion. Our translators of the Bible would seem sometimes to understand by this word the idols or objects of worship, rather than their priests. This is also the opinion of Le Clerc. Calmet observes that chamar in Arabic signifies the moon, and that Isis is the same deity. "Among the priests of Isis," says Calmet, "were those called melanephori, that is, wearers of black; but it is uncertain whether this name was given them by reason of their dressing wholly in black, or because they wore a black shining veil in the processions of this goddess."—Watson.

CHEMOSH; an idol of the Moabites. Numb. 21: 29. The name is derived from a root which in Arabic signifies to hasten. For this reason, many believe Chemosh to be the sun, whose precipitate course might well procure it the name of swift. Some identify Chemosh with Ammon, and Macrobius shows that Ammon was the sun, whose rays were denoted by his horns. Calmet is of opinion that the god Hemanus and Apollo Chomens, mentioned by Strabo and Ammianus Marcellinus, was Chamos, or the sun. These deities were worshipped in many parts of the east. Some, from the resemblance of the Hebrew Chamos with the Greek Comos, have thought Chamos to signify Bacchus. Jerome and most interpreters consider Chamos and Peor as the same deity; but some think that Baal-Peor was Tammuz, or Adonis. To Chemosh, Solomon erected an altar upon the mount of Olives. 1 Kings 11: 7. As to the form of the idol Chemosh, the Scripture is silent: but if, according to Jerome, it were like Baal-Peor, it must have been of the beeve kind, as were, probably, all the Baals, though accompanied with various insignia. There can be little doubt that part of the religious services performed to Chemosh, as to Baal-Peor, consisted in revelling and drunkenness, obscenities and impurities of the grossest kinds. From Chemosh the Greeks seem to have derived their Komos, called by the Romans Comos, the god of feasting and revelling.—Watson.

CHEREM; (Heb.) the second sort of anathema among the Jews. The first (called niddui) is merely separation, or the lesser excommunication. The second, (cherem) or the greater excommunication, deprived the excommunicated person of most of the advantages or civil society. He could have no commerce with any one, could neither buy nor sell, except such things as are absolutely necessary to life, nor resort to the schools, nor enter into the synagogues; and no one was permitted to eat and drink with him. The sentence of cherem was to be pronounced by ten persons only, or at least in the presence of ten persons. But the excommunicated person might be absolved by three judges, or even by one, provided he were a doctor of the law. The form of this excommunication was loaded with a multitude of curses and imprecations, taken from different places of the Scripture. See ANATHEMA and EXCOMMUNICATION.—Hend. Buck.

CHERETHIM. Cherethim, or Cherethites, are denominations for the Philistines; "I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and will cut off the Cherethim, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coast." Ezek. 25: 16. Zephaniah, exclaiming against the Philistines, says, "Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites." Zeph. 2: 5. It is said, (1 Sam. 30: 14,) that the Amalekites invaded the south of the Cherethites; that is, of the Philistines David, and some of the kings, his successors, had guards called Cherethites and Perethites. 2 Sam. 15: 18. 20: 7. Calmet thinks that they were of the country of the Philistines; but several expositors of our own country are of a different opinion. "We can hardly suppose," say the latter, "that David would employ any of these uncircumcised people as his body-guard, or that the Israelitish soldiers would have patiently seen foreigners of that nation advanced to such places of honor and trust." It may, therefore, be inferred that the guards were called Cherethites, because they went with David into Philistia, where they continued with him all the time he was under the protection of Achish. These were the persons who accompanied David from the first, and who remained with him in his greatest distresses; and it is no wonder, if men of such approved fidelity should be chosen for his body-guard. Besides, it is not uncommon for soldiers to derive their names, not from the place of their nativity, but of their residence.—Watson.

CHERTH; a brook beyond Jordan, which falls into that river, below Bethsan. 1 Kings 17: 3. See ELIJAH.—Calmet.

CHERUB; plural CHERUBIM, mighty ones. It appears, from Gen. 3: 24, that this is a name given to angels; but whether it is the name of a distinct class of celestials, or designates the same order as the seraphim, we have no means of determining. But the term cherubim is also applied to those splendid figures which Moses was commanded to make and place at each end of the mercy-seat, or propitiatory, and which covered the ark with expanded wings in the most holy place of the Jewish tabernacle and temple. See Exodus 25: 18, 19. The original meaning of the term, and the shape or form of these, any further than that they were alata animata, "winged creatures," is not certainly known. The opinion of Grotius that they were figures much like that of a calf; and of Bochart and Spencer that they were more like the figure of an ox than any thing besides, is as groundless as it is gross. Josephus says they were extraordinary creatures, of a figure unknown to mankind. The opinion of most critics, taken, it seems, from Ezek. 1: 9, 10, is, that they were figures composed of parts of various creatures; as a man, a lion, an ox, an eagle. But certainly we have no decided proof that the figures placed in the holy of holies in the tabernacle, were of the same form with those symbolic representations described by Ezekiel. The contrary, indeed, seems rather indicated, because they looked down upon the mercy-seat, which is an attribute not well adapted to a four-faced creature, like the emblematical cherubim seen by Ezekiel.

The cherubim of the sanctuary were two in number; one at each end of the mercy-seat; which, with the ark, was placed exactly in the middle, between the north and the south sides of the tabernacle. It was here that atonement was made, and that God was rendered propitious by the high-priest sprinkling the blood upon and before the mercy-seat. Lev. 16: 14, 15. Here the glory of God appeared, and here he met his high-priest, and by him his people; (Exod. 25: 22; Num. 7: 89:;) and from hence he gave forth his oracles; whence the whole holy place was called debir, the oracle. These cherubim, it must be observed, had feet whereon they stood, (2 Chron. 3: 13:;) and their feet were joined, in one continued beaten work, to the ends of the mercy-seat which covered the ark: so that they were wholly over or above it. Those in the tabernacle were of beaten gold, being but of small dimensions, (Exod. 25: 18:;) but those in the temple of Solomon were made of the wood of the olive tree overlaid with gold; for they were very large, extending their wings to the whole breadth of the oracle, which was twenty cubits. 1 Kings 6: 23—28; 2 Chron. 3: 10—13. They are called "cherubim of glory," not merely or chiefly on account of the matter or formation of them, but because they had the glory of God, or the glorious symbol of his presence, "the shechinah," resting between them. As this glory abode in the inward tabernacle, and as the figures of the cherubim represented the angels who surround the manifestation of the divine presence in the world above, that tabernacle was rendered a fit image of the court of heaven, in which light it is considered every where in the Epistle to the Hebrews. See chapters 4: 14; 8: 1; 9: 8, 9, 23, 24; 12: 22, 23.

The cherubim, it is true, have been considered by the disciples of Mr. Hutchinson as designed emblems of Jehovah himself, or rather of the Trinity of persons in the godhead, with man taken into the divine essence. But that God, who is a pure Spirit, without parts or passions, perfectly separate and remote from all matter, should command Moses to make material and visible images or emblematical representations of himself, is utterly improbable: especially considering that he had repeatedly, expressly, and solemnly forbidden every thing of this kind in the second commandment of the moral law, delivered from mount Sinai, amidst thunder and lightning, "blackness, darkness, and tempest," pronouncing with an audible and awful voice, while "the whole mount quaked greatly, and the sound of the trumpet waxed louder and louder, Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth." Hence, also, the solemn caution of Moses, Deut. 4: 15, &c. Add to this, that in most or all of the places where the cherubim are mentioned in the Scriptures, God is expressly distinguished from them. Thus, "He," the Lord, "placed at the east of the garden cherubim, and a flaming sword." Gen. 3: 24. "He rode on a cherub and did fly." Psalm 18: 10. "He sitteth between the cherubim." Psalm 99: 1. "He dwelleth between the cherubim." Psalm 80: 1. We also read of "the glory of the God of Israel going up, from the cherub whereupon he was, to the threshold of the house." Ezek. 9: 3. And again, "The glory of the Lord went up from the cherub, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory." Ezek. 10: 4. And again, "The glory of the Lord departed from off the threshold, and stood over the cherubim." Ezek. 10: 18. In all these passages, the glory of the Lord, that is, the shechinah, the glorious symbol of his presence, is distinguished from the cherubim; and not the least intimation is given in these passages, or any others, of the Scripture, that the cherubim were images or emblematical representations of him. Mr. Parkhurst's laborious effort to establish Mr. Hutchinson's opinion on the subject of the cherubim, in his Hebrew Lexicon, sub voce, is so obviously fanciful and contradictory, that few will be converted to this strange opinion.

It seems much more probable that, as most eminent divines have supposed, the cherubim represented the angels who surround the divine presence in heaven. Accordingly, they had their faces turned towards the mercy-seat, where God was supposed to dwell, whose glory the angels in heaven always behold, and upon which their eyes are continually fixed; as they are also upon Christ, the true propitiatory, which mystery of redemption they "desire," St. Peter tells us, "to look into," 1 Peter 1: 12; a circumstance evidently signified by the faces of the cherubim being turned inward, and their eyes fixed on the mercy-seat. We may here also observe that, allowing St. Peter in this passage to allude to the cherubic figures, which, from his mode of expression, can scarcely be doubted, this amounts to a strong presumption that the cherubim represented, not so much one order, as "the angels" in general, all of whom are said to "desire to look into" the subjects of human redemption, and to all whose orders, "the principalities and powers in heavenly places, the manifold wisdom of God is made known by the church." In Ezekiel, the cherubic figures are evidently connected with the dispensations of providence; and they have therefore appropriate forms, emblematical of the strength, wisdom, swiftness, and constancy, with which the holy angels minister in carrying on God's designs: but in the sanctuary they are connected with the administration of grace; and they are rather adoring beholders, than actors, and probably appeared under forms more simple. As to thé "Living Ones" (zōa), improperly rendered "beasts" in our translation, (Rev. 4: 7), some think them an hieroglyphical representation, not of the qualities of angels, but of those of real Christians; especially of those in the suffering and active periods of the church. The first, a lion, signifying their undaunted courage, manifested in meeting with confidence the greatest sufferings; the second, a calf or ox, emblematical of unwearied patience; the third, with the face of a man, representing prudence and compassion; the fourth, a flying eagle, signifying activity and vigor. The four qualities thus emblematically set forth in these four living creatures, namely, undaunted courage, unwearied patience under sufferings, prudence united with kindness, and vigorous activity, are found, more or less, in the true members of Christ's church in every age and nation. Probably, however, like the "living creatures" in the vision of Ezekiel, they are emblematical of the ministrations of angels in what pertains to those providential events which more particularly concern the church.

The wheels described in Ezek. 1: 15—21, in connection with the cherubim, Mr. Taylor conceives to have been representative of the throne of the Deity; the construction—wheel within wheel—being for the purpose of their rolling every way with perfect readiness, and without any occasion of turning the whole machine. The cherubim having the conducting of this throne, it is obvious to remark how well adapted their figure was to their service;—their faces looking every way, so that there was no occasion for turning, (as a horse must,) in obedience to directions, to proceed to the right, or to the left, instead of going straight forward.

As much misapprehension respecting these appearances has arisen from the idea of the wheels and the cherubim being full of eyes, (Ezek. 1:) Mr. Taylor next endeavors to correct that mistake. It is surprising, he remarks, that when the same Hebrew word (ain) had been rendered color, in verses 4, 7, 16, 22, 27, it should, in verse 18, be rendered eyes. It means the glittering, splendid hues—the fugitive, reflected tints, those accidental concussions of colors, such as we see vibrate in some precious stones, which, seen in some lights, show certain colors, but seen in other lights, show other colors. This sense of the word is confirmed by the use of it in Numb. 11: 7; "the manna was like coriander seed, itself; but the eye of it—the reflected, glistering tint, which vibrated from it—was like to the eye—the glistering tint—of the bdellium." It would not be far from the truth, to say, that these eyes were of the nature of those we call eyes in a peacock's feather: i. e. that they were spots peculiarly embellished with colors; or streaks like those of the golden pheasant of China.—Watson; Jones; Calmet.

CHERUBICAL HYMN; an hymn of great note in the ancient Christian church. The original form of it, as it stands in the constitutions, was in these words: "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts; heaven and earth are full of thy glory, who art blessed forever. Amen." This thrice repeating the word "holy" was in imitation of the seraphim in the vision of Isaiah. Afterwards, the church added some words to it, and sung it in this form: "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." This form is ascribed to Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, and Theodosius the younger, A. D. 446. The church used this form to declare her faith in the Holy Trinity, applying the title of "Holy God" to the Father, "Holy Mighty" to the Son, and "Holy Immortal" to the Holy Ghost. Thus it continued till the emperor Anastasius, or, as some say, Peter Gnapheus, bishop of Antioch, caused the words "that was crucified for us," to be added to it: which was done with a view to introduce the heresy of the Theopaschites, who asserted that the divine nature itself suffered on the cross. To avoid this inconvenience, Calandio, bishop of Antioch, in the time of the emperor Zeno, made another addition to it, of the words "Christ our King," reading it thus: "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, Christ our King, that was crucified for us, have mercy on us." These last additions occasioned great confusions and tumults in the eastern church, whilst the Constantinopolitan and western churches stiffly rejected them, and some, the better to maintain the old way of applying it to the whole Trinity, instead of the words, "crucified for us," expressly said, "Holy Trinity, have mercy on us."

This hymn was chiefly sung in the middle of the communion service, as it is at this day in the communion service of the church of England. It is likewise called by the Greek name trisagion, i. e. "thrice holy," from the trine repetition of the word "holy."—Hend. Buck.

CHESTNUT TREE. This tree, which is mentioned only in Gen. 30: 37, and Ezek. 31: 8, is by the Septuagint and Jerome rendered plane tree; and Drusius, Hiller, and most of the modern interpreters render it the same. The name is derived from a root which signifies nakedness; and it is often observed of the plane tree, that the bark peels off from the trunk, leaving it naked, which peculiarity may have been the occasion of its Hebrew name. The son of Sirach says, "I grew up as a plane tree by the water." Ecclesiasticus 24: 14.—Watson.

CHIDON; the threshing-floor where Uzzah was suddenly struck dead. 1 Chron. 13: 9. In 2 Sam. 6: 6, it is called "the threshing-floor of Nachon"; but we know not whether the names of Nachon and Chidon are those of men or of places.—Calmet.

CHILD. Mothers, in the earliest times, suckled their offspring themselves, and that from thirty to thirty-six months. The day when the child was weaned was made a festival. Gen. 21: 8; Exod. 2: 7, 9; 1 Sam. 1: 22—24; 2 Chron. 31: 16; 2 Mac. 7: 27, 28; Matt. 21: 16. Nurses were employed, in case the mother died before the child was old enough to be weaned, and when from any circumstances she was unable to afford a sufficient supply of milk for its nourishment. In later ages, when matrons had become more delicate, and thought themselves too infirm to fulfil the duties which naturally devolved upon them, nurses were employed to take their place, and were reckoned among the principal members of the family. They are, accordingly, in consequence of the respectable station which they sustained, frequently mentioned in sacred history. Gen. 35: 8; 2 Kings 11: 2; 2 Chron. 22: 11. The sons remained till the fifth year in the care of the women; they then came into the father's hands, and were taught not only the arts and duties of life, but were instructed in the Mosaic law, and in all parts of their country's religion. Deut. 6: 20—25; 7: 19; 11: 19. Those who wished to have them further instructed, provided they did not deem it preferable to employ private teachers, sent them away to some priest or Levite, who sometimes had a number of other children to instruct. It appears from 1 Sam. 1: 25—28, that there was a school near the holy tabernacle, dedicated to the instruction of youth. There had been many other schools of this kind, which had fallen into decay, but were restored again by the prophet Samuel; after whose time, the members of the seminaries in question, who were denominated by way of distinction "the sons of the prophets," acquired no little notoriety. Daughters rarely departed from the apartments appropriated to the females, except when they went out with an urn to draw water. They spent their time in learning those domestic and other arts, which are befitting a woman's situation and character, till they arrived at that period in life when they were to be sold, or, by a better fortune, given away in marriage. Prov. 31: 13; 2 Sam. 13: 7.

2. In Scripture, disciples are often called children or sons. Solomon, in his Proverbs, says to his disciple, "Hear, my son." The descendants of a man, how remote soever, are denominated his sons or children; as, "the children of Edom," "the children of Moab," "the children of Israel." Such expressions as, "the children of light," "the children of darkness," "the children of the kingdom," signify those who follow truth, those who remain in error, and those who belong to the church. Persons arrived at almost the age of maturity are sometimes called "children." Thus, Joseph is termed "the child," though he was at least sixteen years old, (Gen. 37: 30;) and Benjamin, even when above thirty, was so denominated. 44: 20. By the Jewish law, children were reckoned the property of their parents, who could sell them for seven years to pay their debts. Their creditors had also the power of compelling them to resort to this measure. The poor woman, whose oil Elisha increased so much as enabled her to pay her husband's debts, complained to the prophet, that, her husband being dead, the creditor was come to take away her two sons to be bondmen. 2 Kings 4: 1.

"Children, or sons of God," is a name by which the angels are sometimes described: "There was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord." Job 1: 6; 2: 1. Good men, in opposition to the wicked, are also thus denominated; the children of Seth's family, in opposition to those of Cain: "The sons of God saw the daughters of men." Gen. 6: 2. Judges, magistrates, priests, are also termed children of God: "I have said, Ye are gods, and all of you are the children of the Most High." Psalm 82: 6. The Israelites are called "sons of God," in opposition to the gentiles. Hosea 1: 10; John 11: 52. In the New Testament, believers are commonly called "children of God" by virtue of their adoption. St. Paul, in several places, extols the advantages of being adopted sons of God. Rom. 8: 14; Gal. 3: 26.

"Children, or sons of men," is a name given to Cain's family before the deluge, and, in particular, to the giants, who were violent men, and had corrupted their ways. Afterwards, the impious Israelites were thus called: "O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity?" Psalm 4: 2. "The sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows." 57: 4.—Watson.

CHILD-BIRTH. In oriental countries, child-birth is not an event of much difficulty; and mothers at such a season were originally the only assistants of their daughters, as any further aid was deemed unnecessary. Exod. 1: 19. In cases of more than ordinary difficulty, those matrons who had acquired some celebrity for skill and expertise on occasions of this kind, were invited in; and in this way there eventually rose into notice that class of women denominated midwives. The child was no sooner born than it was washed in a bath, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling clothes. Ezek. 16: 4. It was the custom at a very ancient period, for the father, while music in the mean while was heard to sound, to elasp the new-born child to his bosom, and by this ceremony was understood to declare it to be his own. Gen. 50: 23; Job 3: 12; Psalm 22: 11. This practice was imitated by those wives who adopted the children of their maids. Gen. 16: 2; 30: 3—5. The birth-day of a son, especially, was made a festival, and on each successive year was celebrated with renewed demonstrations of festivity and joy. Gen. 40: 20; Job 1: 4; Matt. 14: 6. The messenger, who brought the news of the birth of a son, was received with joy, and rewarded with presents. Job 3: 3; Jer. 20: 15. This is the case at the present day in Persia.—Watson.

CHILLINGWORTH, (WILLIAM,) a divine and controversial theologian, was born at Oxford, in 1622, and educated at Trinity college, of which he became a fellow in 1628; was for a while a convert to the Catholic church, but returned to Protestantism; obtained the chancellorship of Salisbury, the prebend of Brixworth, and the mastership of Wigston's Hospital; espoused the royal cause, and acted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester; was taken prisoner at Arundel; and died, a captive, in 1644. His principal production is, The Religion of Protestants a safe Way to Salvation. His works, including his sermons, form a folio volume.—Davenport.

CHILMAD; a city of Asia. Ezek. 27: 23.

CHILMAM, 1. a son of Barzillai, the Gileadite, and one who followed David to Jerusalem, after the war with Absalom; and who was enriched by David, in consideration of his father Barzillai, whose generous assistance he had experienced. 2 Sam. 19: 37, 38. 2. A place near Bethlehem. Jer. 41: 17.—Calmel.

CHINESE. The religion of this great and ancient nation was certainly patriarchal, and supposed to be derived from Joktan, the brother of Peleg. Gen. 10: 26, 30. This has degenerated to paganism, which, among their literati, may be refined to a sort of philosophical atheism; but among the vulgar, is as gross idolatry as that of other heathen nations. The grand Lama, (see LAMA), or pope of the Chinese and Tartars, who resides at Thibet, in Tartary, is their visible deity, and treated with more distinction than the pope of Rome himself, in the zenith of his power, and is attended by twenty thousand priests, or lamas. In addition to this general system of religion, which is founded on their sacred books, said to have descended from the skies, there are three grand sects, and those three are again subdivided into as many as Christianity itself. See FO; LAOKIUM; CONFUCIUS.

CHIOS, or Coos; an island in the Archipelago, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor, now called Scio. Paul passed this way as he sailed southward from Mitylene to Samos. Acts 20: 15.—Calmel.

CHISLEU; the third month of the Jewish civil year, and the ninth of their sacred, answering to our November and December. Neh. 1: 1. It contains thirty days.—Watson.

CHITTIM; the country, or countries, implied by this name in Scripture, are variously interpreted by historians and commentators. Chittim has been taken, by Hales and Lowth, for all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean; which appears most consonant with the general use of the word by the different inspired writers.—Watson.

CHIUN, the same as the Arabic Chevan, the planet Saturn, which, as well as Mars, was worshipped by the Semitish nations as the source of evil. Remphan is the Coptic name of Saturn. Amos 5: 26. Acts 8: 43.—Robinson's Calmet.

CHLOE; a noted Christian woman at Corinth, perhaps a widow, as she is represented as head of her family, from some of which Paul received his information of the divisions at Corinth. 1 Cor. 1: 11.—Brown.

CHOIR; that part of a church, or cathedral, where the singers, or chorists, chant, or sing, divine service. The word, according to Isidore, is derived à coronis circumstantium, because, anciently, the chorists were disposed round the altar. It is properly the chancel.

In the first common-prayer book of king Edward VI. the rubric at the beginning of morning prayer ordered the priest, "being in the choir, to begin the Lord's prayer;" so that it was the custom of the minister to perform divine service at the upper end of the chancel near the altar. Against this, Bucer, by the direction of Calvin, made a great outcry, pretending "it was an anti-christian practice for the priest to say prayers only in the choir, a place peculiar to the clergy, and not in the body of the church among the people, who had as much right to divine worship as the clergy." This occasioned an alteration of the rubric, when the common-prayer book was revised in the fifth year of king Edward, and it was ordered, that prayers should be said in such part of the church, "where the people might best hear." However, at the accession of queen Elizabeth to the throne, the ancient practice was restored, with a dispensing power left in the ordinary of determining it otherwise if he saw just cause. Convenience at last prevailed, and by degrees introduced the custom of reading prayers in the body of the church, so that now service is no longer performed in the choir or chancel, excepting in cathedrals.—Hend. Buck.

CHOOSE, ELECT. (1.) To set apart a person or thing from among others to some particular use, office, or privilege. Exod. 17: 9; Ps. 25: 12. (2.) To renew or manifest a choice. Isa. 14: 1; 48: 10. (3.) To follow, imitate, delight in, and practise. Prov. 3: 31; 1: 29. God chooses men's delusions, and brings their fears upon them, when he gives them up to their delusions as the just punishment of their sins. Thus God gave up the Jews to their vain fancies, and brought on them the destruction by the Romans, which they, by the murder of our Savior, thought to evade. Isa. 66: 4; John 12: 50. ELECTION imports, (1.) God's act of choosing men to everlasting life. Rom. 9: 11; 1: 5, 28. (2.) The persons chosen to eternal life. Rom. 11: 7. See ELECTION.

CHOSEN, ELECT; selected among others to some honorable service or station. Chosen warriors are such as are picked out as the most valiant and skilful in an army, or as best adapted to some special enterprise of great pith and moment. Exod. 15: 4; Judg. 20: 16. The Hebrew nation was an elect or chosen people; God set them apart—not for their superior excellence—but for wise and gracious purposes of his own—to receive his word, preserve his worship, and prepare for the advent of his Son. Ps. 105: 43. Isa. 14: 4. Deut. 7: 7. 9: 6—29. 10: 14, 15. Neh. 9: 7. Jerusalem was chosen, as the place where God was pleased to fix the peculiar symbols of his presence, and the privileges consequent thereon; as the seat of his temple, sacrifices, &c. 1 Kings 11: 13. Christ is the elect, or chosen of God; from eternity he was set apart in the divine Mind as the only fit person to be our Mediator and Surety. Isa. 43: 1. 1 Pet. 2: 4. Christ's people, saved by him, are elect and chosen; in his eternal purpose God kindly separated them from the rest of mankind—not of merit, but of mercy—not from faith foreseen, but in order to faith bestowed—that they might through Christ, and for his sake, receive salvation; to the praise of his glorious grace, which prepares them afore unto glory, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. 1 Pet. 1: 2. 2: 9. 5: 13. 2 John 1. Rev. 17: 14. Ephes. 1: 4. 2 Thess. 2: 13. For the sake of these, that none of them, in their persons or progenitors, may be cut off, are the days of vengeance on wicked nations shortened; no seducer can draw any of them fully and finally from the truth of the gospel; none can lay any valid charge against them before God; no injury done them shall pass unpunished; angels shall gather them all to Christ's right hand; and they shall infallibly obtain everlasting happiness. John 6: 70.—Brown.

CHORAZIN; a town in Galilee, near to Capernaum, not far distant from Bethsaida, and consequently on the western shore of the sea of Galilee. Pococke speaks of a village called Gerasi, among the hills west of the place called Telhoue, ten or twelve miles north-north-east of Tiberias, and close to Capernaum. The natives, according to Dr. Richardson, call it Chorasi. It is upbraided by Christ for its impotence, Matt. 11: 21. Luke 10: 13.—Calnet.

CHOREPISCOPI (tēs choras episcopoi, bishops of the country.) In the ancient church, when the dioceses became enlarged by the conversions of pagans in the country and villages at a great distance from the city church, the bishops appointed themselves certain assistants, whom they called chorepiscopi, because by their office they were bishops of the country. There have been great disputes among the learned concerning this order, some thinking that they were mere presbyters; others that there were two sorts, some that had received episcopal ordination, and some that were presbyters only; others think that they were all bishops. See Campbell's Lectures on Eccl. Hist. Lect. viii.—Hend. Buck.

CHRISM; oil consecrated by the bishop, and used in the Romish and Greek churches in the administration of baptism, confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction.—Hend. Buck.

CHRISOME, in the office of baptism, was a white vesture, which the priest put upon the child, saying, "Take this white vesture for a token of innocency."—H. Buck.

CHRIST; the Lord and Savior of mankind. He is called Christ, or Messiah, because he is anointed, sent, and furnished by God to execute his mediatorial office. See JESUS CHRIST.—Hend. Buck.

CHRISTIAN; a term used in a more lax and vague sense to denote one who professes the religion of Christ, or who does not belong to any of the other divisions of mankind, such as Jews, Mahometans, deists, pagans, and atheists; or, in a more strict, scriptural, and theological sense, one who really believes the gospel, imbibes the spirit, is influenced by the grace, and obedient to the will of Christ. The former is merely political and conventional; the latter is sacred and proper.

The disciples and followers of Christ were first denominated Christians at Antioch, A. D. 42. They distinguished themselves, in the most remarkable manner, by their conduct and their virtues. The faithful, whom the preaching of St. Peter had converted, hearkened attentively to the exhortations of the apostles, who failed not carefully to instruct them as persons who were entering upon an entire new life. They attended the temple daily, doing nothing different from the other Jews, because it was yet not time to separate from them. But they made a still greater progress in virtue; for they sold all that they possessed, and distributed their goods to the wants of their brethren. The primitive Christians were not only remarkable for the consistency of their conduct, but were also very eminently distinguished by the many miraculous gifts and graces bestowed by God upon them.

The Jews were the first and the most inveterate enemies the Christians had. They put them to death as often as they had it in their power; and when they revolted against the Romans, in the time of the emperor Adrian, Barchochebas, who was at the head of that revolt, employed against the Christians the most rigorous punishments to compel them to blaspheme and renounce Jesus Christ. And we find that even in the third century, they endeavored to get into their hands Christian women, in order to scourge and stone them in their synagogues. They cursed the Christians three times a day in their synagogues; and their rabbins would not suffer them to converse with Christians upon any occasion; nor were they contented to hate and detest them, but they despatched emissaries all over the world to defame the Christians, and spread all sorts of calumnies against them. They accused them, among other things, of worshipping the sun, and the head of an ass; they reproached them with idleness, and being a useless set of people. They charged them with treason, and endeavoring to erect a new monarchy against that of the Romans. They affirmed that in celebrating their mysteries, they used to kill a child, and eat his flesh. They accused them of the most shocking incests, and of intemperance in their feasts of charity. But the lives and behavior of the first Christians were sufficient to refute all that was said against them, and evidently demonstrated that these accusations were mere calumny, and the effect of inveterate malice. Pliny the younger, who was governor of Pontus and Bithynia between the years 103 and 105, gives a very particular account of the Christians in that province, in a letter which he wrote to the emperor Trajan, of which the following is an extract: "I take the liberty, sir, to give you an account of every difficulty which arises to me: I have never been present at the examinations of the Christians; for which reason I know not what questions have been put to them, nor in what manner they have been punished. My behavior towards those who have been accused to me, has been this: I have interrogated them, in order to know whether they were really Christians. When they have confessed it, I have repeated the same question two or three times, threatening them with death if they did not renounce this religion. Those who have persisted in their confession, have been by my order led to punishment. I have even met with some Roman citizens guilty of this frenzy, whom, in regard to their quality, I have set apart from the rest, in order to send them to Rome. These persons declare that their whole crime, if they are guilty, consists in this: that on certain days they assemble before sunrise to sing alternately the praises of Christ, as of God; and to oblige themselves, by the performance of their religious rites, not to be guilty of theft or adultery, to observe inviolably their word, and to be true to their trust. This disposition has obliged me to endeavor to inform myself still further of this matter, by putting to the torture two of their women-servants, whom they called deaconesses; but I could learn nothing more from them than that the superstition of these people is as ridiculous as their attachment to it is astonishing."

It is easy to discover the cause of the many persecutions to which the Christians were exposed during the first three centuries. The purity of the Christian morality, directly opposite to the corruption of the pagans, was doubtless one of the most powerful motives of the public aversion. To this may be added the many calumnies unjustly spread about concerning them by their enemies, particularly the Jews; and this occasioned so strong a prejudice against them, that the pagans condemned them without inquiring into their doctrine, or permitting them to defend themselves. Besides, their worshipping Jesus Christ as God, was contrary to one of the most ancient laws of the Roman empire, which expressly forbade the acknowledging of any god which had not been approved of by the senate. But, notwithstanding the violent opposition made to the establishment of the Christian religion, it gained ground daily, and very soon made surprising progress in the Roman empire. In the third century, there were Christians in the senate, in the camp, in the palace; in short, every where but in the temple and the theatres; they filled the towns, the country, and the islands. Men and women of all ages and conditions, and even those of the first dignities, embraced the faith; inasmuch that the pagans complained that the revenues of their temples were ruined. They were in such great numbers in the empire, that (as Tertullian expresses it) were they to have retired into another country, they would have left the Romans only a frightful solitude. For persecutions of the Christians, see the article PERSECUTION.

Christians are now divided into a variety of sects, the explanation of whose sentiments forms a great part of this volume. If it be inquired, whence arose these differences of opinion, we beg leave to refer to Mr. Fuller's "Essay on Truth," in the second volume of his Works, p. 681. The number of Christians now in the world, of all denominations, is variously calculated at from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred and twenty-five millions.

Christians may be considered as nominal and real. There are vast numbers who are called Christians, not because they possess any love for Christ, but because they happen to be born in what is called a Christian country, educated by Christian parents, and sometimes attend Christian worship. There are also many whose minds are well informed respecting the Christian system, who prefer it to every other, and who make an open profession of it; and yet, after all, feel but little of the real power of Christianity. A real Christian is one whose understanding is enlightened by the influences of divine grace, who is convinced of the depravity of his nature, who sees his own inability to help himself, who is taught to behold God as the chief good, the Lord Jesus as the only way to obtain felicity, and that the Holy Spirit is the grand agent in applying the blessings of the gospel to his soul. His heart is renovated, and inclined to revere, honor, worship, trust in, and live to God. His affections are elevated above the world, and centre in God alone. He embraces him as his portion, loves him supremely, and is zealous in the defence and support of his cause. His temper is regulated, his powers roused to vigorous action, his thoughts spiritual, and his general deportment amiable and uniform. In fine, the true Christian character exceeds all others as much as the blaze of the meridian sun outshines the feeble light of the glow-worm.—Hend. Buck.

CHRISTIANITY; the religion of Christians.

I. CHRISTIANITY, foundation of.—Most, if not all, Christians, whatever their particular tenets may be, acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the sole foundation of their faith and practice. But as these books, or at least particular passages in them, have, from the ambiguity of language, been variously interpreted by different commentators, these diversities have given birth to a multiplicity of different sects. These, however, or, at least, the greatest number of them, appeal to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the ultimate standard—the only infallible rule of faith and manners. If asked by what authority these books claim an absolute right to determine the consciences and understandings of men with regard to what they should believe, and what they should do, they answer, that all Scripture, whether for doctrine, correction, or reproof, was given by immediate inspiration from God. If again interrogated how those books which they call Scriptures are authenticated, they reply, that the Old and New Testaments are proved to be the word of God, by evidences both internal and external. See § 2, and article REVELATION.

II. CHRISTIANITY, evidences of the truth of.—THE EXTERNAL EVIDENCES of the authenticity and divine authority of the Scriptures have been divided into direct and collateral. The direct evidences are such as arise from the nature, consistency, and probability of the facts; and from the simplicity, uniformity, competency, and fidelity of the testimonies by which they are supported. The collateral evidences are either the same occurrences supported by heathen testimonies, or others which concur with and corroborate the history of Christianity. ITS INTERNAL EVIDENCES arise either from its exact conformity with the character of God, from its aptitude to the frame and circumstances of man, or from those supernatural convictions and assistances which are impressed on the mind by the immediate operation of the Divine Spirit. We shall here chiefly follow Dr. Doddridge, and endeavor to give some of the chief evidences which have been brought forward, and which every unprejudiced mind must confess are unanswerable.

First. Taking the matter merely in theory, it will appear highly probable that such a system as the gospel should be, indeed, a divine revelation.

1. The case of mankind is naturally such as to need a divine revelation, 1 John 5: 19. Rom. 1. Eph. 4. 2. There is from the light of nature considerable encouragement to hope that God would favor his creatures with so needful a blessing as a revelation appears. 3. We may easily conclude, that if a revelation were given, it would be introduced and transmitted in such a manner as Christianity is said to have been. 4. That the main doctrines of the gospel are of such a nature as we might in general suppose those of a divine revelation would be—rational, practical, and sublime.—Heb. 11: 6. Mark 12: 20. 1 Tim. 2: 5. Matt. 5: 48. Matt. 10: 29, 30. Phil. 4: 8. Rom. 2: 6, 40.

Secondly. It is, in fact, certain that Christianity is, indeed, a divine revelation: for, 1. The books of the New Testament, now in our hands, were written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity. In proof of this, observe, 1. That it is certain that Christianity is not a new religion, but that it was maintained by great multitudes quickly after the time in which Jesus is said to have appeared. 2. That there was certainly such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem, when Pontius Pilate was governor there. 3. The first publishers of this religion wrote books which contained an account of the life and doctrine of Jesus their master, and which went by the name of those that now make up our New Testament. 4. That the books of the New Testament have been preserved, in the main, uncorrupted to the present time, in the original language in which they were written. 5. That the translation of them now in our hands may be depended upon as, in all things most material, agreeable to the original. Now, II. From allowing the New Testament to be genuine, according to the above proof, it will certainly follow that Christianity is a divine revelation; for, in the first place, it is exceedingly evident that the writers of the New Testament certainly knew whether the facts were true or false. John 1: 3. John 19: 27, 35. Acts 27: 7—9. 2. That the character of these writers, so far as we can judge by their works, seems to render them worthy of regard, and leaves no room to imagine they intended to deceive us. The manner in which they tell their story is most happily adapted to gain our belief. There is no air of declamation and harangue; nothing that looks like artifice and design; no apologies, no encomiums, no characters, no reflections, no digressions; but the facts are recounted with great simplicity, just as they seem to have happened; and those facts are left to speak for themselves. Their integrity likewise evidently appears in the freedom with which they mention those circumstances which might have exposed their Master and themselves to the greatest contempt amongst prejudiced and inconsiderate men, such as they knew they must generally expect to meet with. John 1: 45, 46. John 7: 52. Luke 2: 4, 7. Mark 6: 3. Matt. 8: 20. John 7: 48. It is certain that there are in their writings the most genuine traces not only of a plain and honest, but a most pious, and devout, a most benevolent and generous disposition, as every one must acknowledge who reads their writings. 3. The apostles were under no temptation to forge a story of this kind, or to publish it to the world, knowing it to be false. 4. Had they done so, humanly speaking, they must quickly have perished in it, and their foolish cause must have died with them, without ever gaining any credit in the world. Reflect more particularly on the nature of those grand facts, the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ, which formed the great foundation of the Christian scheme, as first exhibited by the apostles. The resurrection of a dead man, and his ascension into an abode in the upper world, were such strange things, that a thousand objections would immediately have been raised against them; and some extraordinary proof would have been justly required as a balance to them. Consider the manner in which the apostles undertook to prove the truth of their testimony to these facts; and it will evidently appear, that, instead of confirming their scheme, it must have been sufficient utterly to have overthrown it, had it been itself the most probable imposture that the wit of man could ever have contrived. See Acts 3: 9: 14: 19: &c. They did not merely assert that they had seen miracles wrought by Jesus, but that he had endowed them with a variety of miraculous powers; and these they undertook to display, not in such idle and useless tricks as sleight of hand might perform, but in such solid and important works as appeared worthy of divine interposition, and entirely superior to human power. Nor were these things undertaken in a corner, in a circle of friends or dependents; nor were they said to be wrought, as might be suspected, by any confederates in the fraud; but they were done often in the most public manner. Would impostors have made such pretensions as these? or, if they had, must they not immediately have been exposed and ruined? Now, if the New Testament be genuine, then it is certain that the apostles pretend to have wrought miracles in the very presence of those to whom their writings were addressed; nay, more, they profess likewise to have conferred those miraculous gifts in some considerable degrees on others, even on the very persons to whom they write, and they appeal to their consciences as to the truth of it. And could there possibly be room for delusion here? 5. It is likewise certain that the apostles did gain early credit, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner. This is abundantly proved by the vast number of churches established in early ages at Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colosse, &c. &c. 6. That, admitting the facts which they testified concerning Christ to be true, then it was reasonable for their contemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel which they have transmitted to us as a divine revelation. The great thing they asserted was, that Jesus was the Christ, and that he was proved to be so by prophecies accomplished in him, and by miracles wrought by him, and by others in his name. If we attend to these, we shall find them to be no contemptible arguments, but must be forced to acknowledge, that the premises being established, the conclusion most easily and necessarily follows; and this conclusion, that Jesus is the Christ, taken in all its extent, is an abstract of the gospel revelation, and therefore is sometimes put for the whole of it. Acts 8: 37. Acts 17: 18. (See articles MIRACLE and PROPHECY.) 7. The truth of the gospel has also received further and very considerable confirmation from what has happened in the world since it was first published. And here we must desire every one to consider what God has been doing to confirm the gospel since its first publication, and he will find it a further evidence of its divine original. We might argue at large from its surprising propagation in the world; from the miraculous powers with which not only the apostles, but succeeding preachers of the gospel, and other converts, were endowed; from the accomplishment of prophecies recorded in the New Testament; and from the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, notwithstanding the various difficulties and persecutions through which they have passed. We must not, however, forget to mention the confirmation it receives from the methods which its enemies have taken to destroy it; and these have generally been either persecution or falsehood, or cavilling at some particulars in revelation, without entering into the grand argument on which it is built, and fairly debating what is offered in its defence. The cause has gained considerably by the opposition made to it: the more it has been tried, the more it has been approved; and we are bold to say, no honest man, unfettered by prejudice, can examine this system in all its parts, without being convinced that its origin is divine.

III. CHRISTIANITY, general doctrines of.—"It must be obvious," says an ingenious author, "to every reflecting mind, that, whether we attempt to form the idea of any religion à priori, or contemplate those which have already been exhibited, certain facts, principles, or data, must be pre-established; from whence will result a particular frame of mind and course of action suitable to the character and dignity of that Being by whom the religion is enjoined, and adapted to the nature and situation of those agents who are commanded to observe it. Hence Christianity may be divided into credenda, or doctrines, and agenda, or precepts. As the great foundation of his religion, therefore, the Christian believes the existence and government of one eternal and infinite Essence, which forever retains in itself the cause of its own existence, and inherently possesses all those perfections which are compatible with its nature; such are its almighty power, omniscient wisdom, infinite justice, boundless goodness, and universal presence. In this indivisible essence the Christian recognises three distinct subsistences, yet distinguished in such a manner as not to be incompatible either with essential unity, or simplicity of being, or with their personal distinction; each of them possesses the same nature and properties to the same extent. This infinite Being was graciously pleased to create a universe replete with intelligences, who might enjoy his glory, participate his happiness, and imitate his perfections. But as these beings were not immutable, but left to the freedom of their own will, a degeneracy took place, and that in a rank of intelligence superior to man. But guilt is never stationary. Impatient of itself, and cursed with its own feelings, it proceeds from bad to worse, whilst the poignancy of its torments increases with the number of its perpetrations. Such was the situation of Satan and his apostate angels. They attempted to transfer their turpitude and misery to man, and were, alas, but too successful. Hence the heterogeneous and irreconcilable principles which operate in his nature; hence that inexplicable medley of wisdom and folly, of rectitude and error, of benevolence and malignity, of sincerity and fraud, exhibited through his whole conduct; hence the darkness of his understanding, the depravity of his will, the pollution of his heart, the irregularity of his affections, and the absolute subversion of his whole internal economy. The seeds of perdition soon ripened into overt acts of guilt and horror. All the hostilities of nature were confronted, and the whole sublimary creation became a theatre of disorder and mischief. Here the Christian once more appeals to fact and experience. If these things are so—if man be the vessel of guilt, and the victim of misery, he demands how this constitution of things can be accounted for? how can it be supposed that a being so wicked and unhappy should be the production of an infinitely good and infinitely perfect Creator? He, therefore, insists that human nature must have been disarranged and contaminated by some violent shock, and that, of consequence, without the light diffused over the face of things by Christianity, all nature must remain in inscrutable and inexplicable mystery. To redress these evils, to re-establish the empire of rectitude and happiness, to restore the nature of man to its primitive dignity, to satisfy the remonstrances of infinite justice, to purify every original or contracted stain, to expiate the guilt and destroy the power of vice, the Son of God, from whom Christianity takes its name, and to whom it owes its origin, descended from the bosom of his Father, assumed the human nature, became the representative of man; endured a severe probation in that character; exhibited a pattern of perfect righteousness, and at last ratified his doctrine, and fully accomplished all the ends of his mission, by a cruel, unmerited, and ignominious death. Before he left the world, he delivered the doctrines of salvation, and the rules of human conduct, to his apostles, whom he empowered to instruct the world in all that concerned their eternal felicity, and whom he invested with miraculous gifts to ascertain the reality of what they taught. To them he likewise promised another comforter, even the Divine Spirit, who should remove the darkness, console the woes, and purify the stains of human nature. Having remained for a part of three days under the power of death, he rose again from the grave; appeared to his disciples, and many others; conversed with them for some time, then re-ascended to heaven; from whence the Christian expects him, according to his promise, to appear as the Sovereign Judge of the living and the dead, from whose awards there is no appeal, and by whose sentence the destiny of the righteous and the wicked shall be eternally fixed. Soon after his departure to the right hand of his Father (where in his human nature he sits supreme of all created beings, and invested with the absolute administration of heaven and earth), the spirit of grace and consolation descended on his apostles with visible signatures of divine power and presence. Nor were his salutary operations confined to them, but extended to all who did not by obstinate guilt repel his influences. These, indeed, were less conspicuous than at the glorious era when they were visibly exhibited in the persons of the apostles. But though his energy be less observable, it is by no means less effectual to all the purposes of grace and mercy. The Christian is convinced that there is and shall continue to be a society upon earth, who worship God as revealed in Jesus Christ, who believe his doctrines, who observe his precepts, and who shall be saved by the merits of his death, in the use of these external means of salvation which he hath appointed. He also believes that the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper, the interpretation and application of Scripture, the habitual exercise of public and private devotion, are obviously calculated to diffuse and promote the interests of truth and religion, by superinducing the salutary habits of faith, love, and repentance. He is firmly persuaded, that, at the consummation of all things, when the purposes of Providence in the various revolutions of progressive nature are accomplished, the whole human race shall once more issue from their graves; some to immortal felicity in the actual perception and enjoyment of their Creator's presence, and others to everlasting shame and misery."

IV. CHRISTIANITY, mortality and superiority of.—It has been well observed, "that the two grand principles of action, according to the Christian, are the love of God, which is the sovereign passion in every gracious mind; and the love of man, which regulates our actions according to the various relations in which we stand, whether to communities or individuals. This sacred connexion ought never to be totally extinguished by any temporary injury. It ought to subsist in some degree even amongst enemies. It requires that we should pardon the offences of others, as we expect pardon for our own; and that we should no further resist evil than is necessary for the preservation of personal rights and social happiness. It dictates every relative and reciprocal duty between parents and children, masters and servants, governors and subjects, friends and friends, men and men; nor does it merely enjoin the observation of equity, but likewise inspires the most sublime and extensive charity: a boundless and disinterested effusion of tenderness for the whole species, which feels their distress, and operates for their relief and improvement."

"Christianity," it has also been observed, (and with the greatest propriety,) "is superior to all other religions. The disciple of Jesus not only contends, that no system of religion has ever yet been exhibited so consistent with itself, so congruous to philosophy and the common sense of mankind, as Christianity,—he likewise avers that it is infinitely more productive of real consolation than all other religious or philosophical tenets which have ever entered into the soul, or been applied to the heart of man. For what is death to that mind which considers eternity as the career of its existence? What are the frowns of men to him who claims an eternal world as his inheritance? What is the loss of friends to that heart which feels, with more than natural conviction, that it shall quickly rejoin them in a more tender, intimate, and permanent intercourse, than any of which the present life is susceptible? What are the vicissitudes of external things to a mind which strongly and uniformly anticipates a state of endless and immutable felicity? What are mortifications, disappointments, and insults, to a spirit which is conscious of being the original offspring and adopted child of God; which knows that its omnipotent Father will, in proper time, effectually assert the dignity and privileges of its nature? In a word, as this earth is but a speck in the creation, as time is not an instant in proportion to eternity, such are the hopes and prospects of the Christian in comparison of every sublunary misfortune or difficulty. It is, therefore, in his judgment, the eternal wonder of angels, and indelible opprobrium of man, that a religion so worthy of God, so suitable to the frame and circumstances of our nature, so consonant to all the dictates of reason, so friendly to the dignity and improvement of intelligent beings, so pregnant with genuine comfort and delight, should be rejected and despised by any of the human race."

V. CHRISTIANITY, external propagation of.—The first community of the followers of Christ was formed at Jerusalem, soon after the death and resurrection of their Master. Another at Antioch, in Syria, first assumed, about the year 66, the name of Christians, which had originally been given them by their enemies as a term of reproach; and the travels and ministry of the apostles, and other missionaries, soon spread Christianity through the Roman empire. Palestine, Syria, Natolia, Greece, the islands of the Mediterranean, Italy, and the northern coast of Africa, as early as the first century, contained numerous societies of Christians. Their lives were spiritual and holy, their ecclesiastical practices simple, and conformable to the nature of their religion and the humble circumstances in which they were placed, and they continued to acquire strength amidst all kinds of persecution. At the end of the second century, Christians were to be found in all the provinces; and at the end of the third century, almost half the inhabitants of the Roman empire, and of several neighboring countries, professed the faith of Christ. About this time, endeavors to preserve a unity of belief, and of church discipline, occasioned numberless disputes among those of different opinions, and led to the establishment of an ecclesiastical tyranny, than which nothing is more contrary to the spirit and design of Christianity. At the beginning of the fourth century, when the Christians obtained toleration by means of Constantine the Great, and their religion became that of the empire, the bishops assumed to themselves the power of authoritatively deciding on matters of faith, and making enactments relative to the government of the church. Their views were promoted by the favor of the emperors, (with slight interruptions in the reign of Julian, and some of his successors,) by the increased splendor and various ceremonies of public worship; by the decline of classical learning; the increasing superstition resulting from the increase of ignorance; and by the establishment of convents and monks. In this form, appealing more to the senses than to the understanding, Christianity, which had been introduced among the Goths in the fourth century, was spread among the other Teutonic nations in the west and north of Europe, and subjected to its power, during the seventh and eighth centuries, the rude warriors who founded new kingdoms on the ruins of the Western empire, while it was losing ground in Asia and Africa, before the encroachment of the Saracens, by whose rigorous measures hundreds of thousands of professed Christians were converted to Mahometanism; the heretical sects which had been disowned by the orthodox church, being almost the only Christians who maintained their profession in the East.

During the progress of Mahometanism, which in Europe extended only to Spain and Sicily, the popes of Rome who were advancing systematically to ecclesiastical domination in the west, gained more in the north, and soon after in the east of this quarter of the world, by the conversion of the Slavonic and Scandinavian nations, than they had lost in other regions. For the Mahometans had chiefly overrun the territory of the Eastern church, which had been since the fifth century no longer one with the Western, and had, by degrees, become entirely separate from it. In the tenth century, that church received a large accession of adherents, by the conversion of the Russians, who have ever since continued to be its principal support. But the crusaders who were led, partly by religious enthusiasm, partly by the desire of conquest and adventure, to attempt the recovery of the holy sepulchre, gained the new kingdom of Jerusalem, not for the Greek emperor, but for themselves and the papal hierarchy. The confusion which this finally unsuccessful undertaking introduced into the civil and domestic affairs of the western nations, gave the Romish church a favorable opportunity of increasing its possessions, and asserting its pretensions to universal monarchy. The intercourse of nations, however, and the return of the crusaders, combined with more liberal views propagated by individuals of a more philosophic turn of mind, and above all, the indignation excited by the scandalous corruptions and vices of the clergy, stood greatly in its way. These kindled an opposition among all the societies and sects against the hierarchy. The foundation and multiplication of ecclesiastical orders, particularly the Franciscans and Dominicans, professedly for the care of souls and the instruction of the people, which had been neglected by the secular priests, did not remedy the evil, because they labored, in general, more actively to promote the interests of the church and the papacy, than to remove superstition and ignorance; and bold speculations which would not yield to their persuasions, were less likely to be extirpated by the power of the inquisition, which armed itself with fire and sword. The vast difference of religion, as then taught and practised, from the religion of Jesus Christ; the utter insufficiency of what the church taught to satisfy the mind and heart of men, in reference to their religious wants, became obvious to numbers, partly from their knowledge of Christianity derived from the Bible, which now began to be studied in secret, in spite of the prohibitions of the church, and partly from the bold eloquence and undaunted appeals of individuals among those who were disgusted with prevailing abuses. The ecclesiastical orders were also desirous of pursuing an independent course; offended princes forgot the services of the papal power, in promoting the civilization of barbarous nations in the first centuries of the middle ages; and the popes themselves made little effort to reform or conceal the corruption of their court and of the clergy. They even afforded the scandalous spectacle of a schism in the church, which was distracted for more than thirty years, by the quarrels between her candidates, who both asserted their right to the papal chair. Nor could any thing settle this dispute but the decrees of the council of Constance (1414—1418), which were very unfavorable to the papal power. The doctrines of Wickliffe had already given rise to a party opposed to the popedom; and the secession of the adherents of the Bohemian reformer extorted from the council of Basle certain compacts, which being firmly maintained, proved to the friends of reformation what might be effected by a firm and united opposition to the abuses of the Roman church.

At length, Luther was raised up, who in conjunction with a noble band of witnesses for the truth, exposed the unscriptural dogmas and corrupt practice of the papal hierarchy, translated the Scriptures into the vernacular languages of the nations of Europe; pronounced the authority of God, as expressed in the Bible, to be the ultimate standard of appeal, and opened and explained the divine word in its various and important bearings on the highest interests of man. A spirit of free inquiry was thus awakened, which has not ceased, to the present hour, to produce effects favorable to the emancipation of the human mind, both from secular and spiritual tyranny; and in proportion as its legitimate influence has been felt, have been the advantages accruing to the interests of genuine Christianity. Not only has the light of the gospel dispelled to a great extent the mists of ignorance and superstition, in which the whole of Europe was enveloped; but the religion of Christ, in its purer forms, has been conveyed by the colonists to America, where its benign influence is extensively felt, and from which, there is reason to believe, it will ere long be extended over the southern regions of that vast continent, where unexampled cruelties have for centuries been exercised by the votaries of Roman superstition.

Notwithstanding the obstacles which have been thrown in the way of Christianity, partly by the abettors of infidelity, the apathy and divisions of Protestantism, the unscriptural doctrines that have been taught by many of its ministers, and the unholy effects which have resulted from the connexion of church and state, that divine system has been gradually gaining ground, and is now making rapid progress towards universal conquest. By the exertion of missionary, Bible, tract, and other societies, the truth is not only being brought prominently to light throughout Europe, but in Africa, India, and the islands of the Pacific, its power has been extensively felt; and the period seems rapidly approaching when, in fulfilment of ancient prophecy, the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea.

VI. CHRISTIANITY, success of.—Despised as Christianity has been by many, yet it has had an extensive progress through the world, and still remains to be professed by great numbers of mankind; though it is to be lamented many are unacquainted with its genuine influence. It was early and rapidly propagated through the whole Roman empire, which then contained almost the whole known world; and herein we cannot but admire both the wisdom and the power of God. "Destitute of all human advantages," says a good writer, "protected by no authority, assisted by no art; not recommended by the reputation of its Author, not enforced by eloquence in its advocates, the word of God grew mightily, and prevailed. Twelve men, poor, artless, and illiterate, we behold triumphing over the fiercest and most determined opposition; over the tyranny of the magistrate, and the subtleties of the philosopher; over the prejudices of the Gentile, and the bigotry of the Jew. They established a religion which held forth high and venerable mysteries, such as the pride of man would induce him to suspect, because he could not perfectly comprehend them; which preached doctrines pure and spiritual, such as corrupt nature was prone to oppose, because it shrunk from the severity of their discipline; which required its followers to renounce almost every opinion they had embraced as sacred, and every interest they had pursued as important; which even exposed them to every species of danger and infamy; to persecution unmerited and unpitied; to the gloom of a prison, and to the pangs of death. Hopeless as this prospect might appear to the view of short-sighted man, the gospel yet emerged from the obscurity in which it was likely to be overwhelmed by the complicated distresses of its friends, and the unrelenting cruelty of its foes. It succeeded in a peculiar degree, and in a peculiar manner; it derived that success from truth, and obtained it under circumstances where falsehood must have been detected and crushed."

"Although," says the elegant Porteus, "Christianity has not always been so well understood, or so honestly practised, as it ought to have been; although its spirit has been often mistaken, and its precepts misapplied, yet, under all these disadvantages, it has gradually produced a visible change in those points which most materially concern the peace and quiet of the world. Its beneficent spirit has spread itself through all the different relations and modifications of life, and communicated its kindly influence to almost every public and private concern of mankind. It has insensibly worked itself into the inmost frame and constitution of civil states. It has given a tinge to the complexion of their governments, to the temper and administration of their laws. It has restrained the spirit of the prince and the madness of the people. It has softened the rigor of despotism, and tamed the insolence of conquest. It has, in some degree, taken away the edge of the sword, and thrown even over the horrors of war a veil of mercy. It has descended into families, has diminished the pressure of private tyranny; improved every domestic endearment; given tenderness to the parent, humanity to the master, respect to superiors, to inferiors ease; so that mankind are, upon the whole, even in a temporal view, under infinite obligations to the mild and pacific temper of the gospel, and have reaped from it more substantial worldly benefits than from any other institution upon earth. As one proof of this (among many others), consider only the shocking carnage made in the human species by the exposure of infants, the gladiatorial shows, which sometimes cost Europe twenty or thirty thousand lives in a month; and the exceedingly cruel usage of slaves, allowed and practised by the ancient pagans. These were not the accidental and temporary excesses of a sudden fury, but were legal and established, and constant methods of murdering and tormenting mankind. Had Christianity done nothing more than brought into disuse (as it confessedly has done) the two former of these inhuman customs entirely, and the latter to a very great degree, it had justly merited the title of the benevolent religion; but this is far from being all. Throughout the more enlightened parts of Christendom there prevails a gentleness of manners widely different from the ferocity of the most civilized nations of antiquity; and that liberality with which every species of distress is relieved, is a virtue peculiar to the Christian name."

But we may ask further, what success has it had on the mind of man, as it respects his eternal welfare? How many thousands have felt its power, rejoiced in its benign influence, and under its dictates been constrained to devote themselves to the glory and praise of God? Burdened with guilt, incapable of finding relief from human resources, the mind has here found peace unspeakable, in beholding that sacrifice which alone could atone for transgression. Here the hard and impenitent heart has been softened, the impetu-ous passions restrained, the ferocious temper subdued, powerful prejudices conquered, ignorance dispelled, and the obstacles to real happiness removed. Here the Christian, looking round on the glories and blandishments of this world, has been enabled, with a noble contempt, to despise all. Here death itself, the king of terrors, has lost its sting; and the soul, with a holy magnanimity, has borne up in the agonies of a dying hour, and sweetly sung itself away to everlasting bliss.

In respect to its future spread, we have reason to believe that all nations shall feel its happy effects. The prophecies are pregnant with matter as to this belief. It seems that not only a nation or a country, but the whole habitable globe, shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ: and who is there that has ever known the excellency of this system; who is there that has ever experienced its happy efficacy; who is there that has ever been convinced of its divine origin, its delightful nature, and peaceful tendency, but what must join the benevolent and royal poet in saying, "Let the whole earth be filled with its glory, amen and amen?"

CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN, are a sort of mongrel Christians, who profess to derive their traditions from St. John the Baptist, but who, in fact, are hostile to Christianity, and who admit the name (said to be given them by the Turks) for the sake only of the toleration they enjoy thereby. They are more properly called Mendæans, which see.—Williams.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS; a sect of Christians on the coast of Malabar, in the East Indies, to which region the apostle Thomas is said to have carried the gospel. They belong to those Christians who, in the year 499, united to form a Syrian and Chaldean church, in Central and Eastern Asia, and are, like them, Nestorians; but it is supposed they existed much earlier, as they are believed to be the Indian Christians from whom a bishop came to the council of Nice, in 325. They have retained rather more strongly than the more western Nestorians, the features of their descent from the earliest Christian communities. They celebrate the agape; portion maidens from the property of the church; and provide for the poor. Their ideas respecting the Lord's supper incline to those of the Protestants; but in celebrating it, they use bread with salt and oil. At the time of baptism, they anoint the body of the infant with oil. These two ceremonies, with that of the consecration of priests, are the only sacraments which they acknowledge. Their priests are distinguished by the tonsure, are allowed to marry, and were, till the sixteenth century, under a Nestorian patriarch at Babylon, now at Mosul, from whom they receive their bishop, and upon whom they are also dependent for the consecration of their priests. Their churches contain, except the cross, no symbols nor pictures. Their liturgy is similar to the Syrian, and is performed in the Syrian language.

When the Portuguese occupied the East Indies, the Roman Catholic clergy endeavored to subject the Christians of St. Thomas to the government of the pope. The archbishop of Coa succeeded, in 1599, in persuading them to submit, and form a part of his diocese; in consequence of which they were obliged to renounce the Nestorian faith, adopt a few Catholic ceremonies, and obey a Jesuit, who became their bishop. But after the Portuguese were supplanted by the Dutch, on the coast of Malabar, this union ceased, and they returned to their ancient forms. At present, their number amounts to nearly eighty thousand. They are, under the British government, free from any ecclesiastical restraint, and form among themselves a kind of spiritual republic, under a bishop chosen by themselves, and in which the priests and elders administer justice, using excommunication as a means of punishment. Colonel Munro, the late resident at Travancore, interested himself much for this people, and erected a college at Chotim, for the education both of priests and others, and he made an endowment to support a number of teachers and students. In their political relations to the natives, they belong to the class of the Nairs, or nobility of the second rank, are allowed to ride on elephants, and to carry on commerce and agriculture, instead of practising mechanical trades, like the lower classes. Travellers describe them as very ignorant, but at the same time of very good morals. See Monthly Mag. for 1804, p. 60; Dr. Kerr's Report to Lord Bentinck, on the state of the Christians inhabiting the kingdom of Cochin and Travancore; Evang. Mag. 1807, p. 473.—Hend. Buck.

CHRISTIAN CONNEXION, or CHRISTIANS, sometimes erroneously pronounced Christians.* This is a religious denomination of recent origin in the United States of America, and among the last that has arisen, which, from its numbers and character, has attained much consideration and influence. Its beginning may be dated about the year 1800; and the circumstances attending its rise and progress are somewhat peculiar. This sect recognises no individual as its leader or founder. They have no Calvin, or Luther, or Wesley to whom they refer as an authority for articles of faith and rules of practice. The denomination seems to have sprung up almost simultaneously in different and remote parts of the country, without any preliminary interchange of sentiments or concerted plan of action. Their leading purposes, at first, appear to have been, not so much to establish any peculiar and distinctive doctrines, as to assert, for individuals and churches, more liberty and independence in relation to matters of faith and practice, to shake off the authority of human creeds and the shackles of prescribed modes and forms, to make the Bible their only guide, claiming for every man the right to be his own expositor of it, to judge, for himself, what are its doctrines and requirements, and in practice, to follow more strictly the simplicity of the apostles and primitive Christians.

This, then, more than any other, appears to be the distinctive principle of the Christian denomination. Holding the belief to be indispensable, that the Scriptures were given by inspiration, that they are of divine authority, and that they are the only sufficient rule for the moral government and direction of man, they maintain that every man has the right to be his own interpreter of them, and that diversity of sentiment is not a bar to church fellowship, while the very basis of other, or most sects, and their condition of communion, seems to be an agreement to a particular interpretation of the Bible, a concurrence of sentiment in relation to its doctrines. With these views, the Christian connexion profess to deprecate what they consider an undue influence of a mere sectarian spirit, a tenacious adherence to particular dogmas, as an infringement of Christian liberty, as adverse to the genius of the gospel and the practical influence of true religion. They maintain that this spirit enters too much into the principles and regulations by which religious bodies are generally governed.

In New England, where the Christian denomination seems first to have attracted attention by any public demonstration or organization as a distinct sect, it was composed, principally, of individuals who separated from the Calvinistic Baptists. Soon after the formation of their first churches, several large churches of the Calvinistic Baptists declared themselves independent of the Baptist association and united with them. The Free-will and Six-principle Baptists opened their doors to their ministers, and it was expected that they would ultimately amalgamate; they, however, still, (1833,) continue distinct sects with very amicable relations subsisting between them. In the southern states, the first associations of this sect consisted, mostly, of seceders from the Methodists, and, in the western states, from the Presbyterians. Prompted by the leading motives which have been stated to the formation of an independent organization or sect, the individuals who composed it still held many of the doctrines and cherished a prejudice in favor of some of the usages and practices of the sects from which they had respectively withdrawn. Hence we can scarcely affirm, with justice, that any doctrine was, at first, held by them in common, or as a body; their distinguishing characteristic being universal toleration. At first, they were generally Trinitarians; subsequently they have, almost unanimously, rejected the Trinitarian doctrine as unscriptural.

But though toleration is still their predominant principle, and it would be wide of the truth to say that any doctrine is universally held by the connexion, or is considered indispensable to membership, still it may be asserted, with confidence, that discussion in their periodicals and personal intercourse and conference, have produced a manifest approximation to unanimity of sentiment, and that the following are very generally regarded as Scripture doctrines:—That there is one living and true God, the Father almighty, who is unoriginated, independent, and eternal, the Creator and Supporter of all worlds; and that this God is one spiritual intelligence, one infinite mind, ever the same, never varying: That this God is the moral Governor of the world, the absolute source of all the blessings of nature, providence and grace, in whose infinite wisdom, goodness, mercy, benevolence and love have originated all his moral dispensations to man: That all men sin and come short of the glory of God, consequently fall under the curse of the law: That Christ is the Son of God, the promised Messiah and Savior of the world, the Mediator between God and man, by whom God has revealed his will to mankind; by whose sufferings, death and resurrection a way has been provided by which sinners may obtain salvation, may lay hold on eternal life; that he is appointed of God to raise the dead and judge the world at the last day: That the Holy Spirit is the power and energy of God, that holy influence of God by whose agency, in the use of means, the wicked are regenerated, converted and recovered to a virtuous and holy life, sanctified and made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light; and that, by the same Spirit, the saints, in the use of means, are freed, strengthened and led in the path of duty: The free forgiveness of sins, flowing from the rich mercy of God, through the labors, sufferings and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ: The necessity of repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ: The absolute necessity of holiness of heart and rectitude of life to enjoy the favor and approbation of God: The doctrine of a future state of immortality: The doctrine of a righteous retribution, in which God will render to every man according to the deeds done in the body: The baptism of believers by immersion: And the open communion at the Lord's table of Christians of every denomination having a good standing in their respective churches.

The principles upon which their churches were at first constituted, and upon which they still stand, are the following: The Scriptures are taken to be the only rule of faith and practice, each individual being at liberty to determine, for himself, in relation to these matters, what they enjoin: No member is subject to the loss of church fellowship on account of his sincere and conscientious belief, so long as he manifestly lives a pious and devout life: No member is subject to discipline and church censure but for disorderly and immoral conduct: The name Christian to be adopted, to the exclusion of all sectarian names, as the most appropriate designation of the body and its members: The only condition or test of admission as a member of a church is a personal profession of the Christian religion, accompanied with satisfactory evidence of sincerity and piety, and a determination to live according to the divine rule or the gospel of Christ. Each church is considered an independent body, possessing exclusive authority to regulate and govern its own affairs.

For the purpose of promoting the general interest and prosperity of the connexion by mutual efforts and joint counsels, associations were formed, denominated Conferences. Ministers and churches, represented by delegates, formed themselves, in each state, into one or more conferences called State Conferences, and delegates from these conferences formed the United States General Christian Conference. This general conference has been given up. The local or state conferences are still continued, possessing, however, no authority or control over the independence of the churches. In twenty of the United States, there are now, (1833,) thirty-two conferences, one in Upper Canada, and one in the province of New Brunswick. The number of their ministers is estimated at about 700, of churches 1000, of communicants, from 75,000 to 100,000, and from 250 to 300,000 who entertain their views and attend upon their ministry.

Several periodicals have been published under the patronage of the connexion; the principal of which are, the Christian Herald at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, the Gospel Luminary at New York, the Christian Messenger at Georgetown, Kentucky, and the Christian Palladium at Rochester, New York.

A convention of ministers and private brethren, from various parts of the country, was held at Milan, Dutchess county, New York, in October last, by which it was proposed to the connexion to form an association, to be called "the Christian Union Book Association," to be composed of one delegate from each conference in the connexion. The object of this association is the general supervision, charge and direction of such matters as concern the connexion at large—such as the publication of books, periodicals, &c., and the disposition of such surplus funds as may accrue from the publication and sale of books, or otherwise, as they may think most conducive to the common interest and prosperity of the connexion. It was also recommended by the convention, that the several periodicals then published under the patronage of the connexion, should be merged as soon as practicable in one to be published and called the Gospel Palladium. In pursuance of this recommendation, the Gospel Luminary and its patronage have already been transferred to the Gospel Palladium, published at Broadalbin, Montgomery county, N. Y.

A charter was obtained, in 1832, from the legislature of Indiana, for a Christian college, to be located in New Albany.

The education of many of the ministers of the connexion, who universally preach extempore, is defective. Their maxim has been, "Let him who understands the gospel teach it." They have considered the preparation of the heart more important than the embellishment of the mind. They have, notwithstanding, many preachers who appear as scribes well instructed, who have acquitted themselves with credit as writers, and the sentiment is fast gaining ground among them, that literature and science are very useful auxiliaries in the illustration and enforcement of divine truth.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED, (THE PREACHING OF.) Crucifixion was a mode of capital punishment, inflicted only upon criminals of the lowest rank and the most aggravated turpitude. Hence the words, Christ crucified, signify the Messiah, that is, the anointed Savior of mankind, suffering a most painful and ignominious death. The phrase combines together the two ideas of the exalted nature and the deep humiliation of Christ Jesus. It denotes the two leading features of the plan of redemption, which he came upon earth to accomplish, and the development of which constitutes the glorious gospel of the blessed God. For a system is never designated otherwise than by its most prominent features. We are informed by the apostle Paul, (1 Cor. 1: 22—24.) that the doctrine expressed by these terms met with general opposition, both from Jews and Gentiles; yet to those who really understood and embraced it, it was not only rich in divine efficacy, but radiant with divine wisdom; and worthy therefore of unhesitating and universal promulgation, notwithstanding all the specious objections which were urged against it, and all the sufferings and reproaches to which it subjected him and his associates.

I. WHAT IS INVOLVED IN THIS PREACHING.—Some of the most important facts alluded to in these terms, I suppose, says Dr. Wayland, to be the following. The whole race of man, in consequence of the sin of our first parents, having become sinners, and being thus exposed to the punishment denounced against sin, he, who was in the beginning with God, and who was God, by whom all things were made, became flesh, that is, took upon him our nature; he died for our sins according to the Scriptures; by his death, or expiatory sacrifice, the obstacles to our pardon, arising from the justice of God, are removed, so that God can now be just, and yet the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. Hence pardon and eternal life can be freely offered to all mankind; for God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. And in confirmation of the truth of all this, the Messiah was raised from the dead, he ascended into heaven, whence he will one day come to judge both the quick and the dead.

II. OBJECTIONS TO SUCH PREACHING.—To this doctrine a variety of objections have been made. They may all, however, be reduced to two classes; first, those which are derived from the nature of the doctrine itself; and secondly, those which are drawn from the sacred Scriptures. By the first class of objections, it is intended to show that such doctrines could not be true; by the second, that they are not revealed to us from God. It is to the first of these classes of objections, that the apostle refers in the text, and it is to this class we shall here chiefly advert.

1. It is said that such a mode of existence, as is implied in the essential Deity of Christ, is inconceivable and impossible.

2. That if Christ be God, it is incredible that he should manifest such a degree of regard to a world so small and insignificant as this, in comparison with the universe.

3. That the union of the divine and human natures in the person of the Messiah is replete with contradictions.

4. That the substitution of the innocent for the guilty is unjust, and derogatory to the divine character.

5. That the sufferings of Christ in human nature could not, after all, make an atonement for sin.

III. ANSWERS TO THE OBJECTIONS.—To these a priori objections it is replied, without descending to particulars,

1. They are unphilosophical. The questions to be settled are matters of fact, and must be settled, not by theory, but by evidence. The objections proceed upon an erroneous estimate of the powers of the human understanding. They suppose us capable of deciding by our own knowledge on such subjects as the mode of existence of the Deity; the nature and extent of those relations which exist between man and his fellow-creatures, and man and his Creator; the evil and the just desert of sin; the number of modes of possible existence; the abstract nature of holiness in the Deity, and the ways in which that holiness can and cannot be exhibited before the created universe.

2. The facts on which the question rests have been proved, in our judgment, by the laws of evidence, and by the laws of interpretation.

3. The objections are in no manner inconsistent with the supposition that the doctrines in question are true. For, in the first place, they are precisely such objections as we should expect to arise if that were the fact. And in the second place, they may be made with equal force against much which is universally allowed to be incontrovertible fact.

4. We preach Christ crucified, notwithstanding these objections, also, because we perceive its fundamental principles to be in perfect harmony with the highest and most general laws of God's moral government.

5. Because it has always been effectual to accomplish the object which we have in view, the moral renovation of man.

6. Lastly. We insist upon the preaching of Christ crucified, because it is the only moral system which has ever proved effectual to the reformation of man.

"From the above considerations it will be readily perceived, that objections drawn from what may be considered the nature of things, are misapplied when urged against the facts which claim to be revealed in the Scriptures. The only questions to be discussed, are, first, Are the Scriptures true? and secondly, What do the Scriptures teach? The one question is to be answered by the science of evidence, and the other by the science of interpretation. Here is the ground and the only ground for argument. To these points let the unbeliever in these doctrines direct his attacks, and these points let the believer be prepared to defend. When this shall have been done, we may hope to see this controversy brought to a definite and decisive issue.

"Let us who profess to believe the doctrine of Christ crucified, preach it every where, on all occasions, and under all circumstances. This doctrine, and this only, possesses that divine energy by which men have been converted unto God. We may be considered illiberal, prejudiced, obtuse of intellect; but let us not be ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation. We believe it to be truth; and if it be truth, it is great and must prevail. With kindness and charity, and yet in simplicity and fidelity, let us resolve to know nothing among men but Jesus Christ and him crucified.

"Nor in all this is there any sectarianism. We believe these doctrines to be true, and suppose ourselves able to show them to be so. We esteem them vitally important to the temporal and to the eternal interests of men. As intelligent beings, we have a right to promulgate them as widely as we choose, and to convince of their truth as many as we are able. It will be sectarianism whenever we underrate the talents, disparage the motives, curtail the influence, or violate in the slightest manner the rights of those who differ from us. But if we do none of this, it is no sectarianism by fair argument to give our sentiments all the influence in our power. We cheerfully concede to others the right which we claim for ourselves. If our claim be allowed, we rejoice; but if not, we must be pardoned if, as we suppose in obedience to God, we still preach Christ and him crucified." See Dr. Wayland's admirable sermon, "Objections to the Doctrine of Christ crucified considered." Also, Fuller's Works, vol. ii. pp. 350, 391; Works of Robert Hall, vol. i. 265. iii. 340—430.

CHRISTMAS; the day on which the nativity of our blessed Savior is celebrated.

The first traces that we find of the observation of this day, are in the second century, about the time of the emperor Commodus. The decretal epistles, indeed, carry it up a little higher, and say that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, ordered divine service to be celebrated, and an angelic hymn to be sung the night before the nativity of our Savior. That it was kept before the time of Constantine, we have a melancholy proof; for whilst the persecution raged under Dioclesian, who then kept his court at Nicomedia, that tyrant, among other acts of cruelty, finding multitudes of Christians assembled together to celebrate Christ's nativity, commanded the church doors where they were met to be shut, and fire to be put to it, which soon reduced them and the church to ashes.

In the Roman church three masses are performed: one at midnight, one at daybreak, and one in the morning; and both in the Greek and Roman churches the manger, the holy family, &c. are sometimes represented at large. Some convents at Rome, chiefly the Franciscans, are famous for attracting the people by such theatrical exhibitions.

This feast is also celebrated in the church of England, and in the Lutheran churches, but is rejected by the church of Scotland and the Dissenters; though, in England, some of the latter embrace the opportunity of having preaching, it being a day on which little or no business is done; others object to this as apparently symbolizing with human inventions.

The custom of making presents on Christmas eve is derived from an old heathen usage, practised among the northern nations, at the feast of the birth of Sol, on the 25th of December, to which it succeeded, and retained the name of Yule or Inul; i. e. the "Wheel," or revolution of the sun.

Whether this festival was always observed on the 25th of December, is a point which has been greatly disputed. Dr. Cave is of opinion, that it was at first kept by the Eastern church in January, and confounded with the Epiphany; till, receiving better information from the Western churches, they changed it to that day. Chrysostom, in an homily on this very subject, affirms, that it was not above ten years since, in that church (that of Antioch), it began first to be observed upon that day; and he offers several reasons to prove that to be the true day of Christ's nativity. Clemens Alexandrinus reckons, from the birth of Christ to the death of Commodus, exactly one hundred and ninety-four years, one month, and thirteen days. These years, being taken according to the Egyptian account, and reduced to the Julian style, make the birth of Christ to fall on the 25th or 26th of the month of December. Yet, notwithstanding this, the same father tells us, in the same place, that there were some who, more curiously searching after the year and day of Christ's nativity, affixed the latter to the 25th of the month Pachon. Now, in that year in which Christ was born, the month Pachon commenced the 20th of April; so that, according to this computation, Christ was born on the 16th of May. Hence we may see how little certainty there is in this matter, since, so soon after the event, the learned were divided in opinion concerning it.

Mr. Selden, in his "Table-Talk," speaking of this festival, says, "Christmas succeeds the Saturnalia; the same time, the same number of holidays; and then the master waited upon the servant like the lord of misrule."

"Our meats and our sports (much of them) have relation to church-works. The coffin of our Christmas pies, in shape long, is in imitation of the cratch. Our choosing kings and queens, on Twelfth-night, hath reference to the three kings. So likewise our eating of fritters, whipping of tops, roasting of herrings, jack of lents, &c., they were all in imitation of church-works, emblems of martyrdom. Our tansies at Easter have reference to the bitter herb, though, at the same time, it was always the fashion for a man to have a gammon of bacon, to show himself to be no Jew."—Hend. Buck.

CHRISTO SACRUM; the denomination of a society founded at Delft, in Holland, in 1801, by Onder de Winaard, an aged burgomaster of that city. The object of the society is to reconcile all denominations who admit the divinity of Jesus Christ, and redemption by the merits of his passion. This society, originally formed of four persons, is said to have increased to two or three thousand.

A more recent account (1809) says the society is not extinct, neither is it much augmented; although it has been acknowledged by government, and mentioned in the Royal Almanac. They admit members from all Christian societies (within the limits above mentioned), but use no efforts to make proselytes.

Their place of worship at Delft is very elegant, having three desks, gradually rising, for the reader, clerk, and preacher: the latter, at least, is gratuitous. They have published several works in defence of their own principles. See Grégoire's Hist. vol. i. p. 261. comp. vol. ii. p. 439.—Williams.

CHRONICLES, (BOOKS OF.) This name is given to two historical books of Scripture, which the Hebrews call Dibri-Jamim, "Words of Days," that is, "Diaries," or "Journals." They are called in the Seventy, Paralipomena, which signifies, "things omitted;" as if these books were a supplement of what had been omitted, or too much abridged, in the books of Kings, and other historical books of Scripture. And, indeed, we find in them many particulars which are not extant elsewhere: but it must not be thought that these are the records, or books of the acts, of the kings of Judah and Israel, so often referred to. Those ancient registers were much more extensive than these are; and the books of Chronicles themselves refer to those original memoirs, and make long extracts from them. They were compiled, and probably by Ezra, from the ancient chronicles of the kings of Judah and Israel just now mentioned, and they may be considered as a kind of supplement to the preceding books of Scripture. The former part of the first book of Chronicles contains a great variety of genealogical tables, beginning with Adam; and in particular gives a circumstantial account of the twelve tribes, which must have been very valuable to the Jews after their return from captivity. The descendants of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David, from all of whom it was predicted that the Savior of the world should be born, are here marked with precision. These genealogies occupy the first nine chapters, and in the tenth is recorded the death of Saul. From the eleventh chapter to the end of the book, we have a history of the reign of David, with a detailed statement of his preparation for the building of the temple, of his regulations respecting the priests and Levites, and his appointment of musicians for the public service of religion. The second book of Chronicles contains a brief sketch of the Jewish history, from the accession of Solomon to the return from the Babylonian captivity, being a period of four hundred and eighty years; and in both these books we find many particulars not noticed in the other historical books of Scripture.

There are many variations, as well in facts as in dates, between the books of Kings and the Chronicles, which are to be explained and reconciled, chiefly on the principle, that the latter are supplementary to the former: not forgetting that the language was slightly varied from what it had been; that various places had received new names, or had undergone sundry vicissitudes; that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews, under other appellations than what they formerly had been distinguished by; and that from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the kings, the author takes those passages which seemed to him best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. It must be considered too, that he often elucidates obsolete and ambiguous words, in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words used: even when he does not use a distinct phraseology of narration, which he sometimes does.—Watson; Calmet.

CHRONICLE, (SAMARITAN,) of Abul-Phathach; a history of events, otherwise known under the name of the "Book of Joshua," a copy of which, now in the university of Oxford, was procured by Huntington, from the Samaritans at Naplose, and another was in the possession of the learned Schnurrer. The former extends from the creation of the world to the year of our Lord 1492; the latter only to the time of Mahomet.—Hend. Buck.

CHRONOLOGY, (SACRED,) is the science of computing and adjusting periods of time, and is, necessarily, of considerable importance in relation to Scripture history. See TIME.

The chronology adopted by the English translators, and placed in the margin of the larger Bibles, is that of the masoretic, or common Hebrew text; but of the authenticity of this, strong doubts are entertained by several biblical critics. They observe that, compared with the more extended chronology of the Septuagint, it is of modern adoption; the venerable Bede, who flourished in the eighth century, having been the first Christian writer who manifested a predilection for it. It has been further observed, that prior to the reformation, the views of the celebrated monk of Duham had made but little progress among the clergy, and that when Luther roused the attention of Europe to the errors of the ancient communion, the authority of the Greek version and the unanimous consent of the primitive writers were still found to regulate all the calculations concerning the age of the world. That in the warmth of the controversy which ensued, the more rigid Protestants were induced to rank, among the corruptions of the Western church, the chronology of the Samaritan Pentateuch, of the Seventy, and of Josephus; they resolutely pronounced that the numbers of the original text were to be preferred to those of any version; and forthwith bestowed the weight of their authority upon the Jewish side of the question, and opposed that which the Christians had maintained from the days of the apostles.

The chief difference between these two schemes of chronology, is found in those periods which extend from the creation to the deluge, and from thence to the birth of Abraham. According to the Hebrew computation, the number of years comprised in the first period, amounts only to 1656, and the second to 292. But in the Septuagint, the numbers respectively are 2262, and 1072; thus extending the interval between the creation and the birth of Christ, from 4000 to nearly 6000 years. These variations have not yet been satisfactorily accounted for, but must be regarded has been thrown upon the subject by the laborious investigations of Hayes, Jackson, and Hales; and the result with many, though not with all, has been to give an increased degree of confidence in the larger computations of the Septuagint. We think, however, that internal probability, as well as the Hebrew text, is against it.

We need not enlarge on the different systems of ancient and modern chronologers, concerning the years of the world. Those who would study these matters, must consult those authors who have expressly treated the subject. We have followed Usher in the chronology of the Old Testament, with some trifling differences only; and among the appendices is a Chronological Table, with the dates inserted according to Dr. Hales.

AGES OF THE WORLD. The time preceding the birth of Jesus Christ, has generally been divided into six ages: (1.) from the beginning of the world to the deluge; comprehending 1656 years—(2.) from the deluge to Abraham's entering the land of promise, in A. M. 2082; comprehending 426 years—(3.) from Abraham's entrance of the promised land, to the exodus, A. M. 2513, comprehending 431 years—(4.) from the exodus to the foundation of the temple by Solomon, A. M. 2992, comprehending 479 years—(5.) from the foundation of the temple to the Babylonish captivity, in A. M. 3416, comprehending 424 years—(6.) from the captivity to the birth of Christ, A. M. 4000, the fourth year before the vulgar era, or A. D., comprehending 584 years.—Calmet.

CHRYSOLITE; a precious stone, probably the tenth on the high-priest's pectoral; bearing the name of Zebulon, Exod. 28: 20; 39: 19. It is transparent, the color of gold, with a mixture of green, which displays a fine lustre. The Hebrew (tarshish) is translated by the LXX, and by Jerome, sometimes, carbuncle; by the rabbins, beryl: it was the seventh foundation of the New Jerusalem, Rev. 21: 20.—Calmet.

CHRYSOGONUS, a worthy Christian of Aquileia, who was beheaded, about the year 304, by order of Dioclesian, for having instructed a young lady of that city in the Christian faith.—Fox.

CHRYSOPRASUS; the tenth of those precious stones which adorned the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem; its color was green, inclining to gold, as its name imports, Rev. 21: 20.—Calmet.

CHRYSOSTOM, (JOHN), was born at Antioch, about A. D. 344. He was of a noble family, and his father, whose name was Secundus, was a general of cavalry. The name of Chrysostom, which signifies golden mouth, he acquired by his eloquence. He has also been called the Homer of orators, and compared to the sun. Successful at the bar, for which he was educated, he quitted it, to become, for six years, an ascetic. When he emerged from his retirement, he became a preacher, and gained such high reputation for his piety and oratorical talents, that he was raised to be patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 398. At length he incurred the hatred of the empress Eudoxia, and was sent into exile, in which he died, A. D. 407. There are three editions of his works in eight, ten, and thirteen folio volumes.—Davenport.

CHUB, a word which occurs only in Ezek. 30: 5. and probably signifies the Cubians, placed by Ptolemy in the Marcotis. Bochart takes it to be Paliurus, a city in Marmarica, because the Syriac word denotes paliurus, a sort of thorn.—Calmet.

CHUBB, (THOMAS), a controversial deist, was born, in 1673, at East Harrah, near Salisbury, was successively a glover, a tallow-chandler, and a sort of humble companion or dependant in the family of Sir Joseph Jekyll. He died in 1717. His first work, which appeared in 1715, was entitled, The Supremacy of the Father asserted, and this was followed by several others. His posthumous pieces were published in two volumes, in 1748. However erroneous his opinions may be, Chubb was a well-meaning and modest man, with a respectable share of talent and information.—Davenport.

CHURCH, (Scottish kirk, Danish, &c. kirke, German kirche), is generally derived from the Greek ekklesia, what belongs, or is appropriated to the Lord (Kurius); though some think it is from the German kirchen, to meet, choose out, and so corresponding to the Greek ekklesia, from ek, out of, and kaleo, I call. 1. The Greek word ekklesia, properly denotes an assembly called together upon business, whether lawful or unlawful, Acts 19: 32, 39.—

2. It is understood of the collective body of Christians, or all those over the face of the earth who profess to believe in Christ, and acknowledge him to be the Savior of mankind. Eph. 3: 21. 1 Tim. 3: 15. Eph. 4: 11, 12.—3. By the word church, also, we are to understand the whole body of God's chosen people, in every period of time. Those on earth are also called the militant, and those in heaven the triumphant church. Heb. 12: 23. Acts 20: 28. Eph. 1: 22. Matt. 16: 28.—4. By a particular church we understand an assembly of Christians united together, and meeting in one place for the solemn worship of God. To this agrees the definition given by the compilers of the thirty-nine articles of the church of England:—"A congregation of faithful men, in which the true word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinances, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." Acts 9: 31. Gal. 1: 2, 22. 1 Cor. 14: 34. Acts 20: 17. Col. 4: 15.—5. The word is now used also to denote any particular denomination of Christians distinguished by particular doctrines, ceremonies, &c.; as the Romish church, Greek church, English church, &c.—6. The word church is also improperly used to denote the building in which the members of the establishment meet for public worship. The Christians of the first century worshipped in private houses, or in the open air, in remote places, because they were not acknowledged by the state, and were often persecuted. It was not till the third century that they could venture to give more publicity to their service, and build places of worship. After the fourth century, churches became large, and, in many instances, magnificent edifices. Many heathen temples were converted into churches; and, in the middle ages, edifices were erected for the professed worship of Him who "dwelleth not in temples made with hands," which in loftiness and grandeur were never surpassed. Excepting St. Paul's in London, the Protestants have not erected any very splendid church; and, indeed, their principal object in the construction of their places of worship is, what it ever ought to be, the accommodation of the hearers. In the Roman Catholic and Greek communions, on the contrary, the effect on the eye is every thing.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, (CONGREGATIONAL.) See CONGREGATIONALISTS.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND, is the church established by law in that kingdom.

When and by whom Christianity was first introduced into Britain, cannot perhaps be exactly ascertained. Eusebius, indeed, positively declares that it was by the apostles and their disciples. (See CLAUDIA.) It is also said that numbers of persons professed the Christian faith there about the year 150; and according to Usher, there was in the year 182, a school of learning, to provide the British churches with proper teachers. Popery, however, was established in England by Austin the monk; (see AUSTIN), and the errors of it we find every where prevalent, until Wickliffe was raised up by divine providence to refute them. The church of England remained in subjection to the pope until the time of Henry VIII. Henry, indeed, in early life, and during the former part of his reign, was a bigoted papist. He burnt the famous Tyndal (who made one of the first and best translations of the New Testament), and wrote in defence of the seven sacraments against Luther, for which the pope gave him the title of "The Defender of the Faith." But, falling out with the pope about his marriage, he took the government of ecclesiastical affairs into his own hand, and, having reformed many abuses, entitled himself supreme head of the church. (See REFORMATION.)

The doctrines of the church of England, which are contained in the thirty-nine articles, are certainly Calvinistical, though this has been denied by some modern writers, especially by Dr. Kipling, in a tract entitled "The Articles of the church of England proved not to be Calvinistical." These articles were founded, for the most part, upon a body of articles compiled and published in the reign of Edward VI. They were first passed in the convocation, and confirmed by royal authority in 1562. They were afterwards ratified anew in the year 1571, and again by Charles I. The law requires a subscription to these articles, of all persons who are admitted into holy orders. In the course of the last century, disputes arose among the clergy respecting the propriety of subscribing to any human formulary of religious sentiments. An application for its removal was made to parliament, in 1772, by the petitioning clergy, and received the most public discussion in the house of commons, but was rejected in the house of lords.

The government of the church of England is episcopal. The king is the supreme head. There are two archbishops, and twenty-four bishops. The benefices of the bishops were converted by William the Conqueror into temporal baronies; so that every prelate has a seat and a vote in the house of peers. Dr. Hoadley, however, in a sermon preached from this text—"My kingdom is not of this world," insisted that the clergy had no pretensions to temporal jurisdiction; which gave rise to various publications, termed, by way of eminence, the Bangorian Controversy, because Hoadley was then bishop of Bangor. Dr. Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, formed a project of peace and union between the English and Gallican churches, founded upon this condition, that each of the two communities should retain the greatest part of their respective and peculiar doctrines; but this project came to nothing. In the church of England there are deans, archdeacons, rectors, vicars, &c.; for an account of which see the respective articles.

The church of England has a public form read, called a liturgy. It was composed in 1547, and has undergone several alterations, the last of which was in 1661. Since that time, several attempts have been made to amend the liturgy, articles, and some other things relating to the internal government, but without effect. There are many excellencies in the liturgy; and, in the opinion of the most impartial Grotius (who was no member of this church), "it comes so near the primitive pattern, that none of the reformed churches can compare with it." See LITURGY.

The greatest part of the inhabitants of England are professedly members of this church; but, perhaps, very few either of her ministers or members strictly adhere to the articles in their true sense. Those who are called methodistic or evangelical preachers in the establishment, are allowed to come the nearest.

More's Hints on forming the Character of a Young Princess, vol. 2: ch. 37. CHURCH, (GALLICAN), denotes the ci-devant church of France under the government of its respective bishops and pastors. This church always enjoyed certain franchises and immunities, not as grants from popes, but as leaved to her, from her first original, and which she took care never to relinquish. These liberties depended upon two maxims; the first, that the pope had no right to order any thing in which the temporalities and civil rights of the kingdom were concerned; the second, that, notwithstanding the pope's supremacy was admitted in cases purely spiritual, yet in France his power was limited by the decrees of ancient councils received in that realm.

The liberties or privileges of the Gallican church are founded upon these two maxims, and the most considerable of them are as follows:—

1. The king of France has a right to convene synods, or provincial and national councils, in which, amongst other important matters relating to the preservation of the state, cases of ecclesiastical discipline are likewise debated.

2. The pope's legates à latere, who are empowered to reform abuses, and to exercise the other parts of their legatine office, are never admitted into France unless at the desire or with the consent of the king; and whatever the legates do there, is with the approbation and allowance of the king.

3. The legate of Avignon cannot exercise his commission in any of the king's dominions, till after he hath obtained his majesty's leave for that purpose.

4. The prelates of the Gallican church, being summoned by the pope, cannot depart the realm upon any pretence whatever, without the king's permission.

5. The pope has no authority to levy any tax or imposition upon the temporalities of the ecclesiastical preferments, upon any pretence, either of loan, vacancy, annates, tithes, procurations, or otherwise, without the king's order, and the consent of the clergy.

6. The pope has no authority to depose the king, or grant away his dominions to any person whatever. His holiness can neither excommunicate the king, nor absolve his subjects from their allegiance.

7. The pope likewise has no authority to excommunicate the king's officers, for their executing and discharging their respective offices and functions.

8. The pope has no right to take cognizance, either by himself, or his delegates, of any pre-eminences, or privileges, belonging to the crown of France, the king being not obliged to argue his prerogatives in any court but his own.

9. Counts palatine, made by the pope, are not acknowledged as such in France, nor allowed to make use of their privileges and powers, any more than those created by the emperor.

10. It is not lawful for the pope to grant licenses to churchmen, the king's subjects, or to any others holding benefices in the realm of France, to bequeath the issues and profits of their respective preferments, contrary to any branch of the king's laws, or the customs of the realm; nor to hinder the relations of the beneficed clergy, or monks, to succeed to their estates, when they enter into religious orders, and are professed.

11. The pope cannot grant to any person a dispensation to enjoy any estate or revenues in France, without the king's consent.

12. The pope cannot grant a license to ecclesiastics to alienate church lands, situate and lying in France, without the king's consent, upon any pretence whatever.

13. The king may punish his ecclesiastical officers for misbehavior in their respective charges, notwithstanding the privilege of their orders.

14. No person has any right to hold any benefice in France, unless he be either a native of the country, naturalized by the king, or has a royal dispensation for that purpose.

15. The pope is not superior to an ecumenical or general council.

16. The Gallican church does not receive, without distinction, all the canons, and all the decretal epistles, but keeps principally to that ancient collection, called Corpus Canoniarum, the same which pope Adrian sent to Charlemagne towards the end of the eighth century, and which, in the year 860, under the pontificate of Nicolas I., the French bishops declared to be the only canon law they were obliged to acknowledge, maintaining that, in this body, the liberties of the Gallican church consisted.

17. The pope has no power, for any cause whatsoever, to dispense with the law of God, the law of nature, or the decrees of the ancient canons.

18. The regulations of the apostolic chamber, or court, are not obligatory to the Gallican church, unless confirmed by the king's edicts.

19. If the primates or metropolitans appeal to the pope, his holiness is obliged to try the cause, by commissioners, or delegates, in the same diocese from which the appeal was made.

20. When a Frenchman desires the pope to give him a benefice lying in France, his holiness is obliged to order him an instrument, sealed under the faculty of his office; and, in case of refusal, it is lawful for the person pretending to the benefice to apply to the parliament of Paris, which court shall send instructions to the bishop of the diocese to give him institution, which institution shall be of the same validity as if he had received his title under the seals of the court of Rome.

21. No mandates from the pope, enjoining a bishop or other collator to present any person to a benefice upon a vacancy, are admitted in France.

22. It is only by suffrage that the pope has what they call a right of prevention, to collate to benefices, which the ordinary has not disposed of.

23. It is not lawful for the pope to exempt the ordinary of any monastery, or any other ecclesiastical corporation, from the jurisdiction of their respective dioceses, in order to make the person so exempted immediately dependent on the holy see.

These liberties are esteemed inviolable; and the French kings, at their coronation, solemnly swear to preserve and maintain them. The oath runs thus:—Promitto vobis et perdo no quod unicuique de vobis et ecclesiis vobis commissis canonica privilegium et debitam legem atque justitiam servabo.

In the established church the Jansenists were very numerous. The bishoprics and prebends were entirely in the gift of the king; and no other Catholic state, except Italy, had so numerous a clergy as France. There were in this kingdom eighteen archbishops, one hundred and eleven bishops, one hundred and sixty-six thousand clergymen, and three thousand four hundred convents, containing two hundred thousand persons devoted to a monastic life.

Since the repeal of the edict of Nantz, the Protestants have suffered much from persecution. A solemn law, which did much honor to Louis XVI., late king of France, gave to his non-Roman Catholic subjects, as they were called, all the civil advantages and privileges of their Roman Catholic brethren.

The above statement was made previously to the French revolution: great alterations have taken place since that period. And it may be interesting, to those who have not the means of fuller information, to give a sketch of the causes which gave rise to those important events.

About the middle of the last century, a conspiracy was formed to overthrow Christianity, without distinction of worship, whether Protestant or Catholic. Voltaire, D'Alembert, Frederic II. king of Prussia, and Diderot, were at the head of this conspiracy. Numerous other adepts and secondary agents were induced to join them. These pretended philosophers used every artifice that impiety could invent, by union and secret correspondence to attack, to debase, and annihilate Christianity. They not only acted in concert, sparing no political or impious art to effect the destruction of the Christian religion, but they were the instigators, and conductors of those secondary agents whom they had seduced, and pursued their plan with all the ardor and constancy which denotes the most finished conspirators.

The French clergy amounted to one hundred and thirty thousand, the higher orders of whom enjoyed immense revenues; but the cures, or great body of acting clergy, seldom possessed more than twenty-eight pounds sterling a-year, and the vicars about half the sum. The clergy, as a body, independent of their titles, possessed a revenue arising from their property in land, amounting to five millions sterling annually; at the same time they were exempt from taxation. Before the levelling system had taken place, the clergy signified to the commons the instructions of their constituents, to contribute to the exigencies of the state in equal proportion with the other citizens. Not contented with this offer, the tithes and revenues of the clergy were taken away; in lieu of which, it was proposed to grant a certain stipend to the different ministers of religion, to be payable by the nation. The possessions of the church were then considered as national property by a decree of the constituent assembly. The religious orders, viz. the communities of monks and nuns, possessed immense landed estates; and, after having abolished the orders, the assembly seized the estates for the use of the nation: the gates of the cloisters were now thrown open. The next step of the assembly was to establish what is called the civil constitution of the clergy. This, the Roman Catholics assert, was in direct opposition to their religion. But though opposed with energetic eloquence, the decree passed, and was soon after followed by another, obliging the clergy to swear to maintain their civil constitution. Every artifice which cunning, and every menace which cruelty could invent, were used to induce them to take the oath; great numbers, however, refused. One hundred and thirty-eight bishops and archbishops, sixty-eight curates or vicars, were on this account driven from their sees and parishes. Three hundred of the priests were massacred in one day in one city. All the other pastors who adhered to their religion, were either sacrificed, or banished from their country, seeking through a thousand dangers a refuge among foreign nations. A perusal of the horrid massacres of the priests who refused to take the oaths, and the various forms of persecution employed by those who were attached to the Catholic religion, must deeply wound the feelings of humanity. Those readers who are desirous of further information, are referred to Abbé Barruel's "History of the Clergy."

Some think that there was another cause of the revolution, and which may be traced as far back at least as the revocation of the edict of Nantz in the seventeenth century, when the great body of French Protestants, who were men of principle, were either murdered or banished, and the rest in a manner silenced. The effect of this sanguinary measure (say they) must needs be the general prevalence of infidelity. Let the religious part of any nation be banished, and a general spread of irreligion must necessarily follow: such were the effects in France. Through the whole of the eighteenth century, infidelity was the fashion, and that not only among the princes and noblesse, but even among the greater part of the bishops and clergy. And as they had united their influence in banishing true religion, and cherishing the monster which succeeded it, so they were united in sustaining the calamitous effects which that monster has produced. However unprincipled and cruel the French revolutionists were, and however much the sufferers, as fellow-creatures, are entitled to our pity; yet, considering the event as the just retribution of God, we are constrained to say, "Thou art righteous, O Lord, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus; for they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy."

The Catholic religion is now again established, but with a toleration of the Protestants, under some restriction. See the Concordat, or religious establishment of the French republic, ratified Sept. 10th, 1801.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, (GREEK), that portion of professing Christians who conform in their creed, usages, and church government to the views of Christianity introduced into the former Greek empire, and matured, since the fifth century, under the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. A schism between the East and West might early have been anticipated. The foundation of a new Rome at Constantinople; the political partition of the Roman empire into the Oriental or Greek, and the Occidental or Latin; the elevation of the bishop of Constantinople to the place of second patriarch of Christendom, inferior only to the patriarch of Rome, effected in the councils of Constantinople, A. D. 381, and of Chalcedon, 451; the jealousy of the latter patriarch towards the growing power of the former,—were circumstances which, together with the ambiguity of the edict known under the name of the Henoticon, (which see), granted by the Greek emperor, Zeno, A. D. 482, produced a formal schism in what till then had formed the Catholic church. Felix II., patriarch of Rome, pronounced sentence of excommunication against the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, who had been the leading agents in the Henoticon, in A. D. 484, and thus cut off all ecclesiastical fellowship which the congregations of the East attached to these patriarchs. The sentiments of the imperial court being changed, the Roman patriarch, Hormisdas, was able, indeed, to compel a re-union of the Greek church with the Latin, in A. D. 519; but this union, never seriously intended, and loosely compacted, was again dissolved by the obstinacy of both parties, and the Roman sentence of excommunication against the Iconoclasts among the Greeks, in 733, and against Photius, the patriarch of Constantinople in 862. The augmentation of the Greek church, by the addition of newly-converted nations, excited afresh, about this time, the jealousy of the Roman pontiff; and his bearing towards the Greeks was the more haughty in consequence of his having renounced his allegiance to the Greek emperor, and had a sure, protection against him in the new Frankish Roman empire. Photius, on the other hand, charged the Latins with arbitrary conduct in inserting an unscriptural addition into the creed, respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost, and in altering many of the usages of the ancient orthodox church: for example, in forbidding their priests to marry, repeating the chrisim, and fasting on Saturday, as the Jewish Sabbath. But he complained, with justice, in particular, of the assumptions of the pope, who pretended to be the sovereign of all Christendom, and treated the Greek patriarchs as his inferiors. The deposition of this patriarch, twice effected by the pope, did not terminate the dispute between the Greeks and Latins: and when the patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, added to the charges of Photius, against the Latins, an accusation of heresy in 1054, on account of their use of unleavened bread at their communion, and of the blood of animals that had died by strangulation, as well as on account of the immorality of the Latin clergy in general, pope Leo IX. having in retaliation excommunicated him in the most insulting manner, a total separation ensued of the Greek church from the Latin. From this time, pride, obstinacy, and selfishness frustrated all the attempts which were made to re-unite the two churches, partly by the popes, in order to annex the East to their see, partly by the Greek emperors, in order to secure the assistance of the princes of the West against the Mahometans. Neither would yield to the other in respect to the contested points,—while the Catholic religion acquired a more complete and peculiar character under Gregory VII.; and, in consequence of the scholastic theology, the Greek church retained its creed as arranged by John of Damascus, in 730, and its ancient constitutions. The conquest of Constantinople by the French crusades and the Venetians, A. D. 1204, and the cruel oppressions which the Greeks had to endure from the Latins and the papal legates, only increased their exasperation; and although the Greek emperor Michael II. (Palæologus, who had reconquered Constantinople in 1261) consented to recognise the pope's supremacy, and by his envoys and some of the clergy who were devoted to him, abjured the points of separation, at the assembly held at Lyons in 1274; and though a joint synod was held at Constantinople in 1277, for the purpose of strengthening the union with the Latin church, the great body of the Greek church was nevertheless opposed to this step; and pope Martin IV. having excommunicated the emperor Michael in 1281, from political motives, the councils held at Constantinople in 1283 and 1285, by the Greek bishop, restored their old doctrines, and the separation from the Latins. The last attempt to unite the two churches was made by the Greek emperor, John VII., when very hard pressed by the Turks, together with the patriarch Joseph, in the councils held, first at Ferrara in 1438, and the next year at Florence, pope Eugene IV. presiding; but the union there concluded, having the appearance of submission to the Roman see, was altogether rejected by the Greek clergy and the nation at large, so that in fact the schism of the two churches continued. The efforts of the Greek emperors, who had always had most interest in these attempts at union, ceased with the overthrow of their empire, and the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453; and the exertions of the Roman Catholics to subject the Greek church effected nothing but the acknowledgment of some few Greek congregations in Italy, Hungary, Gallicia, Poland, and Lithuania, which congregations are now known under the name of United Greeks.

In the seventh century, the territory of the Greek church embraced, besides East Illyria, Greece Proper, with the Morea and the Archipelago, Asia Minor, Syria, with Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and numerous congregations in Mesopotamia and Persia; but the conquests of Mahomet and his successors have deprived it, since 630, of almost all its provinces in Asia and Africa; and even in Europe the number of its adherents was considerably diminished by the Turks in the fifteenth century. On the other hand, it was increased by the accession of several Slavonic nations, and especially by the Russians, who, under the great prince Vladimir, in the year 983, embraced the creed of the Greek Christians. To this nation the Greek church is indebted for the symbolical book, which, with the canons of the first and second Nicene, of the first, second, and third Constantinopolitan, of the Ephesian and Chalcedonian general councils, and of the Trullian council, held at Constantinople in 692, is the sole authority of its members in matters of doctrine. After the learned Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, had suffered martyrdom for his professed approbation of the principles of Protestantism, A. D. 1629, an exposition of the doctrines held by the Russians was drawn up in the Greek language, by Peter Mogislaus, bishop of Kiev, 1612, under the title of the "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ," signed and ratified 1643, by all the patriarchs of the Greek church, to whom had been added, in 1559, the patriarch of Moscow. It was printed in Holland, in Greek and Latin, 1662, with a preface by the patriarch Nectarius of Jerusalem. In 1696, it was published by the last Russian patriarch; and in 1722, at the command of Peter the Great, by the holy synod; it having been previously declared to be in all cases valid as the standard of the Greek church, by a council held at Jerusalem in 1672, and by the ecclesiastical rule of Peter the Great, drawn up in 1721, by Theophanes Procoviez.

Like the Roman Catholic, the Greek church recognises two sources of doctrine, the Bible and tradition, under which last it comprehends not only those doctrines which were orally delivered by the apostles, but also those which have been approved of by the Greek fathers, especially John of Damascus, as well as by the seven above-named general-councils. The other councils, whose authority is valid in the Latin communion, this church does not recognise; nor does it allow the patriarchs or synods to introduce new doctrines. It holds its tenets to be so obligatory and necessary, that they cannot be denied without the loss of salvation. It is the only church which holds that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father only: thus differing both from the Catholics and Protestants, who agree in deriving the third person both from the Father and the Son. Like the Latin church, it has seven sacraments: baptism, chrisim, the eucharist, confession, penance, ordination, marriage, and extreme unction; it is peculiar, first, in holding that full purification from original sin requires a true immersion, or aspersion, and in joining chrisim with it as the completion of baptism; secondly, in adopting, as to the eucharist, the doctrine of transubstantiation, but ordering the bread to be leavened, the wine to be mixed with water, and both elements to be distributed to the laity, even to children, the communicant receiving the bread in a spoon filled with the consecrated wine; thirdly, all the clergy, with the exception of the monks, and of the higher clergy chosen from among them, down to the bishops inclusively, are allowed to marry a virgin, but not a widow; nor are they allowed to marry a second time; and therefore the widowed clergy are not permitted to retain their livings, but go into a cloister, where they are called hieromonachi.

Rarely is a widowed bishop allowed to preserve his diocese; and from the maxims that marriage is not suitable for the higher clergy in general, and that second marriage is at least improper for the lower, there is no departure. The Greek church does not regard the marriage of the laity as indissoluble, and frequently grants divorces; but is as strict as the Roman church with respect to the forbidden degrees of relationship, especially of the ecclesiastical relationship of god-parents; nor does it allow the laity a fourth marriage. It differs from the Catholic church in anointing with the holy oil, not only the dying, but the sick, for the restoration of their health, the forgiveness of their sins, and the sanctification of their souls. It rejects the doctrine of purgatory, does not admit of predestination, denies works of supererogation, and disallows of indulgences and dispensations; only a printed form is sometimes given to the dead, at the request and for the comfort of the survivors. It allows no carved, sculptured, or molten images of holy persons or things; but the representations of Christ, of the virgin Mary, and the saints, which are objects of religious worship, both in churches and private houses, must be merely painted, and at most inlaid with precious stones. In the invocation of the saints, and especially of the virgin, the Greeks are as zealous as the Latins. They also hold relics, crosses, and graves to be sacred; and crossing themselves in the name of Jesus, they consider as having a wonderful and blessed influence. Besides fasting every Wednesday and Friday, they have four general fasts annually.

The service of the Greek church consists almost entirely in outward forms. Preaching and catechizing constitute the least part of it: indeed, in the seventeenth century, preaching was strictly forbidden in Russia, under the czar Alexis, to prevent the diffusion of novel doctrines. In Turkey, it is confined almost exclusively to the higher clergy, because they alone possess some degree of knowledge. Each congregation has its own choir of singers, instrumental music being altogether excluded from the Greek church. Besides the mass, which is regarded as the chief part of the service, the liturgy consists of passages of Scripture, prayers and legends of the saints, and in the recitation of the creed, or of sentences which the priest begins, and the people, officiating in a body, finish.

The convents, for the most part, conform to the strict rule of St. Basil. The Greek abbot is termed higumenos; the abbess, higumene. The abbot of a Greek convent, which has several others under its inspection, is termed archimandrite, and has a rank next to that of a bishop. The lower clergy in the Greek church consist of readers, singers, deacons, &c. and of priests, such as the popes and protopopes, or archpriests, who are the first clergy in the cathedrals and metropolitan churches. The members of the lower clergy can never rise higher than protopopes; since the bishops are chosen from among the monks; and from among the bishops, the archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs.

In Russia, there are thirty-one dioceses; with which of them the archiepiscopal dignity shall be united, depends on the will of the emperor. The seats of the four Russian metropolitans are,—Petersburgh, with the jurisdiction of Novogorod; Kiev, with that of Galicia; Kasan, with that of Svijschsk; and Tobolsk, with that of all Siberia. The patriarchal dignity of Moscow, which the patriarch Nikon is said to have abused, Peter the Great abolished, by presenting himself unexpectedly before the bishops, who were assembled, in 1702, to elect a new patriarch, and declaring, "I am your patriarch;" and, in 1721, the whole ecclesiastical government of the empire was intrusted to a college of bishops and secular clergy, called the holy synod, first at Moscow, now at Petersburgh. Under this synod now stand, besides the metropolitans, eleven archbishops, nineteen bishops, twelve thousand, five hundred parish churches, and four hundred and twenty-five convents, fifty-eight of which are connected with monastic schools for the education of the clergy, for the better effecting of which object, they are aided by a large annual pension from the state.

The Greek church, under the Turkish dominion, remained, as far as was possible under such circumstances, faithful to the original constitution. The dignities of patriarch of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, still exist. The first, however, possesses the ancient authority of the former archbishop of Constantinople; takes the lead as ecumenical patriarch in the holy synod at that place, composed of the four patriarchs, a number of metropolitans and bishops, and twelve secular Greeks; exercises the highest ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the Greeks in the whole Turkish empire; and is recognised as head of the Greek church by the (not united) Greeks in Galicia, in the Bukovina, or Slavonia, and in the Seven Islands. The other three patriarchs, as almost all the people in their dioceses are Mahometans, have but a small sphere of action (the patriarch of Alexandria has but two churches at Cairo), and live, for the most part, on the aid afforded them by the patriarch of Constantinople. This patriarch has a considerable income, but is obliged to pay nearly half of it as a tribute to the Sultan. The Greeks, under the Turkish government, are not allowed to build any new churches—have to pay dearly for permission to repair the old ones—are not allowed to have steeples or bells to their churches, nor even to wear the Turkish dress—generally perform religious service by night—and are, moreover, obliged to pay tolls, from which the Turks are exempt; but the males also pay to the sultan, after their fifteenth year, a heavy poll-tax, under the name of exemption from beheading.

The attachment of the Greek church to the old institutions has stood in the way of all attempts at improvement: only in Russia, a number of sects have sprung up, which the government not only tolerates, but some of which it supplies with consecration to their clergy, through the regular bishops. As might be expected, true religion is at the very lowest ebb in all the departments of this communion; yet strong hopes may be entertained of a revival, from the circumstance that the free use of the holy Scriptures, in the vernacular language, is not interdicted, as in the church of Rome.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, HIGH. (See НІЖН ЧУРЧН.)

CHURCH OF IRELAND, is the same as the church of England, and is governed by four archbishops, and eighteen bishops.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, or KIRK OF SCOTLAND. The word kirk, signifying church, was used in Scotland even before the Reformation, and is still retained there, where it is chiefly confined to the establishment, and the Relief Synod.

The principles of the Reformation were first introduced into Scotland about the year 1527, when they excited the apprehensions of the priesthood, who attempted to arrest their progress by many acts of cruelty against their professors.

The sovereign and the priesthood combined to preserve the dominion of error; whilst the greater part of the nobility, to gain the objects which they fondly contemplated, espoused the interests of the people, and joined in enlarging the sphere of civil and religious liberty. Thus it happened, that the hierarchy came to be regarded in Scotland, by all who were partial to the Protestant faith, as the ally of despotism and the engine of persecution.

It was not, therefore to be expected, that when the Protestants gained a decided ascendancy, much inclination would be shown to uphold a system of ecclesiastical polity, associated with what they most abhorred; and the celebrated Andrew Melville, on his arrival in Scotland from Geneva, in 1574, taking advantage of these feelings, and of every political event that might facilitate his design, was enabled to effect in 1592, the introduction of that Presbyterian polity which he found established in Geneva, and which has finally been fixed in Scotland.

James VI., to whom this form of church government was most obnoxious, was desirous that Episcopacy, as more consonant to monarchy, should be restored. To effect this, he made many efforts, even before his accession to the English throne; and after that event, he was enabled to accomplish his object. His unfortunate son, Charles I., formed the scheme of assimilating, in all respects, the churches of England and Scotland. With this view he determined to introduce a liturgy, which in Scotland had never been regularly used; and he insisted upon the reception of a set of canons, abolishing the control over ecclesiastical measures which the inferior church judicatories had been permitted to exercise. The violence with which all this was resisted, is known to every reader of the history of Britain. The zeal of the multitude was inflamed to fury; the clergy were insulted, and Episcopacy was again contemplated as the engine of popery and of despotism. The discontented in Scotland made a common cause with those who were disaffected to prelacy in the southern part of the island: they bound themselves by the deed, entitled The Solemn League and Covenant, to exterminate prelacy as a corruption of the gospel; and they took an active part in those measures which terminated in the death of Charles and the erection of the commonwealth. Upon the restoration of Charles II., he re-established Episcopacy in Scotland, under circumstances little calculated to conciliate the affections, and to secure the reverence of the people to that form of church polity. The Presbyterians, undismayed, adhered to their principles; and, upon the abdication of James II., they looked forward with confidence to the triumph of their cause. And though the prince of Orange was eager to preserve in both parts of the island the same form of ecclesiastical government, the bishops conceived that they could not conscientiously transfer their allegiance to him, whereby the way was opened for that establishment of Presbytery, which some of his most zealous adherents had pressed upon him, and which was ratified by act of parliament in 1690. Thus Scotland and England having separate kingdoms at the time of the Reformation, a difference of circumstances in the two countries led to different sentiments on the subject of religion, and at last to different religious establishments; and when they were incorporated into one kingdom by the treaty of union in 1707, both kingdoms gave their assent to a declaration, that Episcopacy shall continue in England, and that the Presbyterian church government shall be the only government of Christ's church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

The same establishment is also guaranteed by the fifth article of the union with Ireland.

The only confession which appears to have been legally established before the revolution in 1688, is that which is published in the "History of the Reformation in Scotland," attributed to John Knox. It consists of twenty-five articles, and was the confession as well of the Episcopal as of the Presbyterian church. The Covenanters, indeed, during the commonwealth, adopted the Westminster confession. And at the revolution, this confession was received as the standard of the national faith; and the same acts of parliament which settled Presbyterian church government in Scotland, ordain, "That no person be admitted or continued hereafter to be a minister or preacher within this church, unless that he subscribe the (i. e. this) confession of faith, declaring the same to be the confession of his faith." By the act of union in 1707, the same is required of all "professors, principals, regents, masters, and others bearing office" in any of the four universities in Scotland.

The Westminster confession of faith, then, and what are called the larger and shorter catechisms, which are generally bound up with it, contain the public and avowed doctrines of this church; and it is well known that these formularies are strictly and properly Calvinistical.

In the church of Scotland, the public worship is extremely simple, and but few ceremonies are retained. There is no liturgy or public form in use; and the minister's only guide is, "The Directory for the Public Worship of God," which prescribes rather the manner than the words of our addresses to God: nor is it thought necessary to adhere strictly to it; for, as in several other respects, what it enjoins with regard to reading the holy Scriptures in public worship is, at this day, but seldom practised.

By the ecclesiastical laws, "the sacrament of the Lord's supper should be dispensed in every parish four times in the year;" but this law is now seldom adhered to, unless in most chapels of ease. In country parishes, it is often administered not above once a year, and in towns generally only twice a year. The people are prepared for that holy ordinance by a fast and public worship on some day of the preceding week, generally on Thursday, and by a sermon on the Saturday; and they meet again in the kirk on the Monday morning for public thanksgiving, and sermon.

They have no altars or chancels in the kirks, and the communion tables are not fixed, but introduced for the occasion; and are sometimes two or more in number, and of considerable length. At the first table, the minister, immediately upon concluding what they call the consecration prayer, usually proceeds to read the words of the institution, and, without adding more, to distribute the elements, which he does only to the two communicants who sit nearest him on each hand. It is usual for the elders to administer them to the rest. But before, or during the services of the succeeding tables, addresses at some length are made to the communicants by the minister, or by one of the ministers, (for there are generally two, three, or more present,) standing at the head of the communion table.

In conducting public worship, this church has little in common with the church of England. She has no festivals.

Days of public fasting and thanksgiving she does indeed sometimes observe, particularly those commanded by the king, together with the fast previous to the celebration of the holy communion, and the day of thanksgiving after it; but she has no lent fast,—no kneeling at public prayer,—no public worship of God without a sermon or public instruction,—no instrumental music,—no consecration of churches or of burying grounds,—no funeral service or ceremony,—no sign of the cross in baptism,—no regular use of the Lord's prayer,—and no administration of the holy communion in private houses, not even to the sick or dying.

In singing, an old metrical version of the psalms is used; but besides the psalms of David, a collection of translations and paraphrases in verse, of several passages of sacred Scripture, together with some hymns, has been introduced of late years, by permission of the general assembly, and a new version of the psalms in metre is now in progress.

For government and discipline, see PRESBYTERIANISM. The general assembly, in the present state of the church, consists of the following members, viz. :—

- 200 Ministers representing Presbyteries.
- 89 Elders, representing Presbyteries.
- 67 Elders, representing royal boroughs.
- 5 Ministers or Elders, representing Universities.

361

The connexion of what is called the Scots kirk at Campvere, in Holland, with the establishment in Scotland, which had been dissolved by the Batavian republic, has lately been restored; and congregations joined with this church, and represented in the general assembly, have been established in the different presidencies of India.

In Scotland, and the islands of Scotland, she contains within her bounds eight hundred and ninety-three parishes, and about one million five hundred thousand members. The number of ministers belonging to her, who enjoy benefices, and possess ecclesiastical authority, is nine hundred and forty. Of this number, seventy-seven are placed in collegiate charges, and the remaining eight hundred and sixty-three ministers are settled in single charges, each of them having the superintendence of a whole parish. In very populous parishes, chapels of ease are erected with consent of the kirk, and are supported by voluntary subscriptions; but the ministers who officiate in them are not included in this number, as they are not members of any ecclesiastical courts.

The duties of the Scotch clergy are numerous and laborious. They are required to officiate regularly in the public worship of God; and, in general, they must go through this duty twice every Sunday (exclusive of their occasional appearances,) delivering every Sunday a lecture and a sermon, with prayers. It is also expected, throughout Scotland, that the prayers and discourses shall be of the minister's own composition; and the prayers, in all cases, and the discourses, in most instances, are delivered without the use of papers. They are expected to perform the alternate duties of examining their people from the Scriptures and catechisms of the church, and of visiting them from house to house, with prayers and exhortations. The charge of the poor devolves, in a very particular manner, on the clergy; and in them also is vested the superintendence of all schools within their bounds.

The provision which has been made, by the law of Scotland, for the support of the established clergy, consists in a stipend, payable in victual or money, or partly in each: a small glebe of land; and a manse (parsonage-house) and office-houses.

An act of parliament passed in 1810, granting ten thousand pounds per annum for augmenting the smaller parish stipends in Scotland. By this act, the lowest stipends assigned to a minister of the establishment, is one hundred and fifty pounds sterling, with a small sum, generally eight pounds six shillings and eight pence, for communion elements. Stipends, where the tithes are not exhausted, are, with the exclusion of communion elements, wholly paid in victual, generally oatmeal and barley, in equal proportions; and the court frequently allocates, as it is termed, to a minister from sixteen to eighteen chalders. If the stipend exhaust the teind, it is sometimes paid in money; and there are cases in which the teind was originally set apart in money, and not in victual.

The whole church establishment, as a burden on land, may be stated in one view, as follows—viz. a glebe, of perhaps about six or seven acres, out of nearly twenty-one thousand, and the grass, where it is allowed; a stipend of about nine pence in the pound of the land rents; and buildings and communion charges, amounting to four or five pence more in the pound of these land rents. All these, put together, constitute the burdens of the Scottish ecclesiastical establishment, in so far as proprietors of land are affected by them; and are not supposed to exceed three hundred thousand pounds per annum.

Patronage was abolished in Scotland, A. D. 1649; was revived at the Restoration; was partly abrogated at the Revolution; and again revived in 1712; and the ranks of dissenters there have been thronged, perhaps, from no other cause so much as the abuse of patronage; notwithstanding, this church, according to Dr. Chalmers, has still a veto, and can set aside any pretence, not merely on the ground of his moral or literary qualifications, but "generally, on the principle that it is not for the cause of edification that his presentation should be sustained."

The internal state of the church of Scotland, it has been supposed by some, has been of late years undergoing an improvement, by the decided increase of the party usually termed Evangelical. In the appointment of ministers to vacant churches, both in town and country, much greater attention is now paid than formerly to the wishes of the people; and popular candidates, as they are called, are those whom the patrons of the present day most frequently present to livings. If this party should go on increasing in the same proportion, the reign of the moderates, or low-doctrine, but high-churchmen, must ere long terminate. It is however, greatly to be deplored, that along with this increase in the number of evangelical ministers, a spirit of intolerance and bigotry is rapidly gaining ground. Individuals, for instance, carry their jealousy so far as to dissuade their parishioners from hiring dissenting servants. Others, contrary to their former practice, refuse to intimate from their pulpits sermons to be preached on public occasions for common objects, by dissenting ministers; and there are others who stand aloof from societies in which they would be required to co-operate with brethren who do not belong to the established church. To the production of this spirit and state of feeling, the controversy relating to the British and Foreign Bible society has greatly contributed. See Adam's Religious World Displayed; Edu. Theolog. Mag., Nov. 1830.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, (LATIN, OR WESTERN,) comprehends all the churches of Italy, Portugal, Spain, Africa, the north and all other countries whither the Romans carried their language. Great Britain, part of the Netherlands, of Germany, and of the north of Europe, have been separated from it almost ever since the Reformation.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH, (REFORMED,) comprehends the whole Protestant churches in Europe and America, whether Lutheran, Calvinistic, Independent, Quaker, Baptist, or any other denomination who dissent from the church of Rome. The term reformed is now, however, employed on the continent of Europe, to distinguish the Calvinists from the Lutherans.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH OF ROME, OR ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Roman Catholics unanimously own Peter as the founder of the church of Rome, though it is disputed by some Protestants, whether he ever was in that city. Those who deny it, ground their opinion upon the silence of Luke and Paul in this matter, who, having been both at Rome, would not have failed, say they, to have mentioned Peter, and the Christians converted by him, if he had ever preached the gospel in that city. They endeavor to confirm this opinion by the chronological history of the Acts of the Apostles, and likewise by the first Epistle of Peter; from the last of which they undertake to prove, that he executed his commission in Asia, and died at Babylon.

To this it is answered, that the silence of Luke is no good argument; for that evangelist, in the Acts of the Apostles, takes no notice of Paul's journey into Arabia, and of his return, first to Damascus, and then to Jerusalem. As to the argument from chronology, those who maintain the affirmative, set up another account of time, more agreeable, as they think, to the best ecclesiastical historians and chronologers, and exactly coinciding with the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Peter and Paul. It is, in few words, this:—

In the thirty-fifth year of Christ, Peter and John went to Samaria, where having preached the gospel, Peter returned to Jerusalem; whither Paul came, three years after his conversion, to visit him, in the year of Christ, 39. The church having rest, and being unmolested by its enemies, Peter now took the opportunity to visit the several churches already planted by the disciples, in which progress he came to Antioch, the capital of the East; and here, being its first bishop, and having given necessary orders for the government of that church, he returned into Judea, where he visited the towns of Lydda, Joppa, and Cæsarea, in the years 40 and 41. After the conversion of the centurion Cornelius, he went to Jerusalem in the year 42. At this time, Barnabas and Paul were sent to Antioch, where they preached the gospel with great success in the year 43. From thence they returned to Jerusalem, where Peter then was, bringing with them the contributions they had collected for the support of the Christians of Judea, in the year 44. In the mean time, Herod Agrippa, king of Judea, put the apostle James, brother of John, to death, just before Easter, and soon after, seized on Peter; who, being miraculously released by an angel, travelled through Antioch into Asia Minor, where he planted new churches in Cappadocia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bithynia; from whence he embarked for Rome, where he arrived the latter end of the year 44, which was the second of the emperor Claudius. Here, having converted many Jews and Gentiles, he planted a church, of which he himself was the first bishop, in the year 45. He continued to govern this church till his martyrdom, which fell out in the year 69, being the thirtieth of the emperor Nero; upon which computation he was bishop of Rome twenty-five years; not that he was resident all that time in Rome, for in the year 51, he was obliged to quit the city, because of the emperor Claudius's edict, which banished all the Jews, under which name they included the Christians; nor was he returned to Rome when Paul was carried prisoner thither, in the year 59, and this may account for the silence of Paul in this matter.

As to the Epistle of Peter, dated from Babylon to the Christians in Asia, it is answered, that by Babylon, in that place, is plainly meant the city of Rome; and Eusebius, Jerome, and all the ancient writers, assure us that this epistle was written at Rome.

Lastly, that Peter was at Rome, may be proved, say they, by the concurrent testimony of all antiquity; this truth being asserted by Papias, a disciple of John the evangelist, by Caius, contemporary with Tertullian, by Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, &c. among the Greeks; and by Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, &c. among the Latins, and is a fact that never was called in question till the sixteenth century.

Rome is the centre of the popish, or Roman Catholic religion, and the pope, or bishop of the see of Rome, as successor of St. Peter, claims the supremacy over the universal Christian church. This claim is founded on the words of our Savior to St. Peter: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church." The best summary of the doctrines of that church, is the famous creed of pope Pius IV. which may be considered as a true and unquestionable body of popery. It consists of twenty-four articles. The twelve first are the articles of the Nicene creed, and need not be cited here. The twelve last are the additional doctrines, which the church of Rome has superadded to the original Catholic faith,—they are as follows:—

XIII. I most firmly admit and embrace the apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other observations and constitutions of the same church.

XIV. I do admit the holy Scriptures in the same sense that holy mother church doth, whose business it is to judge of the true sense and interpretation of them; and I will interpret them according to the unanimous sense of the fathers.

XV. I do profess and believe, that there are seven sacraments of the law, truly and properly so called, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary to the salvation of mankind, though not all of them to every one, viz.—Baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and marriage; and that they do confer grace; and that, of these, baptism, confirmation, and orders, may not be repeated without sacrilege. I do also receive and admit the received and approved rites of the Catholic church in her solemn administration of the above-said sacraments.

XVI. I do embrace and receive all and every thing, that hath been defined and declared by the holy council of Trent, concerning original sin and justification.

XVII. I do also profess, that in the mass, there is offered unto God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist, there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is a conversion made of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion the Catholic church calls transubstantiation.

XVIII. I confess that, under one kind only, whole and entire, Christ, and a true sacrament, is taken and received.

XIX. I do firmly believe that there is a purgatory, and that the souls kept prisoners there do receive help by the suffrages of the faithful.

XX. I do likewise believe that the saints, reigning together with Christ, are to be worshipped and prayed to; and that they do offer prayers unto God for us, and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

XXI. I do most firmly assert that the images of Christ, of the blessed virgin (the mother of God) and of other saints, ought to be had and retained, and due honor and veneration ought to be paid to them.

XXII. I do affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is very beneficial to Christian people.

XXIII. I do acknowledge the holy Catholic and apostolic Roman church, to be the mother and mistress of all churches; and I do promise and swear true obedience to the bishop of Rome, the successor of St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ.

XXIV. I do undoubtedly receive and profess all other things, which have been delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons, and ecumenical councils, and especially by the holy synod of Trent; and all other things contrary thereto, and all heresies, condemned, rejected, and anathematized by the church, I do likewise condemn, reject, and anathematize.

The worship of this church is liturgical, and, throughout the greatest part of its extent, the Latin language is used in all public and authorized religious worship, although that language has for many ages ceased to be a vulgar tongue. Her object in this practice is, we are told, "to preserve uniformity; to avoid the changes to which living languages are exposed, and thereby to prevent the novelties which might be thus introduced; to facilitate the commerce of different churches on religious matters; and to promote a spirit of study and learning among the ministers;" nor does she admit that by this practice her members sustain any injury or loss. She does not, however, require as a condition of communion, the adoption of the Latin language and rite.

The liturgy, or order of the mass, almost universally adopted, is that contained in the Roman missal.

Masses are divided into solemn or high mass, and plain or low mass; mass sung or said; public mass, or private mass.

A solemn mass is mass offered up with all the due solemnities, by a bishop or priest, attended by a deacon, subdeacon and other ministers, each officiating in his part.

Such a mass is always sung; and hence a choir of singers accompanies it, with an organ, if possible, and, at times, other instrumental music. Mass, when divested of all these solemnities, and in which only the priest officiates, is a plain or low mass. The priest, however, may either sing the mass, attended by the choir, or say it. Hence the difference between mass sung and said. Mass may be attended by a crowd of people, or it may be said with few or none present, except the clerk to attend the officiating priest. When the mass is numerously attended, all or many of those present may partake of the sacrifice by communion, or none may communicate but the priest. These differences make the mass public or private; and it has been remarked, that private masses have become more common in later ages.

The liturgy of the mass will be found in the Roman missal, which contains, besides the calendar, the general rubrics or rites of the mass, and such parts of it as are invariably the same.

After the prayers of the liturgy or missal, those held in the greatest veneration by Roman Catholics are the prayers contained in the church office or canonical hours. This office is a form of prayer and instruction combined, consisting of the psalms, lessons, hymns, prayers, anthems, versicles, &c. in an established order, separated into different portions, and to be said at different hours of the day.

These canonical hours of prayer are still regularly observed by many religious orders, but less regularly by the secular clergy, even in the choir. When the office is recited in private, though the observance of regular hours may be commendable, it is thought sufficient if the whole be gone through any time in the twenty-four hours.

The church office is contained in what is called the breviary; and those branches of this church who have different liturgies from the Roman, have also breviaries differing in language, rite, and arrangement. Even in the Latin church, several dioceses, and several religious bodies, have their particular breviaries. The Roman breviary is, however, the most general in use. It is divided much in the same manner as the missal as to its parts. The psalms are so distributed, that in the weekly office (if the festivals of saints did not interfere) the whole psalter would be gone over, though several psalms, viz. the one hundred and eighteenth (alias one hundred and nineteenth,) are said every day. On the festivals of saints, suitable psalms are adopted. The lessons are taken partly out of the Old and New Testament, and partly out of the acts of the saints and writings of the holy fathers. The Lord's prayer, the Hail Mary, or angelical salutation, the apostles' creed, and the confiteor, are frequently said. This last is a prayer by which they acknowledge themselves sinners; beg pardon of God, and the intercession, in their behalf, of the angels, of the saints, and of their brethren upon earth. No prayers are more frequently in the mouth of Roman Catholics than these four; to which we may add the doxology, repeated in the office at the end of every psalm, and in other places. In every canonical hour a hymn is also said, composed by Prudentius or some other ancient father.

The Roman breviary contains also a small office in honor of the blessed virgin, and likewise what is called the office of the dead. We there find besides, the penitential and the gradual psalms, as they are called, together with the litanies of the saints and of the virgin Mary of Loretto, so called because used in the church of our lady in Loretto, which are the only two that have the sanction of the church.

In the public worship of this church, every thing is fixed and uniform. And as the missal and breviary contain the prayers and rites adopted in ordinary religious assemblies for the purpose of sacrifice or prayer, so the pontifical and ritual contains the forms and prayers with which the sacraments are administered; the blessing of God invoked upon his creatures; the power of evil spirits over the souls and bodies of the faithful destroyed or restrained; the method also of deprecating the wrath of God in times of public calamity, and of returning him thanks for signal public blessings; finally, directions how to afford the comforts of religion to the sick and dying, with the prayers to be made use of in the Christian interment of the dead.—Such of the above functions as belong to the episcopal character or office are to be found in the pontifical; those which belong to simple priests; or even the inferior clergy, are inserted in the ritual.

On the subject of the administration of the sacraments, my limits will not permit me to descend to particulars.

Of the many benedictions used in this church, some, besides those accompanying the administration of their sacraments of confirmation and holy orders, are reserved to bishops exclusively, as the consecration of holy oil, chrism, &c. Some are performed by priests in their own right, and others by delegated authority from the bishop.

In addition to such benedictions, this church blesses houses, ships, springs, fields, the nuptial bed, altars, chalices, sacerdotal vestments, salt, water, oil, palms, &c. &c. It would be ridiculous even to recite the wonderful virtues which her members attribute to their holy water, and the many superstitious uses to which they apply it. They seldom go into or out of a church without sprinkling themselves with it. On solemn days, the priest passes down the middle aisle, to perform that office, using a brush; at other times they serve themselves with it from a font placed near the church door for that purpose. Another of their ceremonies, connected with this and most others, and used on most occasions and in all places, is the sign of the cross.

Roman Catholics maintain that God has left with his church a power over unclean spirits, in consequence of which they are cast out from such persons or things as, by the permission of God, they have been able to abuse; or their power over them is at least restricted. The forms of prayer which this church makes use of for that purpose are called exorcisms, and the persons who are authorized to use them are called exorcists. This function, however, according to modern practice, is seldom discharged by any but priests.

The prescribed forms for all benedictions, exorcisms, and processions, &c. will be found in the "Roman Pontifical and Ritual."

Those now enumerated are, properly speaking, the only prayers which can be said to have the sanction of the church; yet her members are furnished with many forms for private devotion. And "when, to acquire a greater ease in the observance of the law of God, a man makes use of certain means which he is not obliged by any law to use, and which others, who are not thought to neglect their duty, do not in fact avail themselves of, he is said by Roman Catholics to perform works of supererogation."

Of their numerous forms of private devotion, the "Chapter (or Rosary) of the blessed Virgin," and the "Angelus Domini," may be noticed. The former was instituted, we are told, by those who could not read, that they might repeat the Lord's prayer, the Hail Mary, and the doxology, a certain number of times, in lieu of every canonical hour; whilst at the same time they commemorate the mysteries of the life of Christ, and honor his virgin mother.

For above three centuries, a practice has prevailed in this church of commemorating, at morning, noon, and night, the incarnation of Christ, by a short form of prayer, which, from the words with which it begins in Latin, is called the "Angelus Domini."

In conformity with the Roman Catholic practice of praying for the dead, "it is also very customary to offer up for their repose, at the first hour of the night, the penitential psalms, with a prayer suited to that end."

The government of the church of Rome is hierarchical.

Besides those having jurisdiction, there are bishops in partibus infidelium, as they are called, or, more briefly, in partibus—i. e. persons who, that they may enjoy the dignity and honors of episcopacy, and thereby be qualified to render some particular services to the church in general, are named to sees "in infidel countries," of which they cannot possibly take possession.

In Ireland, the succession of the hierarchy never having been interrupted, the Roman Catholic bishops there have their sees in the country as before the Reformation, and enjoy an ordinary jurisdiction; whereas those in England and Scotland, where the succession has failed, enjoy merely a delegated jurisdiction, and are called vicars-apostolic, from their being delegates, or vicars, of the pope, who occupies the apostolic see. He, of course, has the right of nominating them, although, in practice, the nomination takes place on the recommendation of the other vicars, or of the clergy who are interested. In England, there are four apostolic vicars, and in Scotland, two.

A metropolitan, or an archbishop, besides the jurisdiction common to him with other bishops in his own diocese, has also a jurisdiction, defined by the canon law and customs, over all the bishops of his province, who are his suffragans; summons them every third year to a provincial synod, and the constitutions framed in it affect all the churches in the province. In like manner, primates and patriarchs have a jurisdiction over all the metropolitans and other bishops of the kingdoms, or nations, where they hold their dignified rank. The constitutions of the national council convoked by the primate, bind all the churches in that nation; and the constitutions of the patriarchal council bind all the patriarchate. But these two titles are now, in fact, merely honorary in most of those who enjoy them.

Above all these is the pope, who has the power (in the opinion of all Roman Catholics, jure divino) of feeding, ruling, and governing the whole church; and exercises his jurisdiction over all clergy as well as laity. This power, they say, "is purely spiritual, entirely unconnected with any temporal authority."

His care and solicitude extends to all Roman Catholic churches throughout the world. He enacts rules of discipline for the universal church, dispenses with some of them when he sees proper, punishes those who do not obey them, passes sentence upon ecclesiastical causes referred to him (which ought to be the case with all those of great importance), and receives appeals from all Roman Catholic bishops in the world.

It is he, we are told, who convokes general councils; invites to them all the Roman Catholic bishops dispersed throughout the globe; presides in them personally or by his legates; and confirms their decrees. He constitutes new bishoprics, and confirms the nomination of bishops; deprives bishops of their sees for their crimes, and those unjustly deprived of them he restores. The pope's dominion over his brother bishops is, indeed, carried to such a height, and so confirmed by the council of Trent, that they are become in fact little better than his vicars. They swear obedience to him in as strong terms as any subject can use towards his sovereign, and in terms but little consistent with their duty to their king and country.

As all the Roman Catholic churches had always their senate, composed of priests and deacons, whose counsel and assistance the bishop used in the government of his diocese; so the pope had always his, composed of cardinals, who assisted him in the government of the universal church.

Thus all "Roman Catholics obey their bishops—the bishops the metropolitans—the metropolitans the primates and patriarchs—and all of them their head, the pope; and of all these is composed one church, having one faith, under one head."

The discipline of the church of Rome is now regulated by what is called the canon law, which has taken place of the canons of the apostles, the apostolical constitutions, and all the ancient compilations on that subject. The canon law consists, 1. Of the decrees of Gratian; a compilation made up of the decrees of different popes and councils, and of several passages of the holy fathers and other reputable writers. 2. Of the decretals, in five books. 3. Of the compilation, known by the name of the sixth book of decretals. 4. Of the Clementines. 5. Of the other decretals, known under the name of extravagantes. These, containing besides the decrees of popes and the canons of several councils, constitute the body of the canon law.

It is, however, only in matters of faith that she professes to admit of no diversity; her discipline is not every where perfectly uniform; nor does she consider some variety, in matters of worship or discipline, as subversive of peace, or as breaking the bonds of communion.

The fast of lent consists of forty days, in imitation of our Savior's forty days' fast in the wilderness; and it is kept once a year "to do penance for sin," and as a preparation for celebrating the great feast of Easter.

The Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, in one week of each of the four seasons of the year, are annually fast days, called quatuor tempora, or ember days. Besides abstaining at least from flesh meats, it is essential to a fast day that only one full meal, and that not before noon, be taken in the four-and-twenty hours of the day. Every Friday in the year is kept universally as a day of abstinence from flesh; and in the Latin church, Saturday, with a few exceptions; unless Christmas day falls upon them.

Another point of discipline in this church is clerical celibacy. Her members profess that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient church as a condition of ordination, even from the apostolic age. But Protestants insist that the contrary is evident, from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony without any prejudice to their ordination or their function.

"The use of sacred vestments, as well as of various ceremonies, has been universally adopted by the Roman Catholic church, professedly for the greater decency of her public worship."

Besides the Lord's day, Roman Catholics universally keep a vast number of holidays.

There are several orders of monks in Catholic countries, in every quarter of the globe, at this day. They have Basilians, Benedictines, Augustinians, Dominicans, Franciscans, canons regular, and others. All these different orders take the solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; and all firmly hold the Roman Catholic faith, and only differ in their rules of discipline, in their dress, in the particular privileges granted by the pope to each order, in their names, which they generally take from that of their founder, and such like distinctions pertaining merely to discipline. In general, they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop, and are immediately under that of the pope.

Of nuns, as of the monks, there are different orders, each following their own rules, and wearing a peculiar habit. The solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, are taken by them also; and they are commonly under the government of the bishops, but sometimes are under the jurisdiction of regular clergymen of their own order. After their profession, they are never allowed to go without the inclosure of the convent, during life, without the leave of the bishop, or some cogent reason—such as a nunery taking fire, &c.—and no man is allowed to enter it without a similar permission, which may be granted for a necessary cause. Roman Catholics think that the origin of nuns is to be found even in the primitive church.

It is an article of the discipline of the church of Rome not to put the Old or New Testament, in the vulgar tongue, into the hands of the children or unlearned; and that, in consequence, "no part whatever of the Bible in the vulgar tongue is taught in the Roman Catholic charity schools."

The Roman Catholic religion is very extensively diffused, and is more generally professed than any other system of Christianity.

In Europe, it is the established and only religion in Italy, Spain, and Portugal: in the ci-devant Austrian and French Netherlands; in Sicily, Sardinia, and the other Mediterranean islands adjacent to Italy and Spain. In France, perhaps ten to one of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. In Poland, and throughout the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, the case is the same with the great majority of the inhabitants, and probably with almost one half of the rest of the German population. In Hungary alone they exceed four millions; and about the same number are found within the dominions of Prussia. A considerable number of his Britannic majesty's European subjects profess the doctrine of the church of Rome. In Ireland, the Roman Catholics are nearly three to one of all other denominations; in England, their number is nearly two hundred and fifty thousand, and in Scotland, about fifty thousand. The Roman Catholic religion is also established in seven of the Swiss cantons. In Holland too, and in the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, and also in Russia, many of its members may be found. Sweden and Denmark contain a few; and in the provinces of European Turkey they are more numerous than is generally supposed. In that extended country there are Roman Catholic archbishops, bishops, chapters, and monasteries, and a numerous body of laity dwelling together by thousands.

In Asia, many of the subjects of the Grand Seignior are Roman Catholics. The Maronites of mount Libanus, with their patriarch and bishops, are all of this communion. There are besides many others throughout Syria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia. Some Roman Catholics are to be found in Persia. Throughout Hindostan and the other southern parts of Asia, Siam, Cochinchina, Tonquin, and the vast empire of China itself, the number of Roman Catholics is very great. And in the Philippine isles and others of the Eastern ocean, the Roman Catholic religion is very generally established.

The mission to China is supplied by the college of St. Joseph, at Macao, which is now under the direction of the priests of the missionary congregation. From the report of the state of the missions in 1810, it appears that there were then in China, Tonquin, Cochinchina, and Siam, fourteen bishops, seven apostolical vicars, forty-three European missionaries, two hundred and thirty-one native priests, and five hundred and eighty-five thousand Roman Catholic Christians.

The great body of Roman Catholics, from the banks of the Crishna to cape Comorin, amounting to about seven hundred and fifty-five thousand, is intrusted to the care of two titular archbishops, two titular bishops, and three bishops in partibus, with the title of vicars apostolical.

In Africa, the Roman Catholic religion prevails in many parts of its vast extent. Not to mention Madeira, the Canary and Cape de Verd islands, the inhabitants of which are all Roman Catholics, a great proportion of the inhabitants of Loango, Congo, and Angola adhere to the doctrines of the church of Rome. The same holds true of several kingdoms on the eastern coast of that continent; viz. Mocaranga, Mozambique, Zanguebar, and Melinda. In Guinea too, in the Mahometan states of the North, and in Egypt, not a few Christians of the church of Rome are to be found.

America.—The whole of the southern continent of America, including the native aborigines and the descendants of the European colonists, profess to be members of the church of Rome, with the exception of most of the Dutch at Surinam, and of a few wandering tribes in the interior towards the southern promontory. The same religion is professed throughout the Spanish settlements in North America, and in the Spanish and ci-devant French West Indies, as well as by three fourths of the inhabitants of Canada, where it is the established religion.

All the clergy and members of this church throughout the United States were under the superintendance of the bishop of Baltimore, till the year 1809, when that city (the capital of Maryland) was created a metropolitan see, and four new dioceses were erected, viz. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Bardstown, in the state of Kentucky. The bishops of all these dioceses are suffragans to the archbishop of Baltimore. And in addition to these, two other dioceses have more lately been erected, out of part of the archdiocese, viz. Virginia, and the Carolinas and Georgia. The bishop of Louisiana, now one of the United States, whose residence is St. Louis, in the new state of Missouri, is not a suffragan of the archbishop of Baltimore.

The cathedral of Baltimore, which was built in 1820, is said to be the finest church in the United States, and to have cost upwards of fifty thousand pounds sterling. In most of the dioceses now specified, there is one or more colleges or seminaries, under the direction of Roman Catholic clergymen. The Jesuits also have a thriving college at Georgetown in Maryland, and the English Dominicans have one in Kentucky. There are, besides, five or six seminaries for ladies in the United States: some of these, however, are merely for the education of females; but in others the members are required and expected to take the vows of poverty and continency. The Roman Catholics are rapidly increasing in North America, by emigration from Europe, and in other ways. Their number, some years ago, was estimated at six hundred thousand. Large sums of money are annually expended in the erection of chapels, and the support of priests. Much of this money comes from abroad. From documents published in the New York Observer, 1834, it appears that, from July, 1829, to November, 1830, the receipts of the Austrian "Central Direction of the Leopold foundation for the support of Catholic Missions in America," amounted to 49,382 florins, equal to $22,715.

According to the Roman court calendar of 1822, the number of living cardinals was then forty-four, and the number of patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, scattered over the Christian world, amounted to five hundred and fifty, exclusive of those in partibus infidelium.—Broughton's Dictionary; Adam's Religions World displayed; Benedict's History of all Religions.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH REVENUES. From the following table, which shows the annual amount of the income of the clergy in all parts of the Christian world, it will be perceived that the revenue of the English clergy is greater by forty-four thousand pounds, than that of all the other clergy in the world; while the number of hearers attending on their ministry, compared with the aggregate number belonging to the churches in other nations, is as one to thirty-two.

CHURCH, (STATES OF THE ;) the pope's dominions in Italy. They originated with the grant of Pepin, king of the Franks, in 754, who bestowed on Stephen II., bishop of Rome, some districts which the Lombards, against whom Stephen solicited Pepin's assistance, had taken from the exarchate. Charlemagne confirmed this grant in 774, and in return received the title of Roman emperor, from Leo III., in 800. During succeeding centuries, the popes sometimes gained accessions to their temporal dominions; at other times, encroachments were made upon them. At present, the states of the church cover a surface of seventeen thousand, one hundred and eighty-five square miles, with two million, four hundred and sixty thousand inhabitants, ninety towns, two hundred and twelve market places, and thirty-five thousand villages. They are situated in the centre of Italy, between Lombardy, Tuscany, Naples, and the Tuscan and Adriatic seas. The revenue is estimated at twelve millions, and the national debt at two hundred millions of florins. There is a standing army of nine thousand men. The navy consists of two frigates and a few small vessels. In 1816, these states, with the exception of Rome, Tivoli, and Subiaco, which are under the immediate administration of the pope, were divided into seventeen delegations, which, when under the government of cardinals, were called legations.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH-WARDENS ; officers chosen yearly, either by the consent of the minister, or of the parishioners, or of both. Their business is to look to the church, churchyard, and to observe the behavior of the parishioners; to levy a shilling forfeiture on all such as do not go to church on Sundays, and to keep persons orderly in church time, &c.—Hend. Buck.

CHURCH-YARD ; a piece of ground adjoining to the church, set apart for the interment of the dead. In the church of Rome, church-yards are consecrated with great solemnity. If a church-yard which has been thus consecrated shall afterwards be polluted by any indecent action, or profaned by the burial of an infidel, an heretic, an excommunicated or unbaptized person, it must be reconciled; and the ceremony of the reconciliation is performed with the same solemnity as that of the consecration! (See CONSECRATION.)—Hend. Buck.

CILICIA ; a country of Asia Minor, on the sea-coast, at the north of Cyprus, south of mount Taurus, and west of the Euphrates. Its capital was Tarsus. A synagogue of this province is mentioned, (Acts 6:9.) and as Paul was of this country, and of a city so considerable as Tarsus, it may be thought that he was also of this synagogue; so that it is probable he was one of those who had been disputing with Stephen, and were overcome by the arguments of that proto-martyr. (See TARSUS.)—Calmet.

CINNAMON ; one of the ingredients in the perfumed oil with which the tabernacle and its vessels were anointed, Exod. 30:23. The cinnamomum is a shrub, the bark of which has a fine scent; several of the moderns found it with the cinnanon tree, and cassia aromatica; but others distinguish three species. It is now generally agreed, that the cinnamomum, spoken of so confusedly by the ancients, is our cinnanon: it is a long, thin bark of a tree, rolled up, of a dark red color, of a poignant taste, aromatic, and very agreeable. The finest description comes from Ceylon; but there might formerly have been cinnamon in Arabia, or Ethiopia, or it might be imported then into Egypt, Arabia, &c. as it is now into Europe; so that it might come originally from Ceylon.—Calmet.

CINNERETH, or CENEROTH, or CENEROTH, a city of Naphtali, south of which lay a great plain, which reached to the Dead sea, all along the river Jordan, Josh. 19:35. Many believe, and with probability, that Cinnereth was the same as Tiberias; for, as the lake of Gennesareth (in Hebrew, the lake of Cinnereth) is, without doubt, that of Tiberias, it seems reasonable that Cinnereth and Tiberias should also be the same city, Deut. 3:17. (See TIBERIAS.)—Calmet.

CIRCUMCELLIANS, or CIRCONCELLIONES, wanderers (circum cella) among the monks, &c.; certain Donatists, who being expelled from Africa, by the emperor Constantine, wandered about, sometimes begging a subsistence, and at others forcing one by their arms. They are described as "rough and savage fanatics," who raised insurrections, and committed all sorts of excesses, daring death and martyrdom in the most heroic manner. Taking the sword, however, in defence of their religious principles, as our Lord predicted, and as has generally been the case, many of them perished by the sword, though the sect was not totally suppressed till the sixth century. Their professed religious sentiments will be seen under the parent term Donatists, who were, however, compelled to disown and expel them from their communion.—(Mosheim's E. Hist. vol. i. pp. 406, 407. Broughton's Dict.)—Williams.

CIRCUMCISION ; a custom prevailing among several eastern nations, of cutting off the prepuce of the virile member. It was enjoined as a religious rite on Abraham and his posterity. The Mahometan circumcision is probably an ancient Ishmaelite custom, which was received from Abraham, the common father of the Israelites and Ishmaelites. It was not introduced into Arabia by the Koran of Mahomet, but was already in use among his nation, and was adopted, and has been introduced by his followers, as a sacred rite, and one of the essential parts of Islamism, into all countries where this religion has been received. There is also a kind of circumcision or excision performed on the female sex. In Egypt, Mahometan maidens are frequently circumcised; and the Abyssinians circumcise both sexes. The importance attached to this rite in the first age of Christianity, as a saving ordinance, rendering it a suspicious, and even a dangerous practice, occasioned the apostle of the gentiles thus to address certain Galatians—"Behold, I Paul say unto you, if ye be circumcised (i. e. as the ground of justification before God), Christ shall profit you nothing."

Gal. 5: 2.—(Broughton's Dict. Robinson's ditto.)—Hend. Buck; Williams.

CIRCUMCISION, (FEAST OF THE;) a festival celebrated on the first of January, in commemoration of the circumcision of Christ. The day was anciently kept as a fast, in opposition to the custom of the pagans, who feasted on it in honor of the god Janus.—Hend. Buck.

CIRCUMSPECT; cautious, seriously attentive to every part of the revealed will of God, and very careful not to cast stumbling-blocks in the way of others, Exod. 23: 13. Eph. 5: 15.—Calmet.

CISTERN. There were cisterns throughout Palestine, in cities and in private houses. As the cities were mostly built on mountains, and the rains fall in Judea at two seasons only, (spring and autumn,) people were obliged to keep water in vessels. There are cisterns of very large dimensions, at this day, in Palestine. Two hours distant from Bethlehem are the cisterns or pools of Solomon. They are three in number, situated in the sloping hollow of a mountain, one above another; so that the waters of the uppermost descend into the second, and those of the second descend into the third. The breadth is nearly the same in all, between eighty and ninety paces, but the length varies. The first is about one hundred and sixty paces long; the second two hundred; the third two hundred and twenty. These pools formerly supplied the town of Bethlehem and the city of Jerusalem with water. Wells and cisterns, fountains and springs, are seldom distinguished accurately in Scripture. Worldly enjoyments are called "broken cisterns that can hold no water," (Jer. 2: 13.) from their unsatisfying and unstable nature.—Calmet.

CISTERTIAN MONKS; a religious order, founded in the eleventh century, by St. Robert, a Benedictine, and abbot of Molême. Robert, being ordered by the pope to resume the government of the abbey of Molême, was succeeded in that of Cîteaux, by Alberic; and pope Pascal, by a bull of the year 1100, took that monastery under his protection. Alberic drew up the first statutes for the monks of Cîteaux, or Cistercians, in which he enjoined the strict observance of the rule of St. Benedict.

The habit of these religious of the monastery of Cîteaux was at first black; but they pretend that the holy virgin, appearing to St. Alberic, gave him a white habit, from which time they changed their black habit for a white one, only retaining the black scapulary. In memory of this change they keep a festival on the 5th of August, which they call "The descent of the blessed virgin at Cîteaux, and the miraculous changing of the habit from black to white."

The number of those who embraced the Cistercian order increasing, it was necessary to build more monasteries. Accordingly, in 1113, Stephen, abbot of Cîteaux, built that of La Ferté, in the diocese of Chalons. The next year, he founded Pontigni, in the diocese of Auxerre. Clairvaux, in the diocese of Langres, was built in 1115. The order increased further in 1118, by the founding of four other monasteries, which were Prully, La Cour-Dieu, Trois Fontaines, and Bonnevaux; and, in the following year, 1119, Bouras, Fontenay, Cadovin, and Marnay, were founded. Then Stephen formed all these monasteries into one body, and drew up the constitutions of the order, which he called "The Charter of Charity," containing, in five chapters, all the necessary rules for the establishment and government of the order.

This order made a surprising progress. Fifty years after its institution, it had five hundred abbeyes, and, one hundred years afterwards, it boasted of one thousand eight hundred abbeyes, most of which had been founded before the year 1200. This great progress must be ascribed to the sanctity of the Cistercians, of whom cardinal de Vitry, in his Western History, says, "The whole church of Christ was full of the high reputation and opinion of their sanctity, as it were with the odor of some divine balsam, and that there was no country or province wherein this vine, loaded with blessings, had not spread forth its branches." And, describing their observances, he says, "They neither wore skins nor shirts, nor ever ate flesh, except in sickness, and abstained from fish, eggs, milk, and cheese; they lay only upon straw beds, in their tunics and cowls; they rose at midnight, and sang praises to God till break of day; they spent the day in labor, reading, and prayer; and, in all their exercises, they observed a strict and continual silence: they fasted from the feast of the exaltation of the holy cross till Easter; and they exercised hospitality towards the poor, with extraordinary charity."

The order of Cistercians became in time so powerful, that it governed almost all Europe, both in spirituals and temporal. It did also great service to the church by means of the eminent men it produced. These religious were employed by the pope to convert the Albigenses. Some authors say, there have been six popes of this order; but it will be difficult to find any more than Eugenius III. and Benedict XII. It boasts of about forty cardinals, a great number of archbishops, bishops, &c. &c.—Hend. Buck.

CITIES OF REFUGE. (See REFUGE.)

CITIZEN. This word denotes not only a resident in a city, but also any person admitted to its peculiar corporate privileges, by birth, favor, or purchase. Acts 22: 28.

CITRON. (See APPLE.)

CITY, or CITIES. By referring to some peculiarities in the building, fortifying, &c., of eastern cities, we shall the better understand several allusions and expressions of the Old Testament. It is evident that the walls of fortified cities were sometimes partly constructed of combustible materials; for the prophet, denouncing the judgments of God upon Syria and other countries, declares, "I will send a fire on the wall of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof," Amos 1: 7. The walls of Tyre and Rabbah seem to have been of the same perishable materials; for the prophet adds, "I will send a fire upon the wall of Tyrus, which shall devour the palaces thereof;" and again, "I will kindle a fire in the walls of Rabbah, and it shall devour the palaces thereof with shouting in the day of battle," verses 10, 14. One method of securing the gates of fortified places, among the ancients, was to cover them with thick plates of iron; a custom which is still used in the East, and seems to be of great antiquity. We learn from Pitts, that Algiers has five gates, and some of these have two, some three, other gates within them; and some of them are plated all over with thick iron. The place where the apostle was imprisoned, seems to have been secured in the same manner; for, says the inspired historian, "When they were past the first and second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city; which opened to them of its own accord," Acts 12: 10. Pococke, speaking of a bridge not far from Antioch, called the iron bridge, says, there are two towers belonging to it, the gates of which are covered with iron plates; which he supposes is the reason of the name it bears. Some of their gates are plated over with brass; such are the enormous gates of the principal mosque at Damascus, formerly the church of John the Baptist. To gates like these, the psalmist probably refers in these words: "He hath broken the gates of brass," (Psalm 107: 16;) and the prophet, in that remarkable passage, where God promises to go before Cyrus his anointed, and "break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron," Isa. 45: 2. But, conscious that all these precautions were insufficient for their security, the orientals employed watchmen to patrol the city during the night, to suppress any disorders in the streets, or to guard the walls against the attempts of a foreign enemy. To this custom Solomon refers in these words: "The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the wall took away my veil from me," Song 5: 7. This custom may be traced to a very remote antiquity; so early as the departure of Israel from the land of Egypt, the morning watch is mentioned, certainly indicating the time when the watchmen were commonly relieved. In Persia, the watchmen were obliged to indemnify those who were robbed in the streets; which accounts for the vigilance and severity which they display in the discharge of their office, and illustrates the character of watchman given to Ezekiel, and the duties he was required to perform. If the wicked perished in his iniquities without warning, the prophet was to be accountable for his blood; but if he duly pointed out his danger, he delivered his own soul, Ezek. 33: 2. They were also charged, as with us, to announce the progress of the night to the slumbering city: "The burden of Dumah; he calls to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night," Isa. 21: 11. This is confirmed by an observation of Chardin upon these words of Moses: "For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night;" that as the people of the east have no clocks, the several parts of the day and of the night, which are eight in all, are announced. In the Indies, the parts of the night are made known, as well by instruments of music, in great cities, as by the rounds of the watchmen, who, with cries and small drums, give them notice that a fourth part of the night is past. Now, as these cries awakened those who had slept all that quarter part of the night, it appeared to them but as a moment." It is evident the ancient Jews knew, by some public notice, how the night watches passed away; but, whether they simply announced the termination of the watch, or made use of trumpets, or other sonorous instruments, in making the proclamation, it may not be easy to determine; and still less what kind of chronometers the watchmen used. The probability is, that the watches were announced with the sound of a trumpet; for the prophet Ezekiel makes it a part of the watchman's duty, at least in time of war, to blow the trumpet, and warn the people. The watchman, in a time of danger, seems to have taken his station in a tower, which was built over the gate of the city.

The fortified cities in Canaan, as in some other countries, were commonly strengthened with a citadel, to which the inhabitants fled when they found it impossible to defend the place. The whole inhabitants of Thebez, unable to resist the repeated and furious assaults of Abimelech, retired into one of these towers, and bid defiance to his rage: "But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city, and shut it to them, and gat them up to the top of the tower." The extraordinary strength of this tower, and the various means of defence which were accumulated within its narrow walls, may be inferred from the violence of Abimelech's attack, and its fatal issue: "And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it, and went hard unto the door of the tower, to burn it with fire. And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his skull," Judg. 9: 53. The city of Shechem had a tower of the same kind, into which the people retired, when the same usurper took it and sowed it with salt, Judg. 9: 45. These strong towers which were built within a fortified city, were commonly placed on an eminence, to which they ascended by a flight of steps. Such was the situation of the city of David, a strong tower upon a high eminence at Jerusalem; and the manner of entrance, as described by the sacred writer: "But the gate of the fountain repaired Shallum, unto the stairs that go down from the city of David," Neh. 3: 15.—Watson.

CLAP, (NATHANIEL,) a Congregational minister of Newport, Rhode Island, was born Jan. 1668, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1690. In 1695, he began to preach at Newport, where he preached nearly fifty years. In 1740, when Mr. Whitefield arrived at Newport from Charleston, he called upon Mr. Clap, and he speaks of him as the most venerable man he ever saw. "He looked like a good old puritan, and gave me an idea of what stamp those men were, who first settled New England. His countenance was very heavenly, and he prayed most affectionately for a blessing on my coming to Rhode Island. I could not but think, that I was sitting with one of the patriarchs." Dean Berkeley, who esteemed him highly for his good deeds, said, "Before I saw father Clap, I thought the bishop of Rome had the gravest aspect of any man I ever saw; but really the minister of Newport has the most venerable appearance." Mr. Clap died Oct. 30, 1745, aged 77.

Mr. Clap was eminent for sanctity, piety, and an ardent desire to promote true godliness in others. He abounded in acts of charity, being the father and guardian of the poor and necessitous, and giving away all his living. His benevolent labors also extended to the humble and numerous class of slaves, to whom he endeavored with unwearied care to impart the knowledge of the gospel. Thus evincing the reality of his religion by the purity and benevolence of his life, he was an honor to the cause of the Redeemer, in which he was engaged. He departed this life in peace, without those raptures, which some express, but with perfect resignation to the will of God and with confidence in Jesus Christ, who was the sum of his doctrine and the end of his conversation. He published a sermon on the Lord's voice crying to the people in some extraordinary dispensations, 1715.—Callender's Fun. Serm.; Hist. Col. ix. 182, 183; Backus' Abridg. 157, 168; Whitefield's Jour. of 1749; 39—45; Eliot.—Allen.

CLAP, (THOMAS,) president of Yale college, was born at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1703, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1722. The early impressions, made upon his mind by divine grace, inclined him to the study of divinity. He was settled in the ministry at Windham, Con. August 3, 1726, the successor of Samuel Whiting. From this place he was removed in 1739, to the presidency of Yale college, as successor of E. Williams. This office he resigned, Sept. 10, 1766; and he died at Scituate, Jan. 7, 1767, aged 63. In the higher branches of mathematics, in astronomy, and in the various departments of natural philosophy, he had probably no equal in America, excepting professor Winthrop of Cambridge. He appears to have been extensively and profoundly acquainted with history, theology, moral philosophy, the canon and civil law, and with most of the objects of study in his time. The labors of his office left a most contemplative mind only a few hours for reading; but he employed what time he could devote to study in a most advantageous method. He always pursued his researches systematically, with an arrangement, which had respect to some whole. A large library before him he treated as a collection of reports, books delivering the knowledge and reasonings of the learned world on all subjects of literature. He seldom read a volume through in course. Having previously settled in his mind the particular subjects to be examined, he had recourse directly to the book, or the parts of a book, which would give him the desired information, generally passing by what did not relate to the object of his inquiry, however attracting and interesting. He thus amassed and digested a valuable treasure of erudition, having investigated almost all the principal subjects in the whole circle of literature.

As he was exemplary for piety in life, so he was resigned and peaceful at the hour of death. When some one in his last illness observed to him, that he was dangerously sick, he replied, that a person was not in a dangerous situation who was approaching the end of his toils. Mr. Clap constructed the first orrery, or planetarium, made in America. His manuscripts were plundered in the expedition against New Haven under general Tryon. He had made collections of materials for a history of Connecticut. He published a sermon at the ordination of Ephraim Little, Colchester, Sept. 20, 1732; letter to Mr. Edwards, respecting Mr. Whitefield's design, 1745; the religious constitution of colleges, 1754; a brief history and vindication of the doctrines received and established in the churches of New England, with a specimen of the new scheme of religion, beginning to prevail, 1755; this scheme he collects from the writings of Chubb, Taylor, Foster, Hutcheson, Campbell, and Ramsay. CLARENDON, (CONSTITUTIONS OF,) sixteen articles formed at the council held at that place, in the reign of Henry II., bearing that all differences relative to the right of patronage should be tried in the civil courts; that no churches, which are fees of the crown, can be disposed of in perpetual donation without the king's consent; that all clergymen, charged with crimes against the laws, shall appear before the lord chief justice, as well as before the ecclesiastical courts, and none of them, after conviction, be protected by the church; that no clergyman shall go out of the kingdom without his majesty's consent, and their giving proper security of their doing nothing to the prejudice of him or his subjects; that accusations of laymen, in ecclesiastical courts, shall be proved by reputable witnesses; that excommunicated persons shall not be compelled to reside on any particular locality; that no person holding immediately of the king, or any of his barons, should be excommunicated, &c. without first acquainting the king or his chief justice; that none shall appeal from the archbishop's court without his majesty's consent; that bishops and abbots must perform the services annexed to their tenures when required, be present at all trials, except when sentences of blood, or of losing life or limb, are to be pronounced; that the revenues of all vacant bishoprics, abbeys, or priories of a royal foundation, shall be paid into the king's exchequer; that the king shall have the power of convening the electors of bishops, abbots, and priors, and the electors must do homage to him before their consecration; that he shall punish every wrong done to the superior clergy, and they shall prosecute such as injure him; that no goods of forfeited persons shall be protected from his seizure, in churches or churchyards; that all pleas of debt shall be tried in civil courts, &c. These articles were designed to abridge and curb the power of the clergy, which, under the presidency, and owing to the ambition and influence of Thomas à Becket, had grown to an intolerable height.—*Hend. CLARISSSES; an order of nuns, so called from their founder, St. Clara. She was of the town of Assisa, in Italy, and, having renounced the world to dedicate herself to religion, gave birth to this order, in the year 1212; which comprehends, not only those nuns who follow the rule of St. Francis, according to the strict letter, and without any mitigation, but those likewise who follow the same rule, softened and mitigated by several popes.

The reputation of St. Clara, being very great, soon gained her a great number of followers; for whom several monasteries began to be erected in several parts of Italy. In the year 1219, the order passed into Spain, and presently after into France. In the year 1224, St. Francis, at the request of St. Clara, prescribed rules for the government of the Clarisses, in which he forbade them to have any possessions, and enjoined them silence from the compline to the tierce of the following day. He gave them for their habit three tunics and a mantle. The rules of the Clarisses were approved by Gregory IX. and Innocent IV.

The order of St. Clara, which had made a great progress during the life of the founder, made a still greater after her death, and is at present one of the most flourishing orders of nuns in Europe.

In Italy, there are monasteries of Clarisses, some of which take the name of "Nuns of the strict observance;" others that of "Solitaries of the institution of St. Peter of Alcantara." The former had for their foundress, Frances de Jesus-Maria, of the house of Farnese, who built their first monastery at Albano, in the year 1631. These nuns observe the rule of St. Clara in its utmost rigor. The others had for their founder cardinal Barberini, who built their first monastery in the town of Farsa. They were denominated from St. Peter of Alcantara, because, in all things, they imitated the rigorous and penitential life of that saint.

After Ferdinand Cortez had conquered Mexico for the king of Spain, Isabella of Portugal, wife of the emperor Charles V., sent thither some nuns of the order of St. Clara, who made several settlements there, particularly at Zuchimilci, Tetzeuci, Quaustihlani, Telmanaci, Tapeaca, Thevacana, and in several other places. Near their monasteries were founded communities of Indian young women, to be instructed by the Clarisses in religion, and such works as were suitable to persons of their sex. These communities of Indian girls are so considerable, that they usually consist of no less than four or five hundred.—Hend. Buck.

CLARKE, (DR. SAMUEL,) a celebrated divine of the sixteenth century, was born at Norwich, on the 11th of October, 1675, his father being an alderman of that city. He received his first education in the free school in that place, under the superintendance of the Rev. Mr. Burton, but was, in a short time, removed to Caius college, Cambridge. Whilst at that university, he devoted much of his time to the study of theology, and diligently cultivated a knowledge of the Old Testament, in the original Hebrew; the New, in the original Greek; and the primitive Christian writers. Before he arrived at the age of twenty-one, he largely contributed to the Newtonian system, a study, the knowledge of which, by application and industry, he made himself master of. He translated Rouhault's Physics, for the use of young students, which has been considered the most concise and best that has been written. In 1699, he published "Three practical Essays upon Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance," containing full instructions for a holy life, with earnest exhortations to young persons, drawn from the consideration of the severity of the discipline of the primitive church; and in 1701, his "Paraphrase on the Four Gospels" was put to press. In the year 1704, he delivered a lecture on "The Being and Attributes of God;" and in the following year, on the "Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion;" in which he displayed a force of reasoning, a vein of piety, and an extent of knowledge, which proved that his mind was at once vast and comprehensive, and that he was indeed no ordinary man. These sermons he afterwards enlarged on, improved, and published; and the work is a standard book in the English language. Dr. Hoadley, bishop of Winchester, when speaking of this work, and of his writings, said, "He has in them laid the foundation of true religion too deep and strong to be shaken, either by the superstition of some, or the infidelity of others." In 1706, Mr. Clarke obtained the rectory of St. Bennett's, Paul's wharf, in London, where he executed the duties of his ministerial office with zeal and devotion. During this year, he translated Sir Isaac Newton's Treatise on Optics into Latin. He enjoyed the peculiar patronage and friendship of this great man, and it was at his request that that admirable translation was accomplished. His patron was so well pleased with the performance, that he presented him with the sum of five hundred pounds as a mark of his approbation and esteem. He also introduced him to court, and procured him the favor of queen Anne, who appointed him one of her chaplains. She also made him the presentation of the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, where he read lectures on the church catechism for many months in the year, on a Thursday evening; and which have been since published, and received, as they merited, very general approbation. In 1709, he took his degree of doctor in divinity, at Cambridge; and soon afterwards became engaged in a warm controversy on the "Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," which tended greatly to spread Arianism over the country. He seems to have been led into the erroneous views which he adopted and attempted to defend, by his metaphysical turn of mind, and by pursuing improperly the language of human creeds respecting the generation of the Son of God. About this time he was presented by Mr. Lechmere, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, to the mastership of Wigston's hospital, in Leicester; and, in 1727, the offer was made him of the place of master of the mint; but this he refused.

His death was very sudden and painful. On the morning of the day he preached before the judges at Serjeant's Inn, he was seized with a pain in his side, which, in the evening, ascended to his head, and proved fatal on the following morning, May the 17th, 1729.—Hend. Buck.

CLARKE, (JOHN,) a distinguished Baptist minister, and one of the first founders of Rhode Island, was a physician in London, before he came to this country. Soon after the first settlement of Massachusetts, he was driven from that colony with a number of others; and March 7, 1638, they formed themselves into a body politic and purchased Aquetneck of the Indian sachems, calling it the isle of Rhodes, or Rhode Island. The settlement commenced at Pocasset, or Portsmouth. The Indian deed is dated March 24, 1638. Mr. Clarke was soon employed as a preacher, and in 1644, he formed a church at Newport and became its pastor. This was the second Baptist church, which was established in America.

In 1649, he was an assistant and treasurer of Rhode Island colony. In 1651, he went to visit one of his brethren at Lynn, near Boston, and he preached on Sunday, July 20; but, before he had completed the services of the forenoon, he was seized with his friends by an officer of the government. In the afternoon, he was compelled to attend the parish meeting, at the close of which he spoke a few words. He was tried before the court of assistants, and fined twenty pounds, in case of failure in the payment of which sum he was to be whipped. In passing the sentence, judge Endicot observed, "You secretly insinuate things into those, who are weak, which you cannot maintain before our misters; you may try and dispute with them." Mr. Clarke accordingly wrote from prison, proposing a dispute upon the principles which he professed. He represented his principles to be, that Jesus Christ had the sole right of prescribing any laws respecting the worship of God, which it was necessary to obey; that baptism, or dipping in water, was an ordinance to be administered only to those, who gave some evidence of repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ; that such visible believers only constituted the church; that each of them had a right to speak in the congregation, according as the Lord had given him talents, either to make inquiries for his own instruction, or to prophesy for the edification of others, and that at all times and in all places they ought to reprove folly and open their lips to justify wisdom; and that no servant of Jesus Christ had any authority to restrain any fellow servant in his worship, where injury was not offered to others. No dispute, however, occurred, and Mr. Clarke, his friends paying his fine, without his consent, was soon released from prison, and directed to leave the colony. His companion, Obadiah Holmes, shared a severer fate; for on declining to pay his fine of thirty pounds, which his friends offered to do for him, he was publicly whipped in Boston.

In 1651, Mr. Clarke was sent to England with Roger Williams to promote the interests of Rhode Island, and particularly to procure a revocation of Mr. Coddington's commission as governor. Soon after his arrival he published a book, giving an account of the persecutions in New England. In Oct. 1652, the commission of Mr. Coddington was annulled. After the return of Mr. Williams, Mr. Clarke was left behind, and continued in England as agent for the colony, till he obtained the second charter, July 8, 1663, to procure which he mortgaged his estate in Newport. The petition which Mr. Clarke presented to Charles II. for this charter, was drawn up in these memorable words, "That they might be permitted to hold forth a lively experiment, that a most flourishing civil state may stand and best be maintained, and that among English subjects, with a full liberty in religious concerns; and that true piety, rightly grounded in gospel principles, will give the best and greatest security to sovereignty." Mr. Clarke returned in 1664, and continued the pastor of his church till his death. He died at Newport, April 20, 1676, aged about 66 years, resigning his soul to his merciful Redeemer, through faith in whose name he enjoyed the hope of a resurrection to eternal life.

His life was so pure, that he was never accused of any vice, to leave a blot on his memory. His noble sentiments respecting religious toleration did not indeed accord with the sentiments of the age in which he lived, and exposed him to trouble; but at the present time they are almost universally embraced. His exertions to promote the civil prosperity of Rhode Island must endear his name to those, who are now enjoying the fruits of his labors. He possessed the singular honor of contributing much towards establishing the first government upon the earth, which gave equal liberty, civil and religious, to all men living under it; although in Maryland, during the administration of Charles Calvert, appointed governor in 1662, an act was passed, allowing all Christians to settle in the province.

In his last will he left his farm in Newport to charitable purposes; the income of it to be given to the poor and to be employed for the support of learning and religion. It has produced about two hundred dollars a year, and has thus been promoting the public interests ever since his death.

He left behind him a writing, which expressed his religious opinions. He believed, that all things, with their causes, effects, circumstances, and manner of being, are decreed by God; that this decree is the determination from eternity of what shall come to pass in time; that it is most wise, just, necessary, and unchangeable, the cause of all good, but not of any sin; that election is the decree of God, choosing, of his free love, grace, and mercy, some men to faith, holiness, and eternal life; that sin is the effect of man's free will, and condemnation an effect of justice, inflicted upon man for sin and disobedience. It was not in these opinions, but in his sentiments respecting baptism, that he differed from the ministers of Massachusetts.

The title of the book, which he published in London in 1652, is, Ill news from New England, or a Narrative of New England's Persecution; wherein it is declared, that while Old England is becoming New, New England is becoming Old; also, Four Proposals to Parliament and Four Conclusions, touching the faith and order of the gospel of Christ out of his last will and testament, 4to, pp. 76. See Backus's Church History of New England, iii. 227, 228; Backus' Abridgment, 84, 86, 109—116. Benedict, vol. i. p. 458—495.—Allen.

CLARKE, (EDWARD DANIEL,) a son of the author of Letters on the Spanish Nation, was born in 1767, and educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. In 1794, he accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy; and, in 1799, he set out, with Mr. Cripps, on a tour which extended over the whole of Scandinavia, and through Russia, Circassia, Turkey, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece, and was not terminated till 1802. By his exertions the library of Cambridge was enriched with nearly a hundred volumes of manuscripts, and the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres. He was rewarded with the degree of LL. D. by the university. He also obtained for his country the sarcophagus of Alexander, on which he published a Dissertation. His Travels form five volumes, 4to. Shortly after his return he was instituted to the rectory of Harlton, in Cambridgeshire. In 1806, he began, at the university, a series of mineralogical lectures, and, in 1808, a professorship of mineralogy being founded, he was appointed to the chair. The lectures which he delivered in that capacity were highly popular, and his experiments with the oxy-hydrogen blowpipe were productive of important scientific results. Dr. Clarke died in Pall Mall, March 9, 1821.—Davenport.

CLARKE, (ABRAHAM,) a signer of the declaration of independence, was born in New Jersey, in 1726. He was a delegate to the continental congress, a member of the general convention which framed the constitution, and a representative in the second congress of the United States. He died in 1794. He was a man of exemplary piety and unsullied integrity.—Davenport.

CLARKE, (ADAM, LL. D. F. S. A.,) the celebrated commentator, was born in Moybeg, Ireland, in 1760. His father was a conscientious English Episcopalian, and a good classical school-master; but his mother, to whom the early part of his education is attributed, was a Scotch Presbyterian, of the Maclean family, and of a warmer piety than her husband, though "far from being a Calvinist." Adam was their second son. His infancy was marked by hardihood of body; tenderness of conscience; a thirst for knowledge, but a singular inaptitude in acquiring it. This last trait was however suddenly changed, at the age of eight years, by the reproaches of a school-fellow; his latent energies were roused by emulation; and he became the admiration of the school for his rapid proficiency in every branch of study, with the exception of arithmetic; in which he says of himself, that he "could never make any progress." His time was divided between classical study and labor on his father's farm. He was designed for the ministry, and had a vague longing for it; but up to the year 1777, his religion was wholly the effect of his religious education. At that period, under the ministry of the Methodists, particularly of Mr. Thomas Barber, he was led to earnest prayer, and searching of the Scriptures, and ultimately to Christ, to the evidence of adoption, and communion with God in Christ. This, which he ever regarded as the most important era in his religious history, occurred when he was seventeen years of age. From this time he had rest to his soul; and could devote himself unreservedly, and with an energy hitherto unknown, to glorify God in his studies, and in all the duties of life. His own language here is worthy of preservation, and throws light upon his future history and attainments; "I saw from my own case that religion was the gate to true learning and science; and that those who went through their studies without this, had at least double work to do; and in the end not an equal produce. My mind became enlarged to take in every thing useful. I was now separated from every thing that could impede my studies, obscure or debase my mind. Learning and science I knew came from God, because he is the fountain of all knowledge; and properly speaking, these things belong to man; God created them not for himself—not for angels—but for man; and he fulfils not the design of his Creator, who does not cultivate his mind in all useful knowledge, to the utmost of his circumstances and power."

Soon after this, in 1782, Mr. Clarke was recommended to the notice of Mr. Wesley, by Mr. John Bredin, and sent to the Kingswood school. While here, when digging in the garden, he one day found a half-guinea, with which he bought a Hebrew Grammar, and this apparently trifling circumstance is said to have laid the foundation of all his critical knowledge of the sacred writings in the Old and New Testament. A few weeks after, he was approved by Mr. Wesley, and sent into Wiltshire as a circuit preacher, at the age of twenty-two, though from his youthful appearance he was called the "little boy." His early ministry was equally marked by great privations, popularity, persecution, perseverance, and success. In a letter to a friend, in 1786, written from Guernsey, he says, "Here I am determined by the grace of God to conquer or die; and have taken the following for a motto, and have placed it before me on the mantel-piece, "Stand thou as a beaten unvill to the stroke; for it is the property of a good warrior to be flayed alive, and yet conquer."

While this motto displays the unconquerable resolution which should characterize every preacher who aims at extensive usefulness, there is another which he also adopted at the same time, or even earlier, from Prov. 18: 1, which is no less worthy of commendation. "Through desire, a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom." No man, perhaps, more fully exemplified the maxim; and thus the ardor of the student explains the rising popularity of the preacher. Up to 1815, it appears he pursued his private biblical studies in connexion with the usual itinerant avocations of a Methodist preacher, so that the foundation of his Commentary may be said to have been laid as early as 1785. That he might not lose the time which he was obliged to spend in riding, which was several miles a day, he accustomed himself to read on horseback—a practice which, he admits, was both dangerous and injurious to the eyes.

In 1788, he was married to Miss Mary Cooke, daughter of Mr. John Cooke, clothier, of Trowbridge, a lady of fine disposition, deep piety, and sound judgment. Few connexions of this kind were ever more opposed; few, if any, were ever more happy. They had six sons, and as many daughters, one half of whom were permitted to live to years of maturity.

The earliest mark of public distinction conferred upon him, was his election to be a fellow of the Antiquarian society. In 1805, he received the honorary degree of M. A., and in 1806, that of LL. D. from the university of St. Andrews. He was subsequently chosen to be a member of the Royal Irish academy. He was, besides, a member of several American literary associations. He was enrolled among the members of several other learned bodies, whose journals contain some of his communications.

From 1805, Dr. Clarke resided in London, being closely engaged on his Commentary; but at the same time he fulfilled the duties of his station as a preacher, and took a part in the management of various associations for literary, scientific, and benevolent purposes. His health failing in 1815, he removed to Millbrook in Lancashire, where by the munificence of his friends an estate was purchased for him. Here he continued his Commentary, and brought it nearly to a close. His celebrity, his finely-cultivated farm, his vast and valuable library, and rich museum, here attracted the visits of the neighboring nobility and gentry; until 1823, when he disposed of his estate, and removed again to London. Finding, however, that his health still required the nourishment of country air, he purchased a mansion called Haydon Hall, about seventeen miles from the metropolis, in the village of Eastcott. Here he finished his Commentary, April 17, 1826, on which he had been occupied about forty years.

In 1831, whether with or against his consent is unknown, he was set down on the stations as a supernumerary. Still he had what he called a "roving commission," and was to have preached in fulfilment of it at Bayswater, on the morning of the day on which he died. But this was denied in the inscrutable providence of Heaven; for being seized with the malignant cholera, he breathed his last at a quarter past eleven, A. M., August 26, 1832. The conscious approach of the last enemy disturbed not his settled confidence in his divine Savior, in whom he had long believed, and in solemn communion with whom, the last moments of life were evidently occupied.

"The person of Dr. Clarke," says one of his friends, "was tall, athletic, and erect." His florid complexion showed him to be a man of robust health and sanguine temperament. His features were rather expressive of good sound sense and good humor, than of intellectual greatness, and were illuminated by gray eyes, small, but brilliant."

"The style of his writing is unstudied, and in his punctuation he had no system at all. But its redeeming qualities are, pregnancy, force, and vigor; a sterling and plentiful vocabulary; and the dexterous management of iteration. On practical subjects he wrote, as well as spoke, with the unction and the energy which spring out of acute sensibility and intimate experience. He was, undoubtedly, an author of first-rate talent, in the field in which he labored, and he evinces always the possession of a capacious and acute understanding. Of his knowledge it were superfluous to speak—it was only not unbounded.

"His preaching had the advantage of his writing, in the particular we have pointed out. It is no small proof of his greatness in the pulpit, that his sermons were equally received by the rich and the poor, the learned and the illiterate. He brought his learning to bear upon his subject, without any parade, and in the most instructive form; and his native fervor, joined with the clearness of his conceptions, and the vastness of his resources, never failed to elevate and inform his hearers. There was a sort of cordiality in his preaching that was its principal charm."

"His intellectual and moral worth won for him the respect, and honor, and reverence, which all men have conceded to him. He occupied a place which nothing else could have enabled him to acquire, and afterwards maintained to his dying day. And we may affirm, that among those that can discern the things that differ—who know how to appreciate intellectual vigor, moral worth, honest independence, real learning, practical usefulness, disinterested generosity, and inflexible integrity—there never was a man more highly and sincerely honored while he lived, or more deeply and deservedly lamented when he died. His publications were—Dissertation on the Use and Abuse of Tobacco, 1797; A Biographical Dictionary, 1802, followed by a Supplement in 1806; The Succession of Saered Literature, 1807; The Holy Scriptures, &c. &c., with a Commentary and Critical Notes, eight vols. 4to. 1810-26; Clavis Biblica, or a Compendium of Scripture Knowledge; Memoirs of the Wesley Family; three volumes of Sermons, besides several single discourses and detached pieces; and anonymous articles, published in various journals.

He also edited Baxter's Christian Directory, abridged, 1804; Fleury's Manners of the Ancient Israelites, 1805; Shuckford's Sacred and Profane History of the World connected, including bishop Clayton's Strictures on the work, 1808; Sturm's Reflections, translated from the German, and Harmer's Observations, four volumes, octavo, the best edition of this valuable work which has appeared: being newly arranged, with large additions by the editor.

In addition to the above publications, Dr. Clarke was employed several years by government, in collecting materials for a new edition of Rymer's Fœdera in folio: of which he saw the first volume and a part of the second through the press. This great national work is now superintended by a commission under government.

But it is upon the merits of his Commentary that the future reputation of Dr. Clarke will chiefly rest. Many good men have regretted that he should have inserted in it, what had no business there, Taylor's Key to the Romans, where his own deprecativ notes must fail to counteract entirely, the subtle and pernicious influence of Arian and Pelagian errors. Apart from this, "as to the few peculiarities of opinion on account of which the work has been by some attempted to be disparaged," says Beaumont, "they do not affect any essential leading doctrine of religion: and we affirm, that no other commentator in this or any other country, has taught and established more clearly and pointedly, and forcefully—the fall and depravity of human nature—the redemption by Jesus Christ—the extent and efficacy of the atonement—the justification of the sinner by faith in that atonement—the necessity and reality of the influence of the Holy Ghost—and the entire sanctification of the whole man—than he, who, though dead, yet speaketh."—Autobiography of Dr. Clarke; Beaumont's Sermon on his Death; Mémoir in the London Christian Advocate.

CLARKSON, (GEN. MATTHEW,) a soldier of the revolution, was distinguished in the war of independence for his courage, talents, and integrity. He acted as aid-de-camp to general Gates in the battle of Stillwater, in which, as he was carrying an order to the officer of the left wing by passing in front of the American line, when engaged, he received a severe wound in his neck. In his last years he was vice-president of the American Bible Society, and much of his time was devoted to the meetings of the managers. He died at New York, after an illness of five days, April 22, 1825, aged sixty-six years. Amiable, frank, affectionate, pure and beneficent, his character was crowned by an exalted piety.—Allen.

CLAUDA; a small island toward the south-east of Crete, Acts 27: 16.

CLAUDE, bishop of Turin, sometimes termed the first Protestant reformer, was by birth a Spaniard. In his early years he was chaplain to Ludovicus Pius, king of France, and emperor of the West; and even then he was in high repute for his knowledge of the Scriptures, and his first-rate talents as a preacher. The abbe Fleury, in his Ecclesiastical History, informs us, that Louis, perceiving the deplorable ignorance which then pervaded a great part of Italy, and desirous of providing the churches of Piedmont with one who might stem the torrent of image worship, promoted Claude to the see of Turin, about the year 817. "And in truth," says Fleury, "he began to preach and instruct with great application." His first efforts were directed against the prevailing rites of the papacy; the worship of images; the veneration paid to relics and crosses; and the practice of pilgrimage. Against these and similar superstitions, Claude inveighed with such intrepidity, that, in a little time, the monks were all up in arms against him, reviling him as a heretic and blasphemous, and the good man went about in fear of his life. Supported, however, by the testimony of a good conscience, and a confidence in the divine approbation, he nobly persevered, until the valleys of Piedmont were filled with his doctrine. He wrote commentaries on several parts of the Bible, particularly on the books of Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus; on the Gospel by Matthew; and on all the Apostolic Epistles. After his death, his writings were collected into two volumes, quarto, and placed in the abbey of Fleury, near Orleans, in France. He continued his labors at Turin at least twenty years, for he was alive in 839; but of the precise time and circumstances of his death, we find no record. He evidently possessed a very enlightened mind in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and was endowed with extraordinary zeal in propagating divine truth in that dark and benighted period; and his name deserves to be handed down to the remotest posterity with honor and veneration. The reader will find many interesting extracts from his writings in Jones's History of the Christian Church, 7ol. . chap. iv. sect. 1.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

CLAUDE, (REV. JOHN.) This great man was born at Sauvetat, France, in 1618. His father, the Rev. Francis Claude, was successively pastor of several reformed congregations in Lower Guienne, and was greatly esteemed for his pious and honorable manner of discharging the duties of his office. Mr. John Claude was educated by his father, until it was deemed proper to send him to Montauban, to finish his studies. Having gone through his course of natural philosophy, he studied divinity under professors Garrisoles and Charles. The brilliancy of his imagination, his acute judgment, and sincere piety, together with his modest and affable manners, procured him the friendship of all who knew him. He was desirous of visiting other universities; but he gave up this intention, at the wish of his father, who was anxious to see him in the ministerial office. After having been examined and fully approved by the synod of Upper Languedoc, his father was appointed to ordain him over the church at La Treynne; an office which he performed with great pleasure, and died soon after, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. Mr. Claude remained with this church but one year; the synod appointing him to succeed Mr. Martel of St. Afrique, in Rovergue. The church at this place not being numerous, he devoted a very large portion of his time to study, and it was soon observed that he had not studied in vain; his preaching was greatly improved, and gave very general pleasure to his auditors. About two years after this, he preached an occasional sermon at Castres; which made so deep an impression on the hearers, that an effort was made by the church to obtain Mr. Claude as a minister; he was, however, destined for another station. At St. Afrique, he married Mrs. Elizabeth de Malecare, a member of the church, by whom he had one son, named Isaac, born in the year 1653. He continued here eight years; during which time he was sought after by several other churches, and much honored by the synod of Upper Languedoc, at which he was annually present.

In the year 1654, the church of Nismes, one of the most conspicuous in France, being destitute of a minister, applied to Mr. Claude, who, after consulting with his friends at St. Afrique, accepted the invitation, and was appointed pastor by the synod. The duties of this station were very heavy; preaching daily, visiting great numbers of sick people, attending consistories, together with church business, required very great application; but he not only gave the highest satisfaction in these duties, but found time to give lectures on divinity to a great number of students; some of whom possessed great merit, and did honor to Mr. Claude's instructions.

As Mr. Claude's reputation increased, the envy and jealousy of the Romish clergy was excited; they narrowly watched for an opportunity to displace him; and it was not long before they found one. It will be necessary, in order to give a clear detail of Mr. Claude's life at this time, to advert to the state of things, as it regarded the Protestants in France. The privileges which they had obtained by the edict of Nantz, in 1598, were gradually undermined by a scheme, which originated with that deceitful enemy of the reformed churches, cardinal Richelieu: he pretended that a union of the Protestants and Catholics was practicable and desirable; that the difference of their opinions was not so great as was imagined; and that their inconsistencies might be reconciled by proper explanation. While he was circulating these pacific doctrines, in order to delude the Protestants, he persuaded Louis the Thirteenth to deprive them successively of all their privileges. These plans were pursued in the following reign, and many were deceived by their apparent usefulness. Such was the state of affairs when Mr. Claude was chosen moderator of the synod of Lower Languedoc, in the year 1662. He now resolutely opposed the scheme of re-union, and defeated all the plans which were set on foot to forward it. This conduct was very displeasing to some persons; and in a short time he was prohibited from preaching in the province of Languedoc. Upon this, he went to Paris to endeavor to obtain a remission of this decree; he was, however, unsuccessful. While at Paris on this business, he heard that marshal Turenne intended to quit the reformed religion; and that his change of sentiment was occasioned by reading a book, called "Perpetuity of the Faith," written either by Dr. Arnault or Dr. Nicole. At the request of some of his friends, Mr. Claude wrote a complete answer to this work, in which he defeated the sophistical arguments it contained, in a very able manner. This roused the feelings of the Catholics to a very great degree, and many attempts were made to find out the author, but, fortunately for him, without success. Being unable to get his suspension taken off, he visited Montauban, where he arrived on a Saturday; and having preached the next day, the church there requested him to settle with them. He complied with their invitation; and the synod having confirmed their choice, he again commenced his pastoral labors. In this church he is said to have spent the happiest years of his life; for he was much attached to the place, as well as to the people. About four years after this time, a circumstance occurred which obliged him to leave. Marshal Turenne had been apparently satisfied by Mr. Claude's answer to the "Perpetuity;" but three years after, his doubts were revived by another book, written by the same author, in answer to Mr. Claude. The papists talked much of the victory obtained by this work, and so much did its fame increase, that Mr. Claude prepared to answer it. A report soon spread, that one of the reformed ministers was writing an answer; and, as there was reason to suppose that it was at Montauban, the bishop was employed to find it out. He consequently waited on Mr. Claude, informed him of the reports that were circulating, and requested a sight of the work he was preparing. Mr. Claude, who did not wish to conceal any thing, showed him a part of the manuscript, and told him that the remainder was printing at Paris. Shortly after this, an order of council came down, prohibiting the exercise of his ministry at Montauban; on which he immediately resigned his charge and went to Paris, as before, to get his suspension taken off; although he was convinced that success was almost impossible, since, in cases of this sort, every process was sure of being lost.

At this time the Reformed church of Paris, meeting at Charenton, determined to elect Mr. Claude as one of their ministers; and having some influence at court, they obtained leave to do so. In this charge he was associated with Messrs. L'Angle, Daille, and Allix.

Shortly after his settlement, he wrote another book in answer to father Nouet, with which the Protestants were much pleased; particularly with the preface. The station which he now occupied was the most important and conspicuous among the Reformed churches in France. Paris was the place where all the mischief of the papists was planned; it, therefore, required constant vigilance to discover and counteract it: the provincial churches also looked for advice and example from Charenton, as they were well aware that it was exposed to the first attacks.

Soon after this, Mr. Claude published a fourth answer to Dr. Arnault, who had again attacked him on the ground of the "Perpetuity." This was followed by a piece entitled, "A Defence of the Reformation;" one of the most valuable works ever written on that subject. He afterwards published five sermons on "the Parable of the Wedding Feast," which he had preached at Charenton, the year before.

At this time, his son returning from his studies in order to prepare himself for the pulpit, Mr. Claude drew up for his improvement, the "Essay on the Composition of a Sermon." Young Mr. Claude was examined by the synod at Sedan, in September, 1678, and the following month his father ordained him pastor of the church of Clermont Beauvoisis. This year the celebrated conference took place between Mr. Claude and Bossuet, the bishop of Coudon. It was occasioned by mademoiselle Duras's professing to be undecided in her opinions; and as she was a member of Mr. Claude's church, she expressed a wish for this conference. Great pains were taken to prevent it; but, after much persuasion, the request was acceded to; and thus began a controversy which extended over the greater part of Europe, and at last terminated, as such things usually do, very unsatisfactorily.

In the year 1682, when the clergy of France dispersed circular letters through the kingdom, professedly for the conversion of the Reformed churches, Mr. Claude printed a small work, called "Considerations on the Circular Letters of the Assembly," exposing their hypocritical design: declaring that he did not own the spiritual authority of the prelates, and vindicating liberty of conscience for all parties. This work was published anonymously; but it was well known that Mr. Claude was the author. The letters of the assembly not answering the intended purpose, the prelates procured an order for their notification to all the Protestants in the kingdom. The Reformed churches now all looked up to Charenton; and relying on the prudence and firmness of Mr. Claude, and determining to be governed by his example, Charenton was the first consistory summoned on this business, and Mr. Claude was in the chair. The intendant read the letter, and Mr. Claude made a short reply, intimating that they respected and submitted to the civil magistracy, and the prelates on account of their rank; but that neither he nor his church could acknowledge their authority as an ecclesiastical tribunal. This judicious answer served as a model for the other consistories.

About this time, the university of Groningen made him an offer of a professorship; but flattering as the prospect was to him, he would not desert his church at the time when he saw the storm of persecution rapidly approaching; he, therefore, declined the appointment.

As the difficulties of the Protestants now thickened on every side, Mr. Claude exerted himself more assiduously than ever, to prepare the church for the blow which was about to fall upon it. The great plot of the papal clergy was now deemed ripe for execution. In May, 1685, an assembly was held at Versailles, when they presented an address to the king, congratulating him on the success of the design to extirpate heresy, and the oppressive measures which had been adopted. Not content with this, they recommended other restrictions more tyrannical than any which had yet been forced upon the Protestants. The chancellor, father le Tellier, perceiving that he should not live much longer, and wishing to see the total ruin of the Protestant cause, obtained in the following October, the "revocation of the edict of Nantz." This was the completion of the work in which the clergy had been so active, the extirpation of Protestantism. The church at Charenton obtained an order for the continuance of public worship until the edict was published; which time they spent in religious exercises, and the settlement of their affairs.

An ineffectual attempt was made to embroil the church with the civil powers, by a meeting after the publication of the edict; but Mr. Claude's prudence, however, defeated the plan, and so much incensed the bishops that they procured his banishment, before that of the other pastors: he left Paris on the 23d of December, 1685, and went to reside with his son, who was pastor of the Walloon church at the Hague. The elector of Brandenburg invited Mr. Claude to settle in his territories, but he declined; the states at the Hague provided for him handsomely, and the prince of Orange settled a pension on him. Here he enjoyed that quiet which had been denied him in France; his house being an asylum for the dispersed Protestants. Here also he collected materials for his last work, "The Complaints of the Protestants of France," which gives a vivid description of their calamities. On the 25th of December, 1686, he preached one of his finest sermons, but it was the occasion of his death. He exerted himself so much, that it brought on a fever the same night; he daily became worse: and on the 13th of January he expired, in the sixty-eighth year of his age; after spending forty-two years in the service of the church, and in the firm defence of the principles of the reformation.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

CLAUDIÁ; a Roman lady converted by Paul, 2 Tim. 4: 21. Some think she was the wife of Prudens, who is named immediately before her; others conjecture that she was a British lady, sister of Linus. (See CHRISTIANITY.)

CLAUDIUS, (CÆSAR,) the emperor of Rome, mentioned in the New Testament, succeeded Caius Caligula, A. D. 41, and reigned upwards of thirteen years. He gave to Agrippa all Judea; and to his brother Herod, the kingdom of Chalcis. He terminated the dispute between the Jews and the Alexandrians, confirming the former in the freedom of that city, and in the free exercise of their religion and laws; but not permitting them to hold assemblies at Rome. Agrippa dying in the fourth year of Claudius, A. D. 44, the emperor again reduced Judea into a province, and sent Cuspius Fadus as governor. About this time happened the famine, as foretold by the prophet Agabus, (Acts 11: 28, 29, 30.) and at the same period, Herod, king of Chalcis, obtained, from the emperor, the authority over the temple, and the money consecrated to God, with a power of deposing and establishing the high-priests. In the ninth year of Claudius, (A. D. 49,) he published an order, expelling all Jews from Rome, (Acts 18: 2.) and it is probable, that the Christians, being confounded with the Jews, were banished likewise. Suetonius plainly intimates this, when he says that Claudius expelled the Jews, by reason of the continual disturbances excited by them, at the instigation of Chrestus:—an ancient way of spelling the title of Christ. Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, and was succeeded by Nero.—Calmet.

CLAUDIUS, (LYSIAIS;) tribune of the Roman troops, which kept guard at the temple of Jerusalem. Observing the tumult raised on account of Paul, whom the Jews had seized, and designed to murder, he rescued him, and (Acts 21: 27, 23, 31.) carried him to fort Antonia, and afterwards sent him guarded to Cesarea.—Calmet.

CLAY, is often mentioned in Scripture, nor is it necessary to explain the various references to what is so well known. It may be remarked, however, that clay was used for sealing doors. Norden and Pococke observe, that the inspectors of the granaries in Egypt, after closing the door, put their seal upon a handful of clay, with which they cover the lock. This may help to explain Job 38: 14, in which the earth is represented as assuming form and imagery from the brightness of the rising sun, as rude clay receives a figure from the impression of a seal or signet.—Watson.

CLEAN, CLEANSE. (See PURIFICATIONS, and PURIFY; also ANIMALS.)

CLEAVE. To cleave to any one is to adhere firmly, with ardent love. To cleave to the Lord, is firmly to believe his word, hold intimate fellowship with him in his fullness, receive and retain his Spirit, abide faithful to his truth, follow closely his example, and obey all his commands. Acts 11: 23.—Brown.

CLEMENCY; a mild, generous, and forgiving disposition. It is often falsely ascribed to princes, by flatterers. Acts 14: 4.

CLEMENT, whose name is in the Book of Life, Phil. 4: 3. Most interpreters conclude that this is the same Clement who succeeded in the government of the church at Rome.

The church at Corinth having been disturbed by divisions, Clement wrote a letter to the Corinthians, which was so much esteemed by the ancients, that they read it publicly in many churches. It is still extant, and some have inclined to rank it among the canonical writings. It makes a part of the Apocryphal New Testament, and breathes a spirit of true Christian charity and simplicity. We have no authentic accounts of what occurred to Clement during the persecution of Domitian; we are assured, that he lived to the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100.—Calmet.

CLEMENT, (TITUS FLAVIUS,) known as Clemens Alexandrinus, or Clement of Alexandria, one of the fathers of the church, and distinguished for learning and eloquence, was born about A. D. 217; was converted to Christianity; and succeeded Pantænus in the catechetical school of Alexandria. The time and place of his death are unknown. The best edition of his theological works is that by Potter, in two folio volumes.—Davenport.

CLEMENTINES, (said to be so called after a priest of the name of Clement, their first leader;) a considerable sect of religious persons in France, scattered in small bodies throughout the country, but who are most numerous in the neighborhood of the Pyrenees, distinguished by a partial separation from the church of Rome. They have always refused to acknowledge those priests who took the oaths to the new government, (that of the revolution,) and even disown the pope on that account. They retain the mass, confession, &c., having a few priests of their own sentiments among them; but they express a strong dislike to many of the popish ceremonies, which they account a solemn mockery. They are far less superstitious, and more serious and devout, than the bulk of the Catholics. They are strenuous in their opposition to the general body of Catholics, and will not enter the churches; they particularly dislike the ringing of bells on the death or funeral of any person. They incline to the doctrine of free grace, and seem to adopt on those points the sentiments of St. Augustine. They reject the use of images in worship, and laugh at the pompous religious processions. Many of them use the French language instead of the Latin in their prayers. They are said to be generally moral in their conduct, and strict in their observance of the Lord's day. See the Evangelical Mag. 1819, p. 29.—Williams.

CLEOPAS, according to Eusebius and Epiphanius, was brother of Joseph, both being sons of Jacob. He was the father of Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, of James the Less, of Jude, and of Joseph, or Josos. Cleopas married Mary, sister of the Virgin; so that he was uncle to Jesus Christ. He, his wife, and sons, were disciples of Christ; but Cleopas did not sufficiently understand what Jesus had so often told his disciples, that it was expedient he should die, and return to the Father. Having beheld our Savior expire on the cross, he lost all hope of seeing the kingdom of God established by him on earth; but going to Emmaus with another disciple, they were joined by our Lord, who accompanied them, and on his breaking bread they recognized him, Luke 24: 13, to end.—Calmet.

CLERGY, (from the Greek word kleros, heritage;) in the general sense of the word, as used by us, signifies the body of ecclesiastics of the Christian church, in contradistinction to the laity; but, strictly speaking, and according to Scripture, it means the church. "When Joshua," as one observes, "divided the Holy Land by lot among the Israelites, it pleased God to provide for a thirteenth part of them, called Levites, by assigning them a personal estate equivalent to that provision made by real estate, which was allotted to each of the other twelve parts. In conformity to the style of the transaction, the Levites were called God's lot, inheritance, or clergy. This style, however, is not always used by the Old Testament writers. Sometimes they call all the nation God's lot, Deut. 32: 9. Ps. 78: 71. Ps. 28: 9, &c. The New Testament writers adopt this term, and apply it to the whole Christian church, 1 Pet. 5: 3. Thus it is the church distinguished from the world, and not one part of the church as distinguished from another part." The word clergy, however, among us, always refers to ecclesiastics. When a Catholic priest receives the tonsure, he repeats a part of the sixteenth psalm:—"The Lord's the portion of mine inheritance," &c. According to the doctrine of the Romish church, a clergyman is endowed, in his spiritual character, with supernatural powers, which distinguish him from the layman, such as the power to forgive sins, and to consecrate the bread, so as to convert it into the real body of Christ, &c.

The clergy, after the apostolic age, consisted of bishops, priests, and deacons; but in the fourth century, many inferior orders were appointed, such as sub-deacons, acolythists, readers, &c. The clergy of the church of Rome are divided into regular and secular. The regular consists of those monks or religious who have taken upon them holy orders of the priesthood in their respective monasteries. The secular clergy are those who are not of any religious order, and have the care and direction of parishes. The Protestant clergy are all secular. (For archbishops, bishops, deans, &c. &c., see those articles.)

The English clergy have large privileges allowed them by our municipal laws, and had formerly much greater, which were abridged at the Reformation, on account of the ill use which the popish clergy had endeavored to make of them; for the laws having exempted them from almost every personal duty, they attempted a total exemption from every secular tie. The personal exemptions, indeed, for the most part, continue. A clergyman cannot be compelled to serve on a jury, nor to appear at a court leet, which almost every other person is obliged to do; but if a layman be summoned on a jury, and before the trial, takes orders, he shall notwithstanding appear, and be sworn. Neither can he be chosen to any temporal office, as bailiff, reeve, constable, or the like, in regard of his own continual attendance on the sacred function, though the clergy are now often found filling the office of justice of the peace. During his attendance on divine service, he is privileged from arrest in civil suits. In cases of felony, also, a clerk in orders shall have the benefit of clergy, without being branded in the hand, and may likewise have it more than once; in both which cases he is distinguished from a layman.

Benefit of clergy was a privilege whereby a clergyman claimed to be delivered to his ordinary to purge himself of felony, and which anciently was allowed only to those who were in orders; but, by the statute of 18 Elizabeth, every man to whom the benefit of clergy is granted, though not in orders, is put to read at the bar, after he is found guilty, and convicted of felony, and so burnt in the hand, and set free for the first time, if the ordinary or deputy standing by do say, Legit ut clericus: otherwise he shall suffer death. As the clergy have their privileges, so they have also their disabilities, on account of their spiritual avocations. Clergymen are incapable of sitting in the house of commons; and by the statute of 21 Henry VIII. c. 13, are not in general allowed to take any lands or tenements to farm, upon pain of ten pounds per month, and total avoidance of the lease; nor upon like pain to keep any tap-house or brew-house; nor engage in any trade, nor sell any merchandise, under forfeiture of the treble value; which prohibition is consonant with the canon law.

The number of clergy in England and Wales amount, according to the best calculation, to eighteen thousand. The revenues of the clergy were formerly considerable, but since the Reformation they are comparatively small, at least those of the inferior clergy. See the Bishop of Landaff's Valuation of the Church and University Revenues; or, Cove on the Revenues of the Church, 1797, second edition; Burnet's History of his own Times, conclusion. (See BENEFIT OF CLERGY; CHURCH REVENUES; MINISTER.)—Hend. Buck.

CLERK. 1. A word originally used to denote a learned man, or man of letters; but now is the common appellation by which clergymen distinguish themselves in signing any deed or instrument. 2. Also the person who reads the responses of the congregation in the Episcopal church, or gives out the hymns at a meeting.—Hend. Buck.

CLOTHES. (See HABITS.)

CLOTILDA, queen of France, and niece of Goudebald, king of the Burgundians, was a woman of extraordinary beauty, sense, and virtue. Her fame made an impression on the heart of Clovis, king of France, to whom she was married at Soissons, A. D. 491. Clotilda was a Christian; but Clovis and his people were pagans. On the birth of her first son, she gained the king's consent to his baptism; but the child dying, Clovis murmured loudly. The second son, being taken ill after his baptism, the king became furious, saying it would die like his brother in consequence of being devoted to her God. The child however recovered, and the superstitious monarch began to entertain more favorable ideas of the Christian religion. In 496, being engaged in a bloody battle with the Germans, his troops gave way, when Clovis, lifting his eyes to heaven, exclaimed, "God of my queen Clotilda, if thou grant me the victory, I here vow to receive baptism, and hereafter to worship no other God." He gained the victory, and fulfilled his vow; and his nominal conversion was the means of establishing the Christian religion in France.—Betham.

CLOUD; a collection of vapors suspended in the atmosphere. When the Israelites had left Egypt, God gave them a pillar of cloud to direct their march. Exod. 13: 21, 22. According to Jerome, in his epistle to Fabiola, this cloud attended them from Succoth; or, according to others, from Ramases; or, as the Hebrews say, only from Ethan, till the death of Aaron; or, as the generality of commentators are of opinion, to the passage of Jordan. This pillar was commonly in front of the Israelites; but at Pihahiroth, when the Egyptian army approached behind them, it placed itself between Israel and the Egyptians, so that the Egyptians could not come near the Israelites all night. Exod. 14: 19, 20. In the morning, the cloud moving on over the sea, and following the Israelites who had passed through it, the Egyptians pressing after were drowned. From that time, this cloud attended the Israelites; it was clear and bright during night, in order to afford them light; but in the day it was thick and gloomy, to defend them from the excessive heats of the deserts. "The angel of God which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them." Exod. 14: 19. Here we may observe, that the angel and the cloud made the same motion, as it would seem, in company. The cloud by its motions gave the signal to the Israelites to encamp or to decamp. Where, therefore, it staid, the people staid till it rose again; then they broke up their camp, and followed it till it stopped. It was called a pillar, by reason of its form, which was high and elevated. Some interpreters suppose that there were two clouds, one to enlighten, the other to shade, the camp.

The promise is still with the church, that the Lord will create upon every dwelling-place of mount Zion, (let the reader not overlook the every;) and upon all her assemblies, a cloud and a smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for upon all the glory shall be a defence. Isa. 4: 5. What though this overshadowing care of the Head of the church be not visible now as of old, yet the presence of the Lord of the cloud is equally real, and his guiding and protecting love equally great, from the Succoth of conversion to the Jordan of death.—Watson; Hawker.

CLUSTER. An ancient author tells us, that the Jews were accustomed to call such men as excelled in good qualities, Escheloth; that is, clusters. And hence they had a saying, that after the death of Jose Ben Joozeo, a man of Tzerda, and Jose Ben Jochanan, a man of Jerusalem, the clusters ceased.

Nothing could be more happily chosen to set forth the unrivalled fertility and richness of Canaan, than the cluster of its fruits which the spies brought back from Esheol. Num. 13: 23. It was indeed a lively earnest of the fullness, sweetness, and blessedness of the promised land. But a more glorious object is set forth, (in Canticles 1: 14.) under the image of "a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi." All divine, all human excellencies concentrate in Christ, the Lord and Savior of the church. Full of truth and full of grace, he is indeed a cluster of all that is desirable, both in the life that now is, and in that which is to come.—Hawker.

COA; (1 Kings 10: 28. 2 Chron. 1: 16) probably a city of Egypt, the capital of the province called Cypopolitana.—Calmat.

COALS. Temptations to unchastity are compared to burning coals, which cannot be approached without inflaming and fatally injuring the soul. Prov. 6: 23. The same is true of strife and contention. Prov. 26: 21. So the judgments of God are represented under the terrible image of coals of juniper, (the most intense and enduring heat,) applied to the human body. Ps. 140: 10. 120: 4. 18: 8. On the other hand, the divine promise of forgiveness and grace is represented by a live coal taken from the celestial altar; because, being conveyed to us through the Redeemer's sacrifice, it inflames the soul with love, melts it into godly sorrow, and purges away the dross of sinful corruption. Isa. 6: 6. The love of saints to their Lord and Savior, is as coals of fire, that have a most vehement flame; it makes their hearts burn with desire after him, imparts a resplendent lustre to their character, and resists all the efforts of earth and hell to extinguish it. Cant. 8: 6, 7. So also good deeds and kind offices to enemies are as coals of fire heaped on their wounds; they tend to melt down the obdurate spirit into grief and love, or else to prepare them for the more speedy and just infliction of divine punishment upon their impenitence. Prov. 23: 22. Rom. 12: 20.—Brown.

COAT. (See HABITS.)

COBB, (EBENEZER,) remarkable for longevity, was born in Plymouth, Massachusetts, March 22, 1694. Mr. Cobb died at Kingston, December 8, 1801, aged one hundred and seven years. His days were passed in cultivating the earth. His mode of living was simple. Only twice in his life, and then it was to gratify his brethren on a jury, did he substitute an enervating cup of tea in place of the invigorating bowl of broth, or the nutritive porringer of milk. He never used glasses; but for several years could not see to read. He was of a moderate stature, stooping in attitude, having an expanded chest, and of a fair and florid countenance. He enjoyed life in his old age, and in his last year declared, that he had the same attachment to life as ever. He was a professed Christian. See Columbian Centinel, Dec. 16, 1801; New York Spectator, Dec. 23.—Allen.

COBHAM, (LORD JOHN.) See OLDCASTLE.

COCCETIANS, a denomination which arose in the seventeenth century, so called from John Cocceius, professor of divinity in the university of Leyden. He represented the whole history of the Old Testament as a mirror, which held forth an accurate view of the transactions and events that were to happen in the church under the dispensation of the New Testament, and unto the end of the world. He maintained that by far the greatest part of the ancient prophecies foretold Christ's ministry and mediation, and the rise, progress and revolutions of the church, not only hid under the figure of persons and transactions, but in a literal manner, and by the very sense of the words used in these predictions; and laid it down as a fundamental rule of interpretation, that the words and phrases of Scripture are to be understood in every sense of which they are susceptible, or, in other words, that they signify in effect every thing that they can possibly signify.

Cocceius also taught, that the covenant made between God and the Jewish nation, by the ministry of Moses, was of the same nature as the new covenant, obtained by the mediation of Jesus Christ. In consequence of this general principle, he maintained that the ten commandments were promulgated by Moses, not as a rule of obedience, but as a representation of the covenant of grace—that when the Jews had provoked the Deity by their various transgressions, particularly by the worship of the golden calf, the severe and servile yoke of the ceremonial law was added to the decalogue, as a punishment inflicted on them by the Supreme Being in his righteous displeasure—that this yoke, which was painful in itself, became doubly so on account of its typical signification, since it admonished the Israelites, from day to day, of the imperfection and uncertainty of their state, filled them with anxiety, and was a perpetual proof that they had merited the righteous displeasure of God, and could not expect, before the coming of the Messiah, the entire remission of their iniquities—that indeed good men, even under the Mosaic dispensation, were, immediately after death, made partakers of everlasting glory; but that they were, nevertheless, during the whole course of their lives, far removed from that firm hope and assurance of salvation which rejoices the faithful under the dispensation of the gospel—and that their anxiety flowed naturally from this consideration, that their sins, though they remained unpunished, were not pardoned, because Christ had not as yet offered himself up a sacrifice to the Father, to make an entire atonement for them.—Hend. Twick.

COCK-CROWING. The cock usually crows at two different times of the night; the first time a little after midnight, and a second time about the break of day. (See HOUR.) This last season is usually called cock-crowing; and this was the time intended by our Lord when he said to Peter, "Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice." Matt. 26: 34. Mark and John refer to both seasons, but Matthew only to the last. Mark 13: 40. John 13: 38. Compare the fulfilment of the prediction. Matt. 26: 74. Mark 14: 68—72. Luke 22: 61. John 15: 27.

These texts may be satisfactorily reconciled, by observing, that ancient authors, both Greek and Latin, mention two cock-crowings, the one of which was soon after midnight, the other about three o'clock in the morning; and this latter, being most noticed by men as the signal of their approaching labors, was called by way of eminence, the cock-crowing; and to this alone, Matthew, giving the general sense of our Savior's warning to Peter, refers; but Mark, recording his very words, mentions the two cock-crowings.

The rabbies tell us that cocks were not permitted to be kept in Jerusalem on account of the holiness of the place; and for this reason some modern Jews cavil against this declaration of the evangelists; but the cock is not among the birds prohibited in the law of Moses. If there was any restraint in the use and domestication of the animal, it must have been an arbitrary practice of the Jews, and could not have been binding on foreigners, of whom many resided at Jerusalem as officers or traders. Strangers would not be willing to forego an innocent kind of food in compliance with a conquered people; and the trafficking spirit of the Jews would induce them to supply aliens, if it did not expressly contradict the letter of their law. This is sufficient to account for fowl of this kind being there, even admitting a customary restraint.—Brown; Watson.

COCKATRICE. The translators of the English Bible have variously rendered the Hebrew words tzeppo and tzepponi, by adder and cockatrice; and we are by no means certain of the particular kind of serpent to which the original term is applied. In Isaiah 11: 8, "the tzepponi," says Dr. Harris, "is evidently an advance in malignity beyond the peten which precedes it; and in ch. 14: 29, it must mean a worse kind of serpent than the nachash;" but this still leaves us ignorant of its specific character. Mr. Taylor, who has taken extraordinary pains to identify it, is of opinion that it is the naja, or cobra di capello of the Portuguese, which we find thus described by Goldsmith:—

"Of all others, the cobra di capello, or hooded serpent, inflicts the most deadly and incurable wounds. Of this formidable creature there are five or six different kinds; but they are all equally dangerous, and their bite followed by speedy and certain death. It is from three to eight feet long, with two long fangs hanging out of the upper jaw. It has a broad neck, and a mark of dark brown on the forehead, which, when viewed frontwise, looks like a pair of spectacles, but behind like the head of a cat. The eyes are fierce and full of fire; the head is small, and the nose flat, though covered with very large scales, of a yellowish ash color; the skin is white, and the large tumor on the neck is flat, and covered with oblong smooth scales. The bite of this animal is said to be incurable, the patient dying in about an hour after the wound; the whole frame being dissolved into one putrid mass of corruption. The effects here attributed to the bite of this creature answer very well to what is intimated of the tzephoni in Scripture. Thus, in Isaiah 11: 9: 'They [the tzephoni immediately preceding] shall not hurt nor destroy [corrupt] in all my holy mountain.' And Proverbs 23: 32: 'At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth [spreads, diffuses its poison; so the Seventy and Vulgate,] like a cockatrice.'

We must not omit to notice the very powerful argument adduced in the last cited passage against the sin of intemperate drinking. Like the poison of the deadly cockatrice, it paralyzes the energies both of mind and body, and speedily diffuses corruption throughout the entire frame. "Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine: they that go to seek mixed wine." "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise," ch. 23: 29, 30. 20: 1.

The unyielding cruelty of the Chaldean armies, under Nebuchadnezzar, and the appointed ministers of Jehovah's vengeance on the Jewish nation, whose iniquities had made him their enemy, is expressively alluded to in the following passage: "For, behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which shall not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the Lord." Jer. 8: 17.

In Egypt, and other oriental countries, a serpent was the common symbol of a powerful monarch; it was embroidered on their robes, and blazoned on their diadem, to signify their absolute power and invincible might; and also, that, as the wound inflicted by the basilisk is incurable, so the fatal effects of their displeasure were neither to be avoided nor endured. These, says Paxton, are the allusions involved in the address of the prophet, to the irreconcilable enemies of his nation: "Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because the rod of him that smote thee is broken; for out of the serpent's roots shall come forth a cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent." Isa. 14: 29. Uzziah, the king of Judah, had subdued the Philistines; but, taking advantage of the weak reign of Ahab, they again invaded the kingdom of Judah, and reduced some cities in the southern part of the country under their dominion. On the death of Ahab, Isaiah delivers this prophecy, threatening them with a more severe chastisement from the hand of Hezekiah, the grandson of Josiah, by whose victorious arms they had been reduced to sue for peace, which he accomplished, when "he smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof." 2 Kings 18: 8. Uzziah, therefore, must be meant by the rod that smote them, and by the serpent from whom should spring the fiery flying serpent, that is, Hezekiah, a much more terrible enemy than even Uzziah had been. But the symbol of regal power which the oriental kings preferred to all others, was the basilisk.

All the other species of serpents are said to acknowledge the superiority of the basilisk, by flying from its presence, and hiding themselves in the dust. It is also supposed to live longer than any other serpent; the ancient heathens, therefore, pronounced it to be immortal, and placed it in the number of their deities; and because it had the dangerous power, in general belief, of killing with its pestiferous breath the strongest animals, it seemed to them invested with the power of life and death. It became, therefore, the favorite symbol of kings, and was employed by the prophet to symbolize the great and good Hezekiah, with strict propriety.—Abbott.

CODDINGTON, (WILLIAM,) one of the founders of Rhode Island, was a native of Lincolnshire, England. He came to this country as an assistant, or one of the magistrates of Massachusetts, and arrived at Salem in the Arabella, June 12, 1630. He was several times rechosen to that office; but in 1637, when governor Vane, to whose interest he was attached, was superseded by Mr. Winthrop, he also was left out of the magistracy. He removed to Rhode Island, April 26, 1638, and was the principal instrument in effecting the original settlement of that place. His name stands first on the covenant, signed by eighteen persons at Aquetneck, or Rhode Island, March 7, 1638, forming themselves into a body politic, to be governed by the laws of the Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings.

Mr. Coddington was chosen governor seven years successively, until the charter was obtained; and the island was incorporated with Providence plantations. In 1647, he assisted in forming the body of laws, which has been the basis of the government of Rhode Island ever since. In 1652, he retired from public business; but towards the close of his life he was prevailed on to accept the chief magistracy. He was governor in the years 1674 and 1675. He died, November 1, 1678, aged seventy-seven.

He appears to have been prudent in his administration, and active in promoting the welfare of the little commonwealth, which he had assisted in founding. While he lived in Rhode Island, he embraced the sentiments of the Quakers. He was a warm advocate for liberty of conscience. See Dedication of Callender's Historical Discourse; Winthrop; Hutchinson, i. 18.—Allen.

CÆLICOLE; (worshippers of the heavens;) an obscure sect of African heretics, in the fifth century, who seem to have mixed up some parts of Judaism and paganism with Christianity, and to have used both circumcision and baptism. It is not, however, improbable that they have been slandered, as the pagans called the Jews themselves by this name. See Turner's History, p. 180; Bell's Wanderings, p. 192.—Williams.

CÆLO SYRIA; hollow or depressed Syria; Syria in the vale. 1 Mac. 13: 10. This name imports the hollow land, or region, situated between two long ridges of mountains; and those mountains have been always understood to be Libanus and Anti-libanus. As these ridges run parallel for many leagues, they contain between them a long, extensive, and extremely fruitful valley.—Watson.

COGAN, (THOMAS,) a physician, was born, in 1736, at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, and was educated under Dr. Aikin. In conjunction with Dr. Hawes he founded the Hamme Society. A considerable part of his life was spent in Holland. He died in 1818. He translated the works of Camper, and published some original works; among which are, The Rhine, or A Journey from Utrecht to Frankfort; a Philosophical Treatise on the Passions; Ethical Questions; and Theological Disquisitions.—Davenport.

COHORT; a military term used by the Romans, to denote a company generally composed of six hundred foot soldiers: a legion consisted of ten cohorts, every cohort being composed of three maniples, and every manipule of two hundred; a legion, consequently, contained in all six thousand men. Others allow but five hundred men to a cohort, which would make five thousand in a legion. It is probable, that cohorts among the Romans, as companies among the moderns, often varied as to their number.—Calvert.

COKE, (THOMAS, LL. D.,) was born at Brecon, in South Wales, on the 9th of September, 1747. His father, Mr. Bartholomew Coke, was an eminent surgeon, residing in that place; a man of great respectability, and several times filled the office of chief magistrate of the town. Thomas was their only child; and his affectionate parents watched over his infant days with unusual solicitude. In early life he was, however, deprived, by death, of his father, and to the care of his widowed mother he was consigned. He received the first elements of knowledge in the college school at Brecon, and was attentive and studious. At the age of sixteen, he was removed from Brecon to Oxford; and, in the Lent term of his seventeenth year, was entered a gentleman commoner at Jesus college, in that university. At college he became acquainted with the vicious and profane; and was even a captive to those snares of infidelity which he had at first surveyed with detestation and horror. His principles being thus tainted, his conduct became infected; but he was preserved, to a great degree, from committing those abominable crimes which he observed performed by others. Mr. Coke was however unhappy; and amidst all the noise and clamor, and mirth and folly of his associates, he was frequently pensive and discontented. At this time he paid a visit to a clergyman in Wales; and, by the preaching of the gospel at that place, by perusing the discourses and disputations of bishop Sherlock, and by reading the celebrated Treatise on Regeneration, by Dr. Witherspoon, his mind became gradually enlightened, though he did not at that time become a Christian.

On June 17th, 1775, he took his degree of doctor of civil laws, and obtained a curacy at South Petherton, in Somersetshire, where his congregation increased; he built a gallery to the church, at his own expense. He evinced great anxiety for the improvement of his charge, and was speedily accused of being a Methodist. To the doctrines of Mr. Wesley he became attached; zealously preached them at South Petherton; received a reprimand for his zeal from the bishop of Bath and Wells; and was eventually dismissed by the rector of the parish, for his pious concern to promote the welfare of his parishioners. Banned from the church of South Petherton, he preached in the open air, and attracted considerable attention. In the month of July, 1777, he met with Mr. Wesley, conversed with him, received an explanation of his plans and system, and determined to become a preacher in that society. As a preacher, in London he was very popular, and his fame rapidly spread over an extensive district. In 1780, Mr. Wesley appointed him to superintend the London circuit; and he visited the various Wesleyan societies in Ireland.

In 1784, Mr. Wesley executed the celebrated deed of declamation as to all his chapels, and appointed Dr. Coke as one of the trustees. In 1782, Dr. Coke held the first Irish conference, and his conduct on this occasion so delighted the Irish, that they requested he would always preside. Mr. Wesley, having visited America, instituted many Christian societies; and, having been the instrument of converting many persons, Dr. Coke privately resolved there to become a preacher; and, on the 2d of September, 1781, he was set apart, by Mr. Wesley, as a presbyter of the church of England, and a missionary to North America. On the 15th of September, 1784, the vessel weighed anchor, and Dr. Coke, with other missionaries, commenced their voyage, with confidence in God, and desires to promote his glory. At New York, in America, he safely arrived; immediately there commenced preaching; on the 6th of November reached Philadelphia, and on the ensuing day preached in one of the churches. Immediately, in the spirit of a Christian missionary, he commenced his labors, and preached in the open air. By the conference assembled at Baltimore, Mr. Wesley's plans and system were approved, and Dr. Coke there preached his celebrated sermon "On the Godhead of Christ." Deacons, elders, and a superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal church in America were appointed; and harmony, peace, and piety presided over the proceedings.

When the war commenced between England and America, the Methodists were opposed by the government of America, on the ground of Mr. Wesley's decided attachment to the measures of England; but Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury, in behalf of the American Methodists, presented to general Washington an address, declaratory of their loyalty and obedience to their rulers, and of congratulation on his elevation. The propriety of that address has been questioned; but it preserved the Methodists in America from persecution, and religion from reproach. To it, general Washington returned an affectionate and pious reply.

To the cause of the gospel in the United States he now paid increased attention; collected a considerable sum towards the erection of a college; directed its commencement, and lived to witness its rising usefulness and increasing success; but, finally, alas! to view its destruction by fire. The conference having ended in 1784, Dr. Coke proceeded through the United States, on an extensive tour to all the churches. Dr. Coke next engaged in procuring an address to the assembly of Virginia, for the emancipation of the negroes. In pursuing his journey through the states, he was frequently exposed to dangers. Sometimes he was benighted in dreary forests; at other times he missed his way, and was compelled to wander through trackless deserts, exposed to hurricanes and dangers, as appalling as they were numerous.

On June 3d, 1785, Dr. Coke sailed for England. His reception from Mr. Wesley was not kind; the former was a missionary, the latter the founder of a sect. The latter expected too much submission; the former was one of the last men in the world to concede to what he regarded a spirit of harsh legislation. In 1786, he was employed in visiting the Norman isles, and was made instrumental of establishing a Methodist society in Guernsey. On returning from the Norman isles, Dr. Coke prepared for another voyage across the Atlantic. He determined on visiting Nova Scotia, and, with three missionaries, embarked at Gravesend, on the 24th of September, 1786. The violence of the weather, however, retarded their voyage; and, after having been greatly inconvenienced by storms and hurricanes, gales and tempests, their weather-beaten bark cast anchor in the harbor of Antigua, in the West Indies, on December 25th, 1786. Dr. Coke instantly commenced his labors as a missionary, and repeatedly preached with a success proportioned to his zeal. He then visited St. Vincent's and St. Christopher's, at Kingstown; in the former he stationed Mr. Clarke, one of the missionaries; and, in all his tour, received the general applause and gratitude of the negroes, and of many intelligent inhabitants. On February 10th, 1787, he sailed from St. Eustatius to Charleston, in America, where he arrived, after a pleasant voyage of eighteen days. There he labored as a minister of the gospel for about a month. In April, he attended at the conference at Baltimore, and was rejoiced by the intelligence, that more than six thousand six hundred persons had been added to the societies through the United States.

Having now surveyed several islands in the West Indies, and observed the general state of religion on the continent of America, he prepared to return to Mr. Wesley; preached his farewell sermon at Philadelphia; and arrived in Dublin bay on the 25th of June, 1787. He immediately repaired to the Irish conference, represented the condition of the heathen, and excited a general and powerful desire to send missionaries forthwith to the West Indies. From Ireland he travelled, with Mr. Wesley, to the English conference at Manchester. At the conclusion of the conference he left Manchester, and again visited the Norman islands. In those isles he preached with great success, to large and attentive congregations. On leaving the Norman islands, he repaired to England, visited many of the principal towns, and employed his time in preaching and collecting funds to provide for the missionaries to the West Indies. Towards the close of the year 1788, he sailed, with three missionaries, to Barbadoes, where he was kindly received. He travelled to the country of the Caribbs—explored the recesses of the forest, and the seclusions of savage life—visited the plantations—settled a missionary at St. Vincent's—sailed for Dominica—revisited Antigua—repaired to St. Eustatius—preached daily—superintended the temporal and spiritual affairs of the mission—and afforded directions, encouragement, or reproof, as circumstances required. On departing from this island, Dr. Coke repaired to Nevis, Saba, Tortola, Santa Cruz, and Jamaica, where he landed on the 19th of January, 1789.

This indefatigable man, having thus passed through the islands, established missionaries in several, and prepared the way for others in nearly all, once more sailed for the continent of America, and arrived at Charleston on the 24th of February. At Georgia he at length arrived, in time for the conference, and then returned to Charleston, where another was held for South Carolina. From thence he proceeded to North Carolina, and then to Virginia. He also attended two conferences in the state of Maryland, one at Philadelphia, and another at New York. Animated by past success, he determined on introducing Christianity yet more among the native Indians; and having made the necessary arrangements, he sailed for England on the 5th of June, and arrived at Liverpool on the 11th of July, 1789. On his arrival in England, he repaired to the conference, to report to Mr. Wesley, and the various preachers, an account of his past proceedings, and to offer personally to plead in behalf of the negroes in the West Indies, which offer was cheerfully accepted, and nearly sixteen months were devoted by him to this employment; during which time he travelled and preached through a considerable part of the kingdom, and was more than repaid for his exertions, by the kindness with which he received.

Considering this part of his work completed, he determined once more on visiting the West Indies; and, accordingly, sailed from Falmouth on the 16th of October, 1790, in company with two missionaries. On the 22d of November, he reached Barbadoes, after a delightful passage of five weeks. After preaching for some time in Bridgetown, he visited St. Vincent's, Grenada, and Antigua, where he again preached with equal success, and found, during his absence, much progress had been made in the preaching of the gospel. He next arrived at the island of St. Eustatius, but was there forbidden to preach, by the governor. He consequently determined to leave the island, and repair to Holland, to lay before the Dutch government the situation of the inhabitants of the latter place, and of Saba. He next sailed from Jamaica for Charleston, in South Carolina, where he arrived on 27th of January, 1791. From this place, after renewing his former exertions for some time, he sailed for England. On the 1st of September, 1792, he again sailed from Gravesend for America, and arrived at St. Eustatius on the 31st of December, where he was still refused the privilege of preaching. The tempest of persecution had not ceased; and he left, in the island of St. Vincent's, the only missionary, a Mr. Lamb, who was then confined in prison for preaching to the negroes. From thence he repaired to Antigua, Barbadoes, and Jamaica; and, after exerting himself with his usual benevolence, returned to England, where he arrived on the 6th of March, 1793, with a heart glowing with gratitude to God for his mercies.

Dr. Coke, having constantly kept in view the melancholy situation of the inhabitants of St. Vincent's, on his arrival in England, drew out a plain statement of the case, to lay before the king in council; and to give more effect to the design, he made a personal application to some members of the executive government. These applications aroused the attention of the council, who forwarded letters to the governors of the West India islands, with inquiries as to the general conduct of the missionaries. Dr. Coke waited the result with laudable impatience; and, on the 31st of August, 1793, he had the heart-felt gratification of hearing that the edict of St. Vincent's was dissolved.

Having thus obtained the freedom of one island, this eminent philanthropist could not be content till St. Eustatius received the same blessing; and he accordingly endeavored to seek for protection against the governor. He directly set sail for Holland; presented his memorial, and solicited the official interference of the Dutch government. Actuated by a principle of conscious rectitude, he waited personally on the stadtholder, who admitted him, and gave him a favorable reception; but no decided answer was obtained till some months afterwards, when a gentleman in the island applied to the governor, and inclined him to depart from the spirit of intolerance manifested by his predecessors; and from that time preaching was allowed, and the ardent spirit of Dr. Coke was made to rejoice at the happy change.

On the 1st of January, 1814, he sailed for India, but died on his passage by a sudden stroke of apoplexy. The ocean received his mortal remains; but his memory is embalmed in the hearts of thousands, and his happy spirit rests with his faithful Lord till the sea shall give up her dead. COLD. Spiritual coldness consists in an utter, or very great unconcern about Jesus Christ and divine things. Matt. 24: 12. Professors are neither cold nor hot when they retain the profession of truth in some degree, but have no active liveliness, zeal, or concern for the power of it. Christ's wishing men were either cold or hot imports, that none are more detested of him, or dishonoring to him, than hypocritical and careless professors of the Christian faith. Rev. 3: 15, 16.—Brown.

COLET, (DR. JOHN.) a learned English divine, was born in London, in 1466, and was the eldest son of Sir Henry Colet, knight, twice lord mayor, who had, besides him, twenty-one children. In 1483, he was sent to Magdalen college, Oxford, where he spent seven years in the study of logic and philosophy, and took the degrees in arts. Having laid a good foundation of learning at home, he travelled abroad for further improvement, visiting France and Italy, in which countries he seems to have passed the time from 1483 to 1497. At Paris he became acquainted with several learned men, and among others, with the celebrated Budanus, and afterwards with Erasmus. On his return, in 1497, he was ordained deacon in December, and priest in July, 1498. Before he entered into orders, he was beset with great temptations, from his natural disposition, to lay aside study, and give himself up to gayety and dissipation, for he was constitutionally inclined that way; but he mortified his propensities and passions; and, after continuing a few months with his parents and friends in London, he retired to Oxford.

Here he commenced his career with delivering public lectures on the epistles of the apostle Paul, which he did without stipend or reward; and the novelty of the undertaking drew a vast crowd of hearers, who admired him greatly. And here began his memorable friendship with Erasmus, who came to Oxford in 1497, a friendship which remained unshaken and inviolable to the day of their deaths. He continued these lectures during the period of three years, and in 1501 was admitted to proceed to divinity, or to the reading of the sentences, as termed in the church of Rome. In 1504, he commenced doctor in divinity, and in May, 1505, was instituted a prebend in St. Paul's, London. He was at the same time made dean of that church, quite unexpectedly; and being raised to that high station, he began to reform the decayed discipline of his cathedral. He brought in a new practice of preaching himself on Sundays and high festivals, and called to his assistance other learned men, whom he appointed to read divinity lectures. These lectures raised in the nation a spirit of inquiry after the Holy Scriptures, which had then long been laid aside for the school divinity, and so might be said to prepare a way for the reformation which soon after ensued. We cannot but think that Colet was in some measure instrumental towards it, though he did not live to see it effected; for he expressed a great contempt for religious houses, exposed the abuses that prevailed in them, and the mischiefs attending the imposing celibacy on the clergy. This way of thinking, together with his free and public manner of communicating his thoughts, which were then regarded as impious and heretical, rendered him very obnoxious to the clergy, and exposed him to a persecution from the bishop of London. Latimer tells us in his sermons, not only was Colet brought into trouble, but he would certainly have gone to the stake, had not God turned the king's heart.

This state of things made him weary of the world, and he began to think of disposing of his effects, and retiring into privacy. In pursuance of his design, his first object was to found St. Paul's school, for the gratuitous education of one hundred and fifty-three children, with suitable masters, &c., for all of which provision was made, by funds intrusted to the Mercers' company, under whose auspices it has continued to flourish, and by whom the present handsome edifice, at the east end of St. Paul's cathedral, was rebuilt from the foundation, on the original site, and opened in the spring of 1825. Dean Colet survived this noble act of his munificence only seven years. He died, September 16, 1519, in his fifty-third year. See Biog. Brit. vol. i.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

COLLECT; a short prayer. In the liturgy of the church of England, and the mass of the Romanists, it denotes a prayer accommodated to any particular day, occasion, or the like. In general, all the prayers in each office are called collects, either because the priest speaks in the name of the whole assembly, whose sentiments and desires he sums up by the word "Oremus." "Let us pray," or because those prayers are offered when the people are assembled together. The popes Gelasius and Gregory are said to have been the first who established collects. Dr. Despeuce, of Paris, wrote a treatise on collects, their origin, antiquity, &c.—Hend. Coll.

COLLEGIANS, or COLLEGIANTS; a sect formed among the Arminians and Baptists in Holland, about the beginning of the seventeenth century; so called because of their colleges or meetings twice every week, where every one, females excepted, has the same liberty of expounding the Scripture, praying, &c. They are said to be all either Arians or Socinians: they never communicate in the college, but meet twice a year, from all parts of Holland, at Rhinsbergh, (whence they are also called Rhinsberghers), a village two miles from Leyden, where they communicate together; admitting every one that presents himself, professing his faith in the divinity of the Holy Scriptures, and resolution to live suitably to their precepts and doctrines, without regard to his sect or opinion. They have no particular ministers, but each officiates as he is disposed. They baptize by immersion.—Hend. Buck.

COLLIER, (ЖЕРЕМЪ,) an eminent non-juring divine, was born, in 1630, at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeshire. He took his degree at Caius college, Cambridge, in 1676, and obtained a living, which he resigned for the lectureship of Gray's Inn. At the revolution, he not only refused the oaths, but was active in behalf of the dethroned monarch. At last, he turned his talents to better ends, and made war on the licentiousness of the theatre. His first work on this subject was, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the Stage. The wits in vain opposed him, for virtue was on his side; and, after a ten years' struggle, he accomplished his object. The rest of his life was spent in various literary labors, among which were essays; a translation of Moreri; an Ecclesiastical History of England; and Discourses on Practical Subjects. He died in 1726. Collier was a man of talents; and, however we may be inclined to censure his political principles, it would be unjust to deny him the praise of having been an honest and disinterested man.—Davenport.

COLLINS, (ANTHONY,) a controversial deist, of no mean talents, was born at Heston, near Hounslow, in 1676; was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and, being a man of property, spent his life in literary pursuits, and in performing the duties of a magistrate. He died in 1729. His religious principles brought him into violent collision with Bentley, Chandler, and many others. Among his works may be mentioned, Priestcraft in Perfection; A Discourse on Free-thinking; A Philosophical Inquiry concerning Human Liberty; and A Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion.—Davenport.

COLLUTHIANS; followers of Colluthus, a priest of Alexandria, in the fourth century, who is said to have taught that God was not the author of the evils and afflictions of this life; also that a presbyter might ordain. If we can forgive the latter error, which it seems he put in practice, we may easily account for the former, which probably originated from the strong terms he used in opposing Necessarian errors; teaching that men's sins originated from themselves, and not from God; and that these were the cause of all our sufferings. He was condemned, however, at a council, held at Alexandria, in A. D. 335; and the sect vanished soon after. See Turner's History, p. 145; Broughton's Dictionary.—Williams.

COLLYRIDIANs, were so called from certain cakes or loaves (collyrides) which, once a year, they offered to the virgin Mary, with some superstitious rites, and then divided them among themselves. These superstitious people had their rise in the fourth century; first in Thrace, and afterwards they spread into Africa, chiefly among female devotees, who sought the protection of the Virgin. See Broughton's Dictionary; Turner's History, p. 160; Bell's Wanderings, p. 191.—Williams.

COLMAN, (BENJAMIN, D. D.,) first minister of the church in Brattle street, Boston, was born in that town, October 19, 1673. He was distinguished by early piety and zeal in literary pursuits, and in 1692 was graduated at Harvard college. Beginning to preach soon afterwards, his benevolent labors were enjoyed for half a year by the town of Medford. In July, 1695, he embarked for London.

A new society having been formed in Brattle street, Boston, the principal gentlemen, who composed it, sent him an invitation to return to his native country, and to be their minister. The peculiar constitution of this church, differing from that of the other churches in New England, rendered the founders desirous that he should be ordained in London. They approved of the confession of faith, composed by the Westminster assembly; but they were averse to the public relation of experiences, then practised previously to admission into the churches, and they wished the Scriptures to be read on the Sabbath, and the Lord's prayer to be used. It may excite surprise at the present day, that the practice of reading the Scripture and repeating the Lord's prayer, as a part of the services of the Sabbath, should have excited opposition; but many were offended, though it was not long before a number of other churches followed in the steps of Brattle street. The ground of opposition to this new church was the strong features of episcopacy, which it was imagined, were to be discerned in it. These innovations, the founders believed, would excite alarm, and to avoid difficulty, Mr. Colman was ordained by some dissenting ministers in London, August 4, 1699. He arrived at Boston, November 1, and December 24th, the new house of worship was opened, and Mr. Colman preached in it for the first time.

He was an eminently useful and good man, and was universally respected for his learning and talents. He was distinguished as a preacher. Tall and erect in stature, of a benign aspect, presenting in his whole appearance something amiable and venerable, and having a peculiar expression in his eye, he was enabled to interest his hearers. His voice was harmonious, and his action inimitable. He was ranked among the first ministers of New England. Jesus Christ was the great subject of his preaching. He dwelt upon the Redeemer in his person, natures, offices, and benefits; in his eternal Godhead; in the covenants of redemption and of grace; and upon the duties of natural religion as performed only by strength derived from the Savior, and as acceptable only for his sake. But his labors were not confined to what particularly related to his profession. He was employed, in his younger as well as in his latter years, on weighty affairs by the general court. No minister has since possessed so great influence. His attention to civil concerns drew upon him censure, and at times insult; but he thought himself justified in embracing every opportunity for doing good. He knew the interest of his country, and was able to promote it; and he could not admit, that the circumstance of his being a minister ought to prevent his exertions. Still there were few men more zealous and unwearyed in the labors of his sacred office. His character was singularly excellent. Having imbibed the true spirit of the gospel, he was catholic, moderate, benevolent, ever anxious to promote the gospel of salvation. He was willing to sacrifice every thing, but truth, to peace. After a life conspicuous for sanctity and usefulness, he met the king of terrors without fear, August 29, 1747, at the age of seventy-three. He published a great number of sermons. His life was written by Mr. Turell, who married his daughter, and published in 8vo, in 1749.—Allen.

COLONY. This word does not always imply that any considerable body of citizens from Rome had left their native city, and had founded a new town where there had been none, as the colonies in America were founded. No doubt, a settlement of Romans might give rise to Roman colonies; and many bodies of their troops, after they were dismissed from military service, received allotments in distant towns. But anciently many cities were favored with the character of colonies, by which they became entitled to the privileges of Roman citizens, and were considered as being in a manner Roman, in reward for services which they had rendered to the government of Rome, or to the emperors. (See ΠΟΛΙΤΕΙ.)—Calmet.

COLOSSE; a city of Phrygia Minor, which stood on the river Lycus, at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities, says Eusebius, were destroyed by an earthquake, in the tenth of Nero, or about two years after the date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians. Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse were at no great distance from each other; which accounts for the apostle Paul, when writing to his Christian brethren in the latter of these places, mentioning them all in connexion with each other. Col. 4: 13. Of these cities, however, Laodicea was the greatest, for it was the metropolis of Phrygia, though Colosse is said to have been a great and wealthy place. The inhabitants of Phrygia, says Dr. Macknight, were famous for the worship of Bacchus, and of Cybele, the mother of the gods; whence the latter was called Phrygia mater, by way of eminence. In her worship, as well as in that of Bacchus, both sexes practised every species of debauchery in speech and action, with a frantic rage which they pretended was occasioned by the inspiration of the deities whom they worshipped. These were the orgies, from orge, rage, of Bacchus and Cybele, so famed in antiquity, the lascivious rites of which being perfectly adapted to the corruptions of the human heart, were performed by both sexes without shame or remorse. Hence, as the Son of God came into the world to destroy the works of the devil, it appeared, in the eye of his apostle, a matter of great importance to carry the light of the gospel into countries where these abominable impurities were not only practised, but even dignified with the honorable appellation of religious worship; especially as nothing but the heaven-descended light of the gospel could dispel such a pernicious infatuation. That this salutary purpose might be effectually accomplished, Paul, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, went at different times into Phrygia, and preached the gospel in many cities of that country with great success; but it is thought by many persons, that the Epistle to the Colossians contains internal marks of his never having been at Colosse when he wrote it. This opinion rests principally upon the following passage: "For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh," (Col. 2: 1); but these words, if they prove any thing upon this question, prove that St. Paul had never been either at Laodicea or Colosse; but surely it is very improbable that he should have travelled twice into Phrygia for the purpose of preaching the gospel, and not have gone either to Laodicea or Colosse, which were the two principal cities of that country; especially as in the second journey into those parts it is said, that he "went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia, strengthening all the disciples;" and moreover, we know that it was the apostle's practice to preach at the most considerable places of every district into which he went. Dr. Lardner, after arguing this point, says, "From all these considerations, it appears to me very probable that the church at Colosse had been planted by the apostle Paul, and that the Christians there were his friends, disciples, and converts."

The epistle greatly resembles that to the Ephesians, both in sentiment and expression. After saluting the Colossian Christians in his own name, and that of Timothy, St. Paul assures them, that since he had heard of their faith in Christ Jesus, and of their love to all Christians, he had not ceased to return thanks to God for them, and to pray that they might increase in spiritual knowledge, and abound in every good work; he describes the dignity of Christ, and declares the universality of the gospel dispensation, which was a mystery formerly hidden, but now made manifest; and he mentions his own appointment, through the grace of God, to be the apostle of the gentiles; he expresses a tender concern for the Colossians and other Christians of Phrygia, and cautions them against being seduced from the simplicity of the gospel, by the subtlety of pagan philosophers, or the superstition of judaizing Christians; he directs them to set their affections on things above, and forbids every species of licentiousness; he exhorts to a variety of Christian virtues, to meekness, veracity, humility, charity, and devotion; he enforces the duties of wives, husbands, children, fathers, servants, and masters; he incites the duty of prayer, and of prudent behavior towards unbelievers; and after adding the salutations of several persons then at Rome, and desiring that this epistle might be read in the church of their neighbors the Laodiceans, he concludes with a salutation from himself, written, as usual, with his own hand. (See ADURER.)—Watson.

COLUMBUS, (CHRISTOPHER) the discoverer of the new world, whose real name was Colombo, was born in the Genoese territory in 1441, but whether at Genoa, Savona, Nervi, or Cogoroo, was long a matter in dispute. That it was at Genoa, is no longer a matter of doubt. He studied a while at Pavia, but quitted the university at an early period to follow a maritime life. Between thirty and forty years were spent by him in voyages to various parts of the world, during which geometry, astronomy, and cosmography occupied much of his attention. At length, he settled at Lisbon, where he married the orphan daughter of Palestrello, an Italian navigator. His geographical investigations, supported by the evidence of pieces of carved wood, trunks of trees and canes, drifted across the Atlantic, induced him to believe that, by stretching across the ocean in a westerly direction, the shores of Eastern Asia might be reached, and he resolved to obtain from some sovereign the means of making the attempt. Years of solicitation were spent in vain; his proposals were not listened to at Genoa, Lisbon, or London. At length, they were tardily accepted by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. On the 2d of August, 1492, Columbus with three small vessels sailed on his daring adventure from the port of Palos. He stopped at the Canaries, whence he departed on the 6th of September, and continued his onward course for thirty-five days, seeing nothing around him but the billows and the sky. Already daunted by the terrors of unknown seas, the variation of the compass, which was now first observed, overpowered the courage of the sailors, and they were more than once on the point of breaking into open mutiny, and steering back to Spain. The long-sought land at last appeared, on the night of the 11th of October, 1492. It was Guanahani, one of the Bahamas, to which he gave the name of San Salvador. After having built a fort, and left in it thirty-eight men, he returned to Europe, and anchored at Palos on the 15th of March, 1493. The people received him with enthusiasm, the court heaped honors upon him. Columbus made three more voyages to the western world; one in the autumn of 1493, another in 1498, and the last in 1501, and considerably enlarged the sphere of his discoveries. His latter years, however, were embittered by the worst arts of envy, and the jealousy of his sovereign. He died at Valladolid, 1506, at the age of seventy, having received little else than injuries and insults for the invaluable services rendered by him to his country and mankind.

Columbus was a Christian, and, though a Catholic, appears to have been habitually animated by his high moral and religious sentiments. His faith in God never forsook him; although in one or two instances he resorted to unjustifiable means of securing aid from the Indians. These cases, however were extreme. His last words were, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit."—Davenport; Allen; Life, by Irving.

COME, COMING. God's coming does not signify literally any change of place; for do not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord? but it signifies some new manifestation of his presence; either by a resplendent and awful symbol as to Israel of old, or by the operations of his power in mercy or judgment, in which sense he may be said to visit men from age to age. Ps. 1: 3. and 101: 2. John 14: 23. Men come to God when they worship and serve him; apply to him by prayer; enjoy his presence; and receive out of his fulness. Heb. 7: 25. 11: 6. John 14: 6. To come to Christ is to apply to him for salvation as lost sinners; renouncing all dependence on our own righteousness, wisdom, and strength; and seeking by faith and prayer every needed, provided, and promised blessing in Him. John 5: 40. 6: 37. 1 Pet. 2: 4. It may be remarked that this very application, this movement of the heart in approaching the unseen Savior, involves a belief in him as an omnipresent, and of course, an infinite Friend.—Brown.

COMING OF CHRIST. This is either literal or metaphorical. Literally, it is used in reference to his first appearance in the flesh, (1 John 5: 20. 2 John 7;) or to his future appearance at the last day to fulfil his promises, to raise the dead, and judge the world in righteousness. Acts 1: 11. 3: 21. Heb. 9: 28. 1 Thess. 4: 15—18. 1 Cor. 15: 12—59. Acts 10: 42. 24: 15. 2 Tim. 4: 1. Matt. 16: 27. 25: 35—41.

Metaphorically, Christ is said to come when his gospel is introduced or preached in any place by his ministers, (John 15: 22. Ephes. 2: 17;) when his church or kingdom is visibly and powerfully established in the world, (Matt. 16: 28;) when he bestows upon believers the influence of his Spirit, and the peculiar tokens of his love, (John 14: 18, 23, 28. 16: 16, 17;) when he executes his judgments on wicked communities who reject or corrupt his gospel,

(2 Thess. 2: 8;) and when his providence calls us away from the world by death, as preparatory to the judgment of the last day. Matt. 24: 42. 25: 13. John 14: 3.

The basis of this metaphorical usage, in regard to the coming of Christ, is the same as in relation to the coming of God, viz. that as he governs the world, every specific act of his providence and authority indicates his presence in a more striking manner to human conception; on the principle that no agent can act where he is not.

COMFORTER, (Parakletos), one of the titles by which the Holy Spirit is designated in the New Testament. John 14: 16, 26. 15: 26. The name has, no doubt, a reference to his peculiar office in the economy of redemption; namely, that of imparting consolation to the hearts of Christ's disciples, which he effects by "taking of the things that are Christ's," and explaining them; or, in other words, by illuminating their minds as to the meaning of the Scriptures, assuring them of the Savior's love, bringing to their recollection his consolatory sayings, and filling their souls with peace and joy in believing them. The word has also been rendered advocate, helper, monitor, teacher, &c. The first well describes the office of the Spirit, as striving and pleading with the unconverted world, and especially as convincing of sin; (John 16: 8—11.) but the others are not so well supported by the connection of our Lord's discourse, which favors the translation, Comforter; because, whatever gracious offices the Holy Spirit was to perform for the disciples, the great end of all was to remove that sorrow which the approach of the departure of Christ had produced, and to render their joy full and complete. See Heber's Bampton Lectures; Hinton on the Spirit.—Watson.

COMMAND. God commands the blessing of life, or the strength of his people, when by his will he furnishes it. Ps. 133: 3. and 68: 28. Saints command God concerning his sons and daughters, and the works of his hands, when in Christ's name they earnestly plead his promise, and argue from his faithfulness, power, equity, and love, pledged therein. Isa. 45: 11.

Jesus Christ is the commander given to the people: he enlists men for his spiritual soldiers; he convenes, orders, encourages, and goes before them, in their gracious warfare. Isa. 55: 4.—Brown.

COMMEND. God commends his love; he makes it appear glorious and unbounded, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Rom. 5: 8. Our unrighteousness commends the righteousness of God; it gives occasion for him clearly to manifest his justice in punishing us, or in forgiving us through Christ's blood: and the Jews' rejection of Christ demonstrates the faithfulness of God in the ancient predictions. Rom. 3: 5.—Brown.

COMMENDAM; the trust or administration of the revenues of a vacant benefice, till it is provided with a regular incumbent. The practice, resorted to chiefly for the purpose of making up the smaller incomes of some of the bishops, has given occasion to great abuses; the bishops procuring several benefices, all of which they have held under this pretext, without directly violating the canon law. When a parson is made bishop, his parsonage becomes vacant; but if the king give him power, he may still hold it in commendam.—Hend. Buck.

COMMENTARY*; an exposition; book of annotations or remarks. There are some people so wise in their own conceit, and think human helps of so little worth, that they despise commentaries on the Scriptures altogether; but every student or preacher, whose business is to explain the sacred oracles, to make known the mind of God to others, to settle cases of conscience, to oppose the sophistry of sceptics, and to confound the arguments of infidels, would do well to avail himself of the most judicious, clear, copious, critical, and sound commentaries on the Bible. Nor can I suppose that commentaries can be useless to the common people; for though a spirit of serious inquiry, with a little good sense, will go a great way in understanding the Bible, yet as the language is often figurative, as allusions are made to ancient customs, and some parts require more investigation than many common Christians have time for, a plain exposition certainly must be useful. Expositions of the Bible, however, may be made a bad use of. He who takes the ipse dixit of a commentator, without ever examining whether the meaning given comport with the text; he who gives himself no trouble to investigate the Scripture for himself, but takes occasion to be indolent because others have labored for him, surely does wrong. Nor can it be said that those preachers use them properly, who, in making their sermons, form their plans from the commentator before they have thought upon the text. The best way is to follow our own talents; first, by prayer, study, and attention, to form our scheme, and then to examine the opinions of others concerning it. We will here present the reader with a view of some of those commentaries which are the most generally approved. And, 1. in my opinion, Henry takes the lead for common utility. The sprightly notes, the just inferences, the original thoughts, and the warm applications to the conscience, make this work justly admired. It is true that there are some expressions which do not agree with the evangelic system; but, as the late Mr. Ryland observes, "It is impossible for a person of piety and taste to read him without wishing to be shut out from all the world, to read him through without one moment's interruption." Mr. Henry did not live to complete this work. He went as far as the end of Acts. Romans was done by Dr. Evans; the 1 Corinthians, Samuel Brown; 2 Corinthians, Dr. Mayo; Galatians, Mr. Bayes; Ephesians, Mr. Boswell; Philippians, Mr. Harris; Colossians, Mr. Harris; 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Mr. Mayo; 1 and 2 Timothy, Mr. Atkinson; Titus, Jeremiah Smith; Philemon, Mr. Mottershead; Hebrews, Mr. Tong; James, Mr. Wright; 1 Peter, Mr. Hill; 2 Peter, Mr. Morril; 1, 2, and 3 John, Mr. Reynolds; Jude, Mr. Billingsley; and the Revelation, by Mr. Tong.

2. "Poole Synopsis Criticorum," five folio volumes. This is a valuable work, and ought to be in the possession of every student; it is much esteemed abroad, three editions of it having been published on the continent.

3. Rosenmueller's Scholia on the Old and New Testament contain a vast fund of biblical illustration, and should be in the library of every theological student. It is only to be regretted that the "Scholia" of the younger Rosenmueller, on the Old Testament, should be strongly tinged with neology.

3. Poole's Annotations, a rich and useful work. These were printed at London, in 1685, in 2 vols. fol. Poole did not complete this work himself. Mr. Jackson, of Moulsey, is the author of the annotations on the fifty-ninth and sixtieth chapters of Isaiah. Dr. Collings drew up the notes on the rest of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations, as also those on the four Evangelists, the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and that to the Galatians. Those to Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and the Revelation, Ezekiel, and the minor Prophets, were done by Mr. Hurst. Daniel, by Mr. Cooper; the Acts, by Mr. Vinke; the Epistle to the Romans, by Mr. Mayo; the Ephesians, Mr. Veale; the Philippians and Colossians, Mr. Adams; the Hebrews, Mr. Obadiah Hughes; the Epistle of St. James, the two of St. Peter, and that of Jude, by Mr. Veale; the three Epistles of St. John, by Mr. Howe.

5. Dr. Gill's, in 9 vols. 4to. is an immense work; and though it contains a great deal of repetition and extraneous matter, there is certainly a vast fund of information in it, especially on Hebraical and rabbinical subjects.

6. Brown's Self-interpreting Bible, in 2 vols. 4to. Its chief excellencies are the marginal references, which are exceedingly useful to preachers; and the close, plain, and practical improvement to each chapter.

7. Scott's Exposition is excellent, as it abounds with practical remarks, and the last edition contains choice marginal references. The improvements are also very useful for families.

8. Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary, with critical notes and marginal references, possesses considerable merit, and will be found a valuable treasure for the biblical student.

On the New Testament.

1. Burkit contains many ingenious observations, fine turns, natural plans, and pungent addresses to the conscience. There are some expressions, however, that grate upon the ear of the evangelical Christian.

2. Guyse's Paraphrase is deservedly held in high estimation for sound doctrine, fair explication, and just sentiment.

3. Doddridge's Family Expositor. The criticisms in this work render it valuable. It must be owned that the doctor labored to come as near as possible to the true sense of the text.

4. Bezae Annotations, in quibus ratio interpretationis redditur; accessit etiam J. Camerarii in novum fœdus commentarius, fol. Cantab. 1642, contains, besides the old Latin version, Beza's own version; and in the side margin is given a summary of the passage, and in the argumentative parts the connexion.

5. Wolfii Curæ Philologicæ et Criticæ in Omnes Libros Nov. Test. 5 vols. 4to. 1739. Hamb. Basil, 1741. This is in a great measure a compilation after the manner of Poole's Synopsis, but interspersed with his own critical animadversions.

6. Beageli Gnomon Nov. Test. 4to. Tubingæ, 1759, and Ulmæ, 1763, contains an instructive preface, a perspicuous analysis of each book, with short notes. It is a perfect contrast to that of Wolfius.

7. Hammond's Paraphrase and Annotations upon all the books of the New Testament, fol.

8. Whitby's Paraphrase and Commentary on New Testament, 2 vols. fol.

9. Wesley's Explanatory Notes, 4to. or 3 vols. 12mo. For different translations, see article BIBLE.

Commentators on Select Parts.

1. Ainsworth on the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Song of Solomon.

2. Patrick's Commentaries on the Historical Parts of the Holy Scriptures, 3 vols.

3. Lightfoot's Works, 2 vols. fol. contain a chronicle of the times, and the order of the text of the Old Testament. The harmony, chronicle, and order of the New Testament; the harmony of the four Evangelists; a commentary on the Acts; Horæ Hebraicæ, &c.; on the four Evangelists, Acts, and 1 Corinthians.

4. Chrysostomi Opera, 8 vols. fol. contain expositions of various parts.

5. Calvini Opera Omnia, 9 vols. contain commentaries on the Pentateuch, Joshua, homilies on Samuel, sermons on Job, commentaries on Psalms, Isaiah, Evangelists, Acts, Paul's Epistles, and the other catholic Epistles; and prælectiones on Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor Prophets.

6. Louth on the Prophets.

7. Pocock on some of the Minor Prophets.

8. Locke on Paul's Epistles.

9. Hutcheson on the Smaller Prophets.

10. Newcome on Ezekiel and Minor Prophets.

11. Macknight's Harmony of the Gospel, and literal Translation of all the apostolical Epistles, with Commentary and Notes.

12. Campbell's Translation of the Gospels, with Notes and Dissertations.

13. Bloomfield's Critical Digest on all the books of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse. It contains a vast quantity of important critical materials.

As this article may be consulted for the purpose of obtaining information as to the best helps for understanding the Scriptures, we may add to the above,—Jacobi Elsner, Observat. Sacræ, Alberti Observ. Philolog.; Lamberti Bos, Exercit. Philolog.; Lamberti Bos, Observat. Miscell. Fortuita Sacra. These, together with Wolfius and Raphaelus, before mentioned, says Dr. Doddridge, are books which I cannot but recommend to my young friends, as proper not only to ascertain the sense of a variety of words and phrases which occur in the apostolic writings, but also to form them to the most useful method of studying the Greek classics; those great masters of solid sense, elegant expression, just and lively painting, and masculine eloquence, to the neglect of which I cannot but ascribe that enervate, dissolute, and puerile manner of writing, which is growing so much on the present age, and will probably consign so many of its productions to speedy oblivion. COMMERCE. Merchandise, in its various branches, was carried on in the East at the earliest period of which we have any account; and it was not long before the traffic between nations, both by sea and land, was very considerable. Accordingly, frequent mention is made of public roads, fords, bridges, and beasts of burden; also of ships for the transportation of property, of weights, measures, and coin, both in the oldest books of the Bible, and in the most ancient profane histories. The Phœnicians anciently held the first rank as a commercial nation. They were in the habit of purchasing goods of various kinds throughout all the east. They then carried them in ships down the Mediterranean, as far as the shores of Africa and Europe, brought back in return merchandise and silver, and disposed of these again in the more eastern countries. The first metropolis of the Phœnicians was Sidon: afterwards Tyre became the principal city. Tyre was built two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon, or twelve hundred and fifty-one before Christ. The Phœnicians had ports of their own in almost every country; the most distinguished of which were Carthage, and Tarshish, or Tartessus, in Spain. The ships from the latter place unlooked very distant voyages; hence any vessels that performed distant voyages were called "ships of Tarshish." Something is said of the commerce of the Phœnicians in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth chapters of Ezekiel, and the twenty-third chapter of Isaiah. The inhabitants of Arabia Felix carried on a commerce with India. They carried some of the articles which they brought from India, through the straits of Babelmandel, into Abyssinia and Egypt; some they transported to Babylon, through the Persian gulf and the Euphrates; and some by the way of the Red sea, to the port of Eziongeber. They thus became rich; though it is possible their wealth may have been too much magnified by the ancients. The eminence of the Egyptians, as a commercial nation, commences with the reign of Necho. Their commerce, nevertheless, was not great, till Alexander had destroyed Tyre and built Alexandria.

2. The Phœnicians sometimes received the goods of India, by way of the Persian gulf, where they had colonies in the islands of Dedan, Arad, and Tyre. Sometimes they received them from the Arabians, who either brought them by land through Arabia, or up the Red sea to Eziongeber. In the latter case, having landed them at the port mentioned, they transported them through the country, by the way of Gaza, to Phœnicia. The Phœnicians increased the amount of their foreign goods by the addition of those which they themselves fabricated, and were thus enabled to supply all parts of the Mediterranean. The Egyptians at first received their goods from the Phœnicians, Arabians, Africans, and Abyssinians; in all of which countries there are still the remains of large trading towns; but, in a subsequent age, they imported goods from India in their own vessels, and eventually carried on an export trade with various ports on the Mediterranean. Oriental commerce, however, was chiefly carried on by land: accordingly, vessels are hardly mentioned in the Bible, except in Psalm 107: 23—30, and in passages where the discourse turns upon the Phœnicians, or upon the naval affairs of Solomon and Jehoshaphat. The two principal routes from Palestine into Egypt were, the one along the shores of the Mediterranean, from Gaza to Pelusium, and the other from Gaza, by the way of mount Sinai and the Eranitic branch of the Red sea.

3. The merchants transported their goods upon camels; animals which are patient of thirst, and are easily supported in the deserts. For the common purpose of security against depredations, the oriental merchants travelled in company, as is common in the East at the present day. A large travelling company of this kind is called a caravan or carban, a smaller one was called kafilé or kaffe. Job 6: 18—20. Gen. 37: 25. Isa. 21: 13. Jer. 9: 2. Judges 5: 6. Luke 2: 44. The furniture carried by the individuals of a caravan consisted of a mattress, a coverlet, a carpet for sitting upon, a round piece of leather, which answered the purpose of a table, a few pots and kettles of copper, covered with tin; also a tin-plated cup, which was suspended before the breast, under the outer garment, and was used for drinking, (1 Sam. 26: 11, 12, 16.) leathern bags for holding water, tents, lights, and provisions in quality and abundance as each one could afford. Every caravan had a leader to conduct it through the desert, who was acquainted with the direction of its route, and with the cisterns and fountains. These he was able to ascertain, sometimes from heaps of stones, sometimes by the character of the soil, and, when other helps failed him, by the stars. Numb. 10: 29—32. Jer. 31: 21. Isa. 21: 14. When all things are in readiness, the individuals who compose the caravan assemble at a distance from the city. The commander of the caravan, who is a different person from the conductor or leader, and is chosen from the wealthiest of its members, appoints the day of their departure. A similar arrangement was adopted among the Jews, whenever they travelled in large numbers to the city of Jerusalem. The caravans start very early, sometimes before day. They endeavor to find a stopping-place or station to remain at during the night, which shall afford them a supply of water. Job 6: 15—20. They arrive at their stopping-place before the close of the day; and, while it is yet light, prepare every thing that is necessary for the recommencement of their journey. In order to prevent any one from wandering away from the caravan, and getting lost during the night, lamps or torches are elevated upon poles and carried before it. The pillar of fire answered this purpose for the Israelites, when wandering in the wilderness. Sometimes the caravans lodge in cities; but when they do not, they pitch their tents so as to form an encampment; and during the night, keep watch alternately, for the sake of security. In the cities, there are public inns, called chan and caravanserais, in which the caravans are lodged without expense. They are large square buildings, in the centre of which is an area, or open court. Caravanserais are denominated in the Greek of the New Testament, pandocheion, katalusis, and kataluma. Luke 2: 7. 10: 34. The first mention of one in the Old Testament is in Jer. 41: 17. It was situated near the city of Bethlehem.

4. Moses enacted no laws in favor of commerce, although there is no question that he saw the situation of Palestine to be very favorable for it. The reason of this was, that the Hebrews, who were designedly set apart to preserve the true religion, could not mingle with foreign idolatrous nations without injury. He therefore merely inculcated good faith and honesty in buying and selling, (Lev. 19: 36, 37. Deut. 25: 13—16.) and left all the other interests of commerce to a future age. By the establishment, however, of the three great festivals, he gave occasion for some mercantile intercourse. At these festivals, all the adult males of the nation were yearly assembled at one place. The consequence was, that those who had any thing to sell, brought it; while those who wished to buy articles, came with the expectation of having an opportunity. As Moses, though he did not encourage, did not interdict foreign commerce, Solomon, at a later period, not only carried on a traffic in horses, as already stated, but sent ships from the port of Eziongeber, through the Red sea, to Ophir, probably the coast of Africa. 1 Kings 9: 26. 2 Chron. 9: 21. This traffic, although a source of emolument, appears to have been neglected after the death of Solomon. The attempt made by Jehoshaphat to restore it, was frustrated by his ships being dashed upon the rocks and destroyed. 1 Kings 22: 48, 49. 2 Chron. 20: 36. Joppa, though not a very convenient one, was properly the port of Jerusalem; and some of the large vessels which went to Spain sailed from it. Jonah 1: 3. In the age of Ezekiel, the commerce of Jerusalem was so great, that it gave an occasion of envy, even to the Tyrians themselves. Ezekiel 26: 2. After the captivity, a great number of Jews became merchants, and travelled, for the purpose of traffic, into all countries. About the year 150 B. C., prince Simon rendered the port at Joppa more convenient than it had hitherto been. In the time of Pompey the Great, there were so many Jews abroad on the ocean, even in the character of pirates, that king Antigonus was accused before him of having sent them out on purpose. A new port was built by Herod at Cæsarea. —Watson.

COMMISSARY; an officer of the bishop, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction in places of a diocese so far from the episcopal see, that the chancellor cannot call the people to the bishop's principal consistory court without great inconvenience.—Hend. Buck.

COMMIT. To commit one's self, spirit, way, or salvation to God, is upon the faith of his promise to intrust the same to his care, that he may receive, uphold, direct, preserve, and save us. Ps. 31: 5. 10: 14. and 37: 5. Prov. 16: 3. 2 Tim. 1: 12.—Brown.

COMMON; profane, ceremonially unclean, Mark 7: 2, 5. Acts 10: 14, 15. Rom. 14: 14.—Calmet.

COMMUNE. To commune with our heart is seriously to propose to it important questions; entertain it with the view of excellent subjects, and address it with weighty charges and directions. Ps. 4: 4. (See COMMUNION.)—Brown.

COMMUNICATING, a term made use of to denote the act of receiving the Lord's supper. Those of the reformed and of the Greek church communicate under both kinds; those of the Romish only under one. The oriental communicants receive the species of wine by a spoon; and anciently they sucked it through a pipe, as has been observed by Beat. Rheanus on Tertullian.

The fourth council of Lateran decrees, that every beiever shall receive the communion, at least, at Easter; which seems to import a tacit desire that they should do it oftener, as in effect they did it much oftener in the primitive days. Gratian, and the master of the sentences, prescribe it as a rule for the laity to communicate three times a year—at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas; but, in the thirteenth century, the practice prevailed of never approaching the eucharist at Easter; and the council thought fit to enjoin it then by a law, lest their coldness and remissness should go farther still; and the council of Trent renewed the same injunction, and recommended frequent communion, without enforcing it by an express decree. In the ninth century, the communion was still received by the laity in both kinds, or rather the species of bread was dipped in the wine, as is owned by the Romanists themselves. M. de Marca observes, that they received it at first in their hands; and believes the communion, under one kind alone, to have had its rise in the West, under pope Urban II., in 1096, at the time of the conquest of the Holy Land. It was more solemnly enjoined by the council of Constance, in 1414. The twenty-eighth canon of the council of Clermont enjoins the communion to be received under both kinds distinctly; adding, however, two exceptions—the one of necessity, the other of caution—the first in favor of the sick, and the second of the abstemious, or those who had an aversion for wine. It was formerly a kind of canonical punishment for clerks guilty of any crime to be reduced to lay communion—i. e. only to receive it as the laity did—viz., under one kind. They had another punishment of the same nature, though under a different name, called foreign communion, to which the canons frequently condemned their bishops and other clerks. This punishment was not any excommunication or deposition, but a kind of suspension from the function of the order, and a degradation from the rank they held in the church. It had its name because the communion was only granted to the criminal on the foot of a foreign clerk—i. e. being reduced to the lowest of his order, he took his place after all those of his rank, as all clerks, &c. did in the churches to which they did not belong. The second council of Agda orders every clerk that absents himself from the church to be reduced to foreign communion.—Hend. Buck.

COMMUNION. Koinōniz, in its strict and proper sense, signifies sharing something in common with another, Acts 2: 42. 2 Cor. 13: 14.—2. In a more general sense, it denotes agreement, or participation, 2 Cor. 6: 11; Eph. 5: 11.—3. It signifies converse, or friendly intercourse, wherein men contrive or consult together about matters of common concern. Luke 6: 11; Ps. 4: 4.—1. Communion is also used for the Lord's supper, because we herein make a public profession of our conformity to Christ and his laws; of our spiritual participation of his body and blood; and of our agreement with other Christians in the spirit and faith of the gospel. (See LORD'S SUPPER.)

Church communion is fellowship with any particular church. (See CHURCH FELLOWSHIP.) It is sometimes applied to different churches united in doctrine and discipline. The three grand communions into which the Christian church is divided are those of the church of Rome, the Greek church, and the Protestant church; but originally all Christians were in communion with each other, having one communion, faith, and discipline. See COMMUNION, (TERMS OF.)—Hend. Buck.

COMMUNION SERVICE, the office (in the liturgy of the church of England) for the administration of the eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's supper.

The compilers of the Common Prayer Book extracted this office out of several ancient liturgies—as those of St. Basil, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory; but Bucer having found great fault with it, it underwent several alterations. The office was originally designed to be distinct, and, consequently, to be used at a different time from morning prayer; a custom which, bishop Overall says, was observed in his time in York and Chichester; and he imputes it to the negligence of the ministers, and carelessness of the people, that they are ever huddled together into one office.

By the last rubric after this office, part of it is appointed to be read on every Sunday and holiday, though there be no communicants; and the reason seems to have been, that the church may show her readiness to administer the sacrament upon those days, and that it is not her's, but the people's fault, that it is not administered; or it might be so ordered, for the sake of reading the decalogue, or ten commandments, the collects, epistles, and gospels, and the Nicene creed; together with the offertory, or sentences of Scripture, and the prayer for Christ's church.

This service, even when there is no communion, is generally read at the communion table, or altar; though in some places it is performed in the reading desk.—Hend. Buck.

COMMUNION WITH GOD, is that delightful fellowship and intercourse which a believer enjoys with his heavenly Father. Rom. 5: 1—11. Eph. 2: 18. Rom. 8: 15. Gal. 4: 6. It is founded upon union with him, and consists in a communication of divine graces from him, and a return of devout affections to him. The believer holds communion with God in his works, in his word, and in his ordinances. There can be no communion without likeness, nor without Christ as the Mediator. Some distinguish communion with God from the sense and feeling of it—that is, that we may hold communion with him without raptures of joy; and that a saint, even under desertion, may have communion with God as really, though not so feelingly, as at any other time. This communion cannot be interrupted by any local mutations: it is far superior to all outward services and ordinances whatsoever; it concerns the whole soul, all the affections, faculties, and motions of it being under its influence; it is only imperfect in this life, and will be unspeakably enlarged in a better world. In order to keep up communion with God, we should inform ourselves of his will, (John 5: 39;) be often in prayer, (Luke 8: 1;) embrace opportunities of retirement, (Ps. 4: 4;) contemplate on the divine perfections, providences, and promises, (Ps. 104: 34;) watch against a vain, trifling, and volatile spirit, (Eph. 4: 30;) and be found in the use of all the means of grace, (Ps. 27: 4.) The advantages of communion with God are, deadness to the world, (Phil. 3: 8;) patience under trouble, (Job 1: 22;) fortitude in danger, (Ps. 27: 1;) gratitude for mercies received, (Ez. 103: 1;) direction under difficulties, (Prov. 3: 5, 6;) peace and joy in opposition, (Ps. 16: 23;) happiness in death, (Ps. 23: 4;) and an earnest desire for heaven and glory, 2 Tim. 4: 7, 8. See Shaw's Immanuel; Owen and Henry on Communion with God; and article FELLOWSHIP.—Hend. Buck.

COMMUNION, (TERMS OF.) It is admitted by all denominations of Christians, with the exception of one, that the sacrament of the Lord's supper is of perpetual obligation; and that it was designed by its Founder to be one of the visible expressions of our faith in his blood, and of our fraternal love to his followers. Though the communion of saints, properly speaking, is of larger extent, comprehending all those sentiments and actions by which Christians are especially united, the joint participation of this ordinance is universally acknowledged to constitute one branch of that communion. So important a part indeed has it been considered, that it has usurped the name of the whole; and when any dispute arises respecting the terms of communion, it is generally understood to relate to the terms of admission to the Lord's table.

Whether all Christians simply as such, are entitled to share in this privilege; or whether it being a privilege peculiar to the visible church of Christ, regular membership in the church be a necessary prerequisite to admission; and if the latter, what constitutes regular membership in the visible church, are questions on which the Christian world are at present of different opinions.

The general opinion and practice in all ages has been, that something more than conversion or Christian character was necessary to this ordinance; that baptism, soundness in the faith, and a regular walk of holy obedience, were scriptural and indispensable terms of communion. But of late, numbers following the steps of the illustrious Robert Hall, have regarded the evidence of Christian character as alone indispensably prerequisite to the table of the Lord. Those of the latter opinion are termed adherents of free, catholic, open, or mixed communion; while those of different sentiments are denominated adherents of strict, close, primitive, or church communion. The appellation of Christian communion is claimed on both sides.

The opinion of Mr. Hall that baptism is not a prerequisite to the participation of the eucharist, runs through all his reasonings in favor of unrestricted communion, and is the real foundation on which they rest. His positions are the following: 1. The baptism of John was a separate institution from that appointed by Christ after his resurrection; from which it follows that the Lord's supper was anterior to Christian baptism, and that the original communicants consisted entirely of such as had not received that ordinance. 2. That there is no such connexion, either in the nature of things, or by the divine institution, between baptism and the eucharist, as renders it, under all circumstances, indispensable that the former should precede the latter. 3. That admitting this to be the prescribed order, and to be sanctioned by the uniform practice of the apostles, the case of pious Pedobaptists is a new case, calling for some peculiar treatment, in which we ought to regard rather the spirit than the letter of apostolic precedent. 4. That a schism in the church, the mystical body of Christ, is deprecated in the New Testament as the greatest evil. 5. That a reception to church fellowship of all such as God has received, notwithstanding a diversity of opinion and practice in matters not essential to salvation, is expressly enjoined in the New Testament. Rom. 14:1-5. 15:1, 5-7. 6. That to withhold the Lord's supper from those with whom we unite in other acts of Christian worship, is a palpable inconsistency. And lastly, That it is as impolitic as it is illiberal; being calculated to awaken a powerful prejudice, and place beyond the reach of conviction our Pedobaptist brethren, and to engender among the Baptists themselves a narrow and sectarian feeling, wholly opposed to the enlarged spirit of the present age. Complete Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. 207-230. Also vol. i. 283-504.

The positions urged on the opposite side by Mr. J. G. Fuller are these: 1. That all the arguments which are used to destroy the identity of baptism as practised by John and the apostles before the death of Christ, with that practised afterwards, amount only to proof of a circumstantial not an essential difference, and cannot therefore warrant the inferences of Mr. Hall in any one point.—2. That the commission of our Lord, (Matt. 28:19, 20.) furnishes the same evidence that baptism is an indispensable prerequisite to external church fellowship, as that faith is an indispensable prerequisite to baptism.—3. That the uniform examples of the apostles in an inspired explanation of the commission under which they acted, and a pattern intended for the instruction of the church in all succeeding ages.—4. That strict conformity to the commission of Christ, thus explained, is not schism, but the only possible mode of restoring and perpetuating Christian union.—5. That the mutual forbearance enjoined on Christians in the New Testament related to matters of real indifference, not involving the surrender of any positive institution of Christ; and is therefore inapplicable to the present case.—6. That to unite with Pedobaptist brethren in all such acts of worship and benevolent effort as do not imply an abandonment of the commission, is not an inconsistency, but the dictate of Christian charity.—And lastly, That to whatever imputations a strict adherence to the commission of Christ may subject the Baptist churches, it is better to suffer them than to sin; and that a deviation in deference to modern error, however conscientiously maintained, is neither charity nor Christian wisdom, since "whatever is right is wise." Christians may cordially unite in the evangelization of the world, but they do not, nor can they without a change of sentiments, unite in the constitution of their churches.—Conversations on Strict and Mixed Communion, by J. G. Fuller.

It may not be improper to add, that since both parties really desire to restore the primitive unity among Christians, but differ only as to the means best adapted to promote that desirable end, all unkind imputations should be avoided on both sides. Instead of wasting time in mutual recrimination, let it be devoted to mutual prayer to the Father of lights. Christian charity, an apostle has said, "thinketh no evil," "vaunteth not itself," "is not puffed up," "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth." Whether we seek union or edification, this undoubtedly is the more excellent way. "A larger communication of the Spirit of truth, (as Mr. Hall justly observes in his admirable Review of 'Zeal without Innovation,') would inseparably lead Christians into a similar train of thinking; and being more under the guidance of that infallible Teacher, they would gradually tend to the same point, and settle in the same conclusions. Without such an influence as this, the coalescing into one communion would probably be productive of much mischief; it certainly would do no sort of good, since it would be the mere result of intolerance and pride acting upon indolence and fear.

"During the present disjointed state of things, then, nothing remains but for every one to whom the care of any part of the church of Christ is intrusted, to exert himself to the utmost in the promotion of vital religion, in cementing the friendship of the good, and repressing, with a firm hand, the heats and eruptions of party spirit. He will find sufficient employment for his time and his talents in inculcating the great truths of the gospel, and endeavoring to "form Christ" in his hearers, without blowing the flames of contention.—Were our efforts uniformly to take this direction, there would be an identity in the impression made by religious instruction; the distortion of party features would gradually disappear; and Christians would every where approach that ideal beauty spoken of by painters, which is combined of the finest lines and traits conspicuous in individual forms."—Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. 267.

The principal writers in favor of free communion have been Mr. Jesse, Bunyan, Robert Robinson, Robert Hall—Austin, Worcester, Mason, Brooks, Griffin.—In favor of strict communion, Mr. Booth, Andrew Fuller, Kinghorn, Newman, Toimey, J. G. Fuller—Baldwin, Merrill, Merriam, Cone, Foster, Ripley.

COMPACT; a covenant, or a regular adjustment. Ps. 122:3. The church is compact together; every member has his own proper station and work, and yet all are so joined as to add to her general glory and welfare. Eph. 4:16. Col. 2:19.—Brown.

COMPARE; to set things together, in order that the likeness or difference may clearly appear. 1 Cor. 2:13. Judg. 8:2. It is not wise to compare ourselves with our opposers or friends; as not they, but the law of God, is the proper standard by which we ought to judge ourselves. 2 Cor. 10:12.—Brown.

COMPASSION. God's being full of compassion imports the infinite greatness of his tender mercy and love, and his readiness to comfort and relieve such as are afflicted. Ps. 78:38. 86:15. 111:4. and 145:8.—Brown.

COMPEL. Ministers compel sinners to come in to Christ's house, when, with the utmost earnestness and concern, they show them their sinfulness and danger; the excellency, love, and loveliness of Christ; the happiness of those who receive him; their warrant, and the command of God to believe in him, and beseech them, as in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. Luke 14:23.

COMPLETE; fully finished. Lev. 23:15. Saints are complete in Christ; they are perfectly justified, and have in him complete fulness of grace to render them perfectly holy and happy, Col. 2:10. They stand complete in all the will of God, when they regard all his commandments, and obey them in an eminent degree. Col. 4:12.—Brown.

COMPREHEND. To comprehend, with all saints, the unbounded love of Christ, is to have a clear, extensive, and heart-ravishing knowledge of its nature and effects. Eph. 3:18.—Brown.

COMPREHENSION, in English church history, denotes a scheme proposed by Sir Orlando Bridgman, in 1667-8, for relaxing the terms of conformity on behalf of the Protestant Dissenters, and admitting them into the communion of the church. A bill for this purpose was drawn up by judge Hale, but disallowed. The attempt was renewed by Tillotson and Stillingfleet, in 1674, and the terms were settled to the satisfaction of the non-conformists; but the bishops refused their assent. The scheme was likewise revived again immediately after the revolution. The king and queen expressed their desire of a union:

however, the design failed, after two attempts, and the act of toleration was obtained.—Hend. Buck.

CONANT, (JOHN, D. D.) a learned and eminent English divine, was born, 1608, at Yeaton in Devonshire. At the university he was so remarkable for his perfect mastery of the Latin and Greek languages that Dr. John Prideaux, then rector of Exeter college, used to say of him, "Conanti nihil difficile est" which in one sense implies 'to him who endeavors every thing is easy,' and in another, 'there is nothing difficult to Conant.' Upon the breaking out of the civil war in 1642, he was chosen one of the assembly of divines, but never or seldom sat among them, and did not take the covenant. He afterwards became chaplain to lord Chandas, at Herefield, to avoid the snares of a more public life; but in 1647, was chosen rector of Exeter college. Dr. Conant's declaration before the commissioners when he took the engagement, was so drawn up as not to bind his conscience to the existing government any longer than he should regard it as the will of God. He filled his office with great reputation. In December, 1654, he became divinity professor of Oxford university. In 1657, he was admitted vice-chancellor of the university, in which office he secured to the library Mr. Selden's large and valuable collection of books. After the restoration, in 1661, he was employed by Charles II. in reviewing the book of common prayer and assisting at the Savoy conferences. Refusing to sign the act of conformity for eight years, he lost his preferments; and after his consent, was re-ordained by Dr. Reynolds, bishop of Norwich, in 1670. He was afterwards rector of Northampton and prebendary of Worcester. In 1686, he lost his sight, and in 1693, expired at the age of 85. He was a man of great piety and excellence, a devoted minister, an able casuist, and resorted to even by foreigners. His charity was unbounded. At Northampton, for twenty years together, he paid the schooling of poor children, never fewer than twenty-four, and these he placed out with needy widows, that what he gave might contribute to their assistance. His modesty was equal to his great learning; for though he was versed in most of the oriental languages, particularly the Syriac, few people knew it, and he never sought any thing for himself. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.—Middleton.

CONCEPTION, (IMMACULATE;) the opinion entertained in the Roman and Greek churches, that the virgin Mary was conceived without the stain of original sin. St. Bernard, in the twelfth century, rejected this doctrine in opposition to the canons of Lyons, and it afterwards became a subject of vehement controversy between the Scotts and the Thomists. The Dominicans espoused the opinion of Thomas, who impugned the dogma: the Franciscans that of Scotus, who defended it. Sixtus IV., himself a Franciscan, allowed of toleration on the point. In the fifth session of the council of Trent, it was resolved that the doctrine of the conception of all men in original sin was not intended to include the Virgin. The controversy was revived in the university of Paris, towards the close of the sixteenth century. During the pontificates of Paul V. and Gregory XV., such was the dissension it occasioned in Spain, that both Philip and his successor sent special embassies to Rome in the vain hope that this contest might be terminated by a bull. The dispute ran so high in that kingdom, that, in the military orders of St. James, of the Sword, of Calatrava, and of Alcantara, the knights, on their admission, vowed to maintain the doctrine. In 1708, Clement XI. appointed a festival to be celebrated throughout the church, in honor of the immaculate conception. Since that time, it has been received in the church of Rome as an opinion, but not as an article of faith. It is firmly believed in the Greek church, in which the feast is celebrated under the name of the Conception of St. Anne. Peter of Alva et Astorga published more than forty huge volumes on this subject.—Hend. Buck.

CONCEPTION OF OUR LADY, (NUNS OF THE ORDER OF;) a religious order, founded by Beatrix de Sylva, sister of James, first count of Porallegro in Portugal. She pretended that the virgin Mary had twice appeared to her, and inspired her with the design of founding an order in honor of her own immaculate conception. To this end, she obtained of the queen of Castile a grant of the palace of Galliana, where was a chapel dedicated to the honor of St. Faith. Beatrix, accompanied by twelve young maids of the Dominican monastery, took possession of it in the year 1484. These religious were habited in a white gown, and scapulary, and a blue mantle, and wore on their scapulary the image of the blessed Virgin. Pope Innocent VIII. confirmed the order in 1489, and granted them permission to follow the rule of the Cistercians. The foundress died in the year 1490, at sixty-six years of age.

After the death of Beatrix, cardinal Ximenes put the nuns of the Conception under the direction of the Franciscans, as being the most zealous defenders of the immaculate conception: at the same time he gave them the rule of St. Clara to follow. The second convent of the order was founded, in the year 1507, at Torrijo, in the diocese of Toledo, which produced seven others; the first of which was at Madrid. This order passed into Italy, and got footing in Rome and Milan. In the reign of Lewis XIV., king of France, the Clarisses of the suburb of St. Germain, at Paris, embraced the order of the Conception. These religious, besides the grand office of the Franciscans, recite on Sundays and holidays a lesser office, called the office of the conception of the holy Virgin.—Hend. Buck.

CONCISION; cutting off. Joel 3: 14. The Jews are called the circumcision, because, under pretence of zealous adherence to circumcision, they, after it was abolished by our Savior's death, cut their bodies, rent the church, and cut off themselves from the blessings of the gospel. Phil. 3: 2.—Brown.

CONCLAVE; the assembly or meeting of the cardinals shut up for the election of a pope. Conclave also signifies the place in which the cardinals of the Romish church meet for the above-mentioned purpose. The conclave is a range of small cells, ten feet square, made of wainscot: these are numbered, and drawn by lot. They stand in a line along the galleries and hall of the Vatican, with a small space between each. Every cell has the arms of the cardinal over it. The conclave is not fixed to any one determinate place, for the constitutions of the church allow the cardinals to make choice of such a place for the conclave as they think most convenient: yet it is generally held in the Vatican.

The following account of the formalities which precede the opening of the electoral college, and of the organization of the assembly, is given in a French paper:—As soon as a pope dies, rooms or apartments are prepared in the Vatican, equal in number to the members of the sacred college. These apartments or cells, formed of wood-work in the vast halls of the palace, are very modestly furnished. They have no separate fireplace, and the fathers must warm themselves at fires common to all. The chambers for the cardinals and the officers of their suite are very gloomy; the windows, with the exception of the highest panes, being walled in.

The clock of the capitol announces the death of the pope, and the vacancy of the see. It tolls for nine days and nights without interruption. In the mean time, the funeral ceremonies of the deceased are preparing. On the ninth day, the body of the last pope displaces, in the church of St. Peter, that of his predecessor. During the interregnum, or the time that intervenes between the death of one, and the election of another pontiff, the executive power of the state is exercised by the cardinal great chamberlain. The legal term for the opening of the conclave is the tenth day after the death of the pope, but it rarely happens that the necessary preparations can be completed by that time; thirteen or fourteen days are generally allowed for the previous arrangements, and for the arrival of the foreign cardinals in Rome. If the assembly opens before, it is only for the sake of form. They do nothing till the arrival of such fathers from France, Spain, Austria, Poland, or other Catholic countries, as wish to attend. The preliminary operations are, therefore, trifling and unimportant. When the members are assembled, and the conclave proceeds seriously to its task, three cardinals are elected every day to be the delegates of the sacred college, and to transact the affairs of the papacy with foreign ambassadors. These representatives of the Catholic powers deliver their credential letters to the ephemeral commissioners of the sacred college at the grating of their temporary prison. The time of deliberation is prolonged according to the number and power of the candidates, the difficulty of adjusting adverse pretensions, or the success of diplomatic intrigues. Though apparently cut off from all communication with the external world, these ghostly fathers often receive directions as to their choice, offers of bribes, or information of the designs of their rivals, through the grating of their cells, or the only part of the window which the law leaves open. A letter sometimes is transmitted in the staffing of a fowl, or under the crust of a pie.—Head. Buck.

CONCORD, (FORM OF.) Form of concord; in ecclesiastical history, a standard book among the Lutherans, composed at Torgau, in 1576, and thence called the Book of Torgau, and reviewed at Berg, by six Lutheran doctors of Germany, the principal of whom was James Andreas. This book contains, in two parts, a system of doctrine, the subscription of which was a condition of communion, and a formal and very severe condemnation of all who differed from the compilers of it; particularly with respect to the majesty and omnipresence of Christ's body, and the real manducation of his flesh and blood in the eucharist. It was first imposed upon the Saxons by Augustus, and occasioned great opposition and disturbance. The dispute about it was revived in Switzerland in 1718, when the magistrates of Berne published an order for adopting it as a rule of faith; and the consequence of which was a contest that reduced its credit and authority.—Head. Buck.

CONCORDANCE; a book containing the principal words in the Holy Scriptures, in alphabetical order, with part of the connexion, and a designation by chapter and verse of the places in which they are to be found. This class of books is of great importance to the interpreter of the word of God. While the Scriptures remained in manuscript, or were not divided into sections and paragraphs, indices of their words and phrases could neither be formed nor used. As soon as any regular divisions began to be made, the importance of concordances, or alphabetical indices, was felt, and learned men devoted their labors to form them. The following are the most important works of this description in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English:

I. HEBREW CONCORDANCES.

The first Hebrew concordance was the work of rabbi Mordecai Nathan, which he began in 1438, and finished in 1448, after ten years' hard labor by himself and some assistants. It was printed at Venice in 1523, in folio, by Dan. Bomberg. It is entirely Hebrew, and entitled "The Light of the Way." It was reprinted somewhat more correctly at Basil, by Frobenius, in 1581, and translated into Latin by Reuchlin, in 1556; but both the Hebrew and Latin editions are full of errors. These were mostly corrected, and other deficiencies supplied, by Marius de Calasio, a Franciscan friar, who published "Concordantiæ Sacrorum Bibliorum Hebraicorum, et Latinorum." Romæ, 1621, four volumes, folio." This large and splendid work retains the Hebrew text, and also the order and method of Nathan's Concordance. It contains also Reuchlin's Latin Translation of Rabbi Nathan's Explanation of the Hebrew Roots, with enlargements by Calasio; the Rabbinical, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic words derived from, or agreeing with the Hebrew roots in signification; a literal Version of the Hebrew Text; the differences between the Vulgate and Septuagint are marked in the margin; proper names of persons, places, &c. It is a very complete, but exceedingly heavy work. Calasio died in 1620.

"Concordantiæ Bibliorum Ebraicæ, nova et artificiosa methodo disposita, &c. Basil. 1632, folio." This concordance is the work of John Buxtorf, the father, but was published by his son. The groundwork of it is the concordance of Rabbi Nathan. It is much better arranged, more correctly printed, the roots more distinctly ascertained, and the meaning more accurately given. Buxtorf bestowed much labor and attention on it. The references are made by Hebrew letters to the chapters and verses of the different books in the Hebrew Bible; and, as so much of the text is exhibited as is necessary to show the connexion in which any word is used, it is decidedly by far the best work of the kind extant. It only wants the particles, as given by Noldius, to render it complete. It was abridged by Christian Ravinus, under the title of "Fons Zionis, sive Concordantiarum Hebraicarum et Chaldaicarum Jo. Buxtorfii Epitome. Berolini, 1677, octavo." The concordance of Calasio was republished in London, under the direction of William Romaine, in 1747-1749, four volumes, folio. It is more accurate than its prototype; but it is a very prolix work; and as only a small edition was published, it is become scarce. All the crowned heads in Europe, his holiness not excepted, were subscribers to this work.

"The Hebrew Concordance, adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf. By John Taylor, London, 1754, two volumes, folio."—This is a very useful work of the kind, especially to the English scholar. It was the fruit of many years' labor of the industrious author, and was published under the patronage of all the English and Irish bishops.

"Concordantiæ Particularum Ebræo-Chaldaicarum, in quibus partium indeclinabilium, quæ occurrunt in fontibus, et hæcenus non expositæ sunt in Lexicis aut Concordantiis, natura et sensum varietas ostenditur, &c. Hafniæ, 1675, folio; 1679, quarto."—This concordance, the work of Christian Noldius, professor of theology at Copenhagen, where he died in 1683, supplied an important desideratum. It contains the particles, or indeclinable words, omitted in former concordances. It investigates their various significations; points out the Greek particles which correspond with the Hebrew and Chaldaic ones; and explains the meaning of many passages of Scripture, which depends on the force and connective power of the indeclinable words. The best edition of Noldius is that published at Jena, in 1734, quarto, under the care of Tympius. It contains, as an appendix, a Lexicon of the Hebrew Particles, by John Henry Michaelis, and Christ. Koerber. It is an exceedingly valuable work, and has been of great service to all who have since been employed on the critical examination of the Bible.

II. GREEK CONCORDANCES TO THE SEPTUAGINT.

"Conradi Kircheri Concordantiæ Veteris Testamenti Græcæ Ebræis vocibus respondentæ, &c. Francof. 1607, two volumes, quarto."—The author of this work was a Lutheran minister at Augsburg. It possesses considerable merit; but, rather inconsistently for a Greek concordance, follows the order of the Hebrew words, placing the corresponding Greek word after it; in consequence of which, it is more useful in consulting the Hebrew than the Greek Scriptures.

"Abrahami Trommii Concordantiæ Græcæ Versionis vulgo dictæ LXX. Interpretum, cujus voces secundum ordinem elementorum sermonis Græci digestæ recensentur, contra atque in Opere Kircheriano factum fuerat. Amst. 1718, two volumes, folio."—The author of this learned and most laborious work was minister of Groningen, and published the concordance in the eighty-fourth year of his age. He was born in 1633, and died in 1719. It is the most accurate and complete index to the Septuagint that has been, or is ever likely to be published. It follows, as is stated in the title, the order of the Greek words; of which it first gives a Latin translation, and then the Hebrew word or words for which the Greek term is used in the Seventy. Then the different places in which they occur in the Scriptures follow in the order of the several books and chapters; the whole branch of the sentence to which they belong being inserted in the same manner as in Cruden's English concordance. When the word occurs in any of the ancient Greek translators, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the places where it is found are referred to at the end of the quotations from the Seventy. The words of the Apocrypha are placed at the close of each enumeration. There are two indices at the end of the work, the one Hebrew and Chaldaic; by examining which, the Greek term used in the Seventy for any Hebrew or Chaldee word is at once seen, with the Latin version, and the place where it is found in the concordance; so that Tromm serves tolerably well for a Hebrew concordance. The other index contains a lexicon to the Hexapla of Origen, and comprehends the Greek words in the fragments of the old Greek translators published by Mont faucon.

"I wish as earnestly," says Michaelis, "that this concordance were in the hands of every theologian, as that Pasor, and other works of that nature, were banished from the schools. By the help of it, we may discover at one view not only the sense and construction of a word in dispute, but likewise the Hebrew expression of which it is a translation, and thus easily determine whether a phrase be a Hebraism or not. It is true the work is incomplete; the Septuagint version of Daniel is totally wanting, being at that time unknown, and several words in the remaining books are omitted; but these omissions are not so numerous as might be expected in so many thousand words."

III. GREEK CONCORDANCES TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

"Xysti Betuleii Concordantiæ Græcæ Novi Testamenti. Basil. 1546, folio."—This is the first Greek concordance to the New Testament, and is exceedingly rare. The author was a German Lutheran divine, who was born in 1500, and died at Augsburg in 1554. His proper name was Birc.

"Concordantiæ Græco-Latinæ Novi Testamenti ab Henrico Stephano concinnatæ. Genev. 1594, fol. Ac cum supplemento, 1600. 2da editio, auctior, 1624."—This work was projected, and partly executed, by Robert Stephens, and completed and published by his son Henry. It is, however, so inaccurate, that Schmidt, the compiler of the next concordance, could scarcely admit that it was the work of the Stephenses.

"Erasmii Schmidii Novi Testamenti Jesu Christi Græci, hoc est, originalis Linguae, tameion, &c. Vitemb. 1638, folio."—This is a much more correct and valuable work than that of the Stephenses. The author was a Lutheran divine, and professor of the Greek language in the university of Wittemberg, where he died in 1637. Another edition of this concordance, revised and corrected, was published at Gotha, in 1717, with a preface by E. S. Cyprian. Of this edition, a very beautiful reprint, in two volumes, octavo, issued from the Glasgow university press in 1819; and an abridgment of it was published by Bagster, 1830, 32mo. Edited by Mr. Greenfield.

"Lexicon Anglo-Græco-Latinum Novi Testamenti, &c.; or an Alphabetical Concordance of all the Greek Words contained in the New Testament, both English, Greek, and Latin, &c. By Andrew Symson. London, 1658, folio."—This work partakes more of the nature of a lexicon than of a concordance. According to the author's account, "By it any word may be rendered into Greek and Latin, English and Latin, and Greek and English." Parkhurst says, "It is a performance which, whilst it exhibits the prodigious labor of its author, can give one no very high opinion of his genius or skill in the art of instruction. If, indeed, the method and ingenuity of this writer had been proportionable to his industry, one might, I think, almost affirm, that he would have rendered all future Greek and English lexicons of the New Testament in a great measure superfluous; but by injudiciously making the English translation the basis of his work, and by separating the etymological part of the Greek from the explanatory, he has rendered his book in a manner useless to the young scholar, and in truth hardly manageable by any but a person of uncommon application.

"A Concordance of the Greek Testament, with the English Version to each Word, the principal Hebrew Roots corresponding to the Greek Words of the Septuagint, with short critical Notes and an Index. By John Williams, LL. D. Lond. 1767, quarto."—This is a very useful and convenient work; it is much more portable than the larger concordances, and is sufficient for all common purposes, as it is in general very accurate.

IV. CONCORDANCES TO THE LATIN VULGATE.

The compiler of the first concordance to the Bible in any language was Hugo de St. Caro, or cardinal Hugo, a Dominican, who died about 1262. He had engaged in writing a commentary on the Scriptures, and in order to facilitate this work, projected a concordance, in which he is said to have employed nearly five hundred of his brethren. From this work have been derived all the concordances to the Scriptures in the original language. It was improved by Conrad of Halberstadt, who flourished about 1290, and by John of Segovia in the following century.

The first printed concordance to the Vulgate appeared under the following title:—

"Concordantiæ Bibliorum et Canonum. Bononiæ, Hugonis de Colonia, 1479, folio."

After the revision of the Latin Vulgate by Sixtus V. a concordance to it appeared, entitled:—

"Concordantiæ Sacr. Bibliorum Vulgate editionis, Hugone Cardinali auctore, &c. Opere et studio Francisci Lucæ Brugensis. Antverpiæ, 1617. Genevæ, 1625. Parisiis, 1683."—The greater number of the concordances to the Latin Vulgate are reprints of this edition. The best is that printed at Avignon, in 1786, in two volumes, folio.

V. CONCORDANCES TO THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

"The Concordance of the New Testament most necessary to be had in the hands of all such as desire the communication of any place contained in the New Testament. Imprinted by Mr. Thomas Gybson. Cum privilegio regali."—This is the first concordance to any part of the English Scriptures. It has no date, but must have been published before 1540. It is probable from the epistle to the reader, that it was the work of John Day, assisted by Gybson the printer.

"A Concordance, that is to saie, a worke, wherein by the order of the letters of the A, B, C, ye maie redcly finde any worde contaigned in the whole Bible, so often as it is there expressed or mentioned. By John Barbeck. Lond. 1550, folio."—This is the first English concordance to the entire Bible. The account which the author gives of his undertaking, when summoned before the bishops and condemned by them, is very interesting. "When Thomas Mathews' Bible came first out in print, I was much desirous to have one of them; and being a poor man, not able to buy one of them, determined with myself to borrow one amongst my friends, and to write it forthe. And when I had written out the five books of Moses in fair great paper, and was entered into the book of Joshua, my friend, Master Turner, chanced to steal upon me unawares, and seeing me writing out the Bible, asked me what I meant thereby? And when I had told him the cause: Tush! quoth he, thou goest about a vain and tedious labor. But this were a profitable work for thee, to set out a concordance in English. A concordance, said I, what is that? Then he told me it was a book to find out any word in the whole Bible by the letter, and that there was such a one in Latin already. Then I told him I had no learning to go about such a thing. Enough, quoth he, for that matter, for it requireth not so much learning as diligence. And seeing thou art so painful a man, and one that cannot be unoccupied, it were a good exercise for thee. He accordingly borrowed a Latin concordance, and had gone through the letter L, when his papers were seized. When he was set at liberty, as his papers were not restored to him, he had his concordance to begin again, which, when completed, he showed to a friend, who promised to assist him in having it presented to the king, in order to have it published by his authority; but Henry VIII. died before that could be brought about. His friend, however, to whom he could not say nay, requested a copy of it, which he accordingly transcribed for him. When Edward VI. was settled on the throne, he renewed his thoughts of publishing his work, and consulted Grafton, the printer, concerning it; 'who,' says he in his introduction, 'seeing the volume so huge and great, said the charges of imprinting thereof would not only be importunate, but the bores when finished would bear so excessive a price, as few should be able to attain unto them.' Wherefore, by his advice, I yet once again anew writ out the same in such sort, as the work now appereth." (Townley's Bib. Lit. vol. iii. p. 118.) The diligence and labors of such a man deserve to be recorded. The work is necessarily imperfect, and refers to the chapters only, not to verses. Subsequently to this, a number of concordances, or indices to the Bible, were published under various titles, and possessing different degrees of merit. The chief of these are the following:—

"Knight's Concordance Axiomatical. Lond. 1610, folio.—Clement Cotton's Concordance. Ibid. 1618, folio.—Newman's Large and Complete Concordance. Ibid. 1643, folio.—Bernard's Thesaurus Bibliæ. Ibid. 1644, folio.—

Robert Wickens's Concordance, complete and perfect, with a dedication to Dr. Owen. Ibid. 1655, octavo.—Powell's New and Useful Concordance. Ibid. 1671, octavo.—The Cambridge Concordance. Camb. 1669, folio.—And Buterworth's valuable Concordance, which followed in 1767, octavo.—All these are surpassed by the correct and invaluable work of Alexander Cruden, entitled, "A complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament." 1737, quarto. The author published three editions during his own life, and several have been published since his death. The London edition of 1810 is the most correct. The work is uncommonly complete, the definitions of leading words remarkably accurate, and the references exceedingly correct. The work is in the hands of every student, and requires no recommendation from me. An edition in royal octavo, very beautifully printed, has lately issued from the London press.

"A Concordance of Parallels collected from Bibles and Commentaries, which have been published in Hebrew, Latin, French, Spanish, and other Languages, with the Authorities of each. By the Rev. C. Crutwell. London, 1790, quarto." This is a work of immense labor, and for occasional consultation may be useful; but the references are often so numerous under a single verse, that it is scarcely possible to examine them all, or to perceive the design of each. The margin of Scott's Bible is in general far preferable.—Hend. Buck.

CONCORDATE; a convention between the pope of Rome, as the head of the Catholic church, and any secular government, for the settling of ecclesiastical relations. Treaties which the pope, as a secular sovereign, concludes with other princes respecting political concerns, are not called concordates. One of the most important of the earlier concordates is that of Worms, called also the Calixtine concordate, made in 1122, between Calixtus II. and Henry V., in order to put an end to the long contest on the subject of investiture; and which has since been considered a fundamental ordinance in respect to the relations between the Catholic church and the government in Germany. Most of the concordates have been extorted from the popes by the different civil powers. This was done as early as the fifteenth century; for when the council of Constance urged a reformation of the papal court, Martin V. saw himself obliged, in 1418, to conclude concordates with the Germans, and soon afterwards, also, with other nations. The popes, however, succeeded, even in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in concluding concordates for their own advantage. This was the case with those of Ashaffenburg. That also which was made by Leo X. and Francis I. of France (1516), was chiefly to the advantage of the pope. In later times, particularly towards the end of the eighteenth century, the papal court could no longer maintain a successful struggle with the spirit of the times, and with the secular powers, and was obliged to resign many privileges by concordates. Bonaparte, when first consul of the French republic, concluded a concordate with pope Pius VII., July 15, 1801, which went into operation in April, 1802. It re-established the Catholic church in France, and has become the basis of the present ecclesiastical constitution of that country. The government obtained by it the right of appointing the clergy; the public treasury gained by the diminution of the large number of metropolitan and episcopal sees to sixty; the pope was obliged to give up the plan of restoring the spiritual orders, and the influence which he exercised by means of delegates, but retained the right of the canonical investiture of bishops, and the revenues connected with this right. The interests of the papal religion suffered by this compact, inasmuch as most of the dioceses became now too large to be properly administered; and the lower clergy, the very soul of the church, who were in a poor condition before, were entirely dependent on the government. Louis XVIII. concluded, at Rome, with Pius VII., (July 11, 1817,) a new concordate, by which that of 1516, so injurious to the liberties of the Gallican church, was again revived; the concordate of 1801, and the articles organiques of 1802 were abolished; the nation subjected to an enormous tax by the demand of endowments for forty-two new metropolitan and episcopal sees, with their chapters and seminaries; and free scope afforded to the intolerance of the Roman court by the indefinite language of article tenth, which speaks of measures against the prevailing obstacles to religion and the laws of the church. This revival of old abuses, this provision for the luxury of numerous clerical dignitaries at the expense of the nation, could please only the ultra-royalist nobility, who saw in it the means of providing their sons with benefices. The nation received the concordate with almost universal disapprobation; voices of the greatest weight were raised against it; and the new ministers saw themselves obliged to withdraw their proposition. The pope was more fortunate in the concordate made with Naples (February 16, 1818) at Terracina, in which stipulations were made for the exclusive establishment of Catholicism in that kingdom; for the independence of the theological seminaries on the secular power; the free disposal of benefices to the value of twelve thousand ducats, in Naples, in favor of Roman subjects; the reversion of ancient places to the church; unlimited liberty of appeal to the papal chair; the abolition of the royal permission, formerly necessary for the pastoral letters of the bishops; the right of censorship over books; besides many other highly important privileges. The king obtained the right to appoint bishops, to tax the clergy, to reduce the number of episcopal sees and monasteries which existed before the time of Murat. The quiet possession of the estates of the church, which had been alienated, was also secured to the proprietors. In the concordate concluded with Bavaria, July 5, 1817, two archbishoprics were established for the two million, four hundred thousand Catholics in Bavaria. Seminaries, moreover, were instituted and provided with lands; the nominations were left with the king, with the reservation of the papal right of confirmation; the limits of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction were precisely settled, and the erection of new monasteries was promised. This concordate was published in May, 1818, together with the new political constitution, by which all apprehensions for the Protestant church in Bavaria were allayed. The other German princes have also formed a plan for a common concordate with the pope.—Hend. Buck.

CONCUBINAGE; the act of living with a woman to whom the man is not legally married. It is also used for a marriage with a woman of inferior condition, (performed with less solemnity than the formal marriage,) and to whom the husband does not convey his rank. As polygamy was sometimes practised by the patriarchs, it was a common thing to see one, two, or many wives in a family; and, besides these, several concubines. 2 Sam. 3: 3, &c. 1 Kings 11: 3. 2 Chron. 11: 21. But ever since the abrogation of polygamy by Jesus Christ, and the reduction of marriage to its primitive institution, concubinage has been forbidden and condemned among Christians.—Hend. Buck.

CONCUPISCENCE. (1.) The corruption of our nature, or inward disposition, whence all actual sin proceeds. Rom. 7: 7. James 1: 14. (2.) Actual motions and inclinations of our hearts towards sinful deeds. Rom. 7: 8. (3.) Unchastity, especially of desire. Col. 3: 5. 1 Thess. 4: 5.—Brown.

CONDEMNATION; a judicial declaration of guilt, accompanied with a sentence of punishment. In this sense, Christ did not condemn the woman taken in adultery, (John 8: 1—10;) that is, he did not assume the office of a judge, though he bid her go and sin no more. The word is used also in reference to rash, uncharitable, unjust opinions, pronounced upon others in a spirit of censoriousness. Luke 6: 37. Also, for a practical testimony against sin, impotence and unbelief, exhibited in a contrary course of conduct. Thus the Ninevites condemned the Jews of our Savior's time, (Matt. 12: 41.) and Noah condemned the world before the flood. Heb. 11: 7. The condemnation of the devil, seems to mean a sin and punishment similar to his. 1 Tim. 3: 6. The condemnation which all the unconverted lie under, and from which all believers in Christ are made free, is primarily a legal charge of iniquities, and the sentence of the divine law adjudging them as guilty to bear the wrath of God, or the execution of his tremendous curse, (unless it be satisfied for them by Christ,) forever and ever. Rom. 5: 16, 18. 8: 1. Gal. 3: 10—14. compared with Matt. 25: 41—46. This legal condemnation is however fearfully enhanced to those who reject the glorious gospel. John 3: 19. 2 Thess. 1: 9. God condemned sin in the flesh of his Son; by executing the punishment due to sin upon him in our nature, submitting to suffer in our stead, he clearly demonstrated how criminal and abominable it is in his sight, provided a full and glorious expiation for its guilt, and adjudged its power in the believer's soul to utter destruction. Rom. 8: 3. See an admirable sermon on this text, in Wayland's Discourses.

CONDER, (JONN, D. D.) an English divine, was born at Wimple in Cambridgeshire, in 1714, and educated among the Dissenters of the Independent persuasion. He entered the ministry in 1738, and was settled over a congregation in Cambridge, where he continued about sixteen years with acceptance and usefulness. His candor, liberality, and gracious endowments made him esteemed beyond the circle of his own persuasion. In 1754, he became a tutor of Homerton academy, designed to prepare others for the ministerial office, which duty he discharged near thirty years. In 1760, he was chosen co-pastor with Mr. Hall to the Meeting on the Pavement, Moorfields, where he continued his valuable labors in the ministry till his death in 1781, at the age of sixty-six. His life was indeed a blessing, and his memory is blessed. To recommend Christ in his person, offices, work, and grace to perishing sinners, was the darling theme of his ministrations; few were more deeply acquainted with the gospel, or could more skillfully divide the word of truth. In his last hours he expressed a steadfast, unshaken confidence in the grace, faithfulness, and love of a covenant God in Christ; an assurance of the truth of that gospel which he had uniformly preached; and a lively hope of a blessed immortality through the mediation and intercession of the great Redeemer. Some months before he was laid aside, he was conversing with a friend on the great importance of evangelical doctrines, and with a peculiar degree of emphasis and affection told him, "he had attained the full assurance of faith; for after searching the Scriptures with the greatest attention and care, he had not a doubt or scruple respecting the truth of any of those grand fundamental doctrines he had preached and lived upon." At another time he said with cheerfulness, "that had he his life to spend over again, he would preach the same gospel, for it was the truth of God; and that he would neither change gospel nor state with any one." On the morning of his death, hearing the bells ringing for Restoration day, he said, "Who knows but it may be my Restoration day?" His published works consist chiefly of sermons.—Middleton.

CONDESCENSION, is that species of benevolence which designedly waves the supposed advantages of birth, title, or station, in order to accommodate ourselves to the state of an inferior, and diminish that restraint which the apparent distance is calculated to produce in him. It is enjoined on the Christian, and is peculiarly ornamental to the Christian character. Rom. 12: 16. The condescension of God appears every way great, when we consider his infinite perfection, his absolute independence of his creatures, his purposes of mercy toward them, and his continual care over them. The incarnation of Christ is, however, the most wonderful example of condescension ever known, and cannot fail to affect in a suitable manner the spirit of every Christian. Phil. 2: 5—11. See the Complete Works of Robert Hall, vol. iii. p. 310.—Head. Buck.

CONDITION; the term of a bargain to be performed. It has been debated whether faith should be called the condition of our salvation. If by it we mean a valuable equivalent for the benefit received, or something to be performed in our own strength, or that will be meritorious, it is certainly inapplicable; but if by it be meant, that it is only a means without which we cannot be saved, in that sense it is not improper. Yet as the term is often made use of improperly by those who are mere legalists, perhaps it would be as well to decline the use of it.—Head. Buck.

CONEY, (shaphan;) Lev. 11: 5. Deut. 14: 7. Psalm 104: 8. and Prov. 30: 26. Bochart and others have supposed the shaphan of the Scriptures to be the jerboa; but Mr. Bruce proves that the ashkoko is intended. This curious animal is found in Ethiopia, and in great numbers on mount Lebanon, &c. Instead of holes, they seem to delight in more airy places, in the mouths of caves, or clefts in the rock. They are gregarious, and frequently several dozens of them sit upon the great stones at the mouths of caves, and warm themselves in the sun, or come out and enjoy the freshness of the summer evening. They do not stand upright upon their feet, but seem to steal along as in fear, their belly being nearly close to the ground; advancing a few steps at a time, and then pausing. They have something very mild, feeble-like, and timid in their deportment; are gentle and easily tamed, though, when roughly handled at the first, they bite very severely. Many are the reasons to believe this to be the animal called shaphan in Hebrew, and erroneously by our translators "the coney," or rabbit. The latter are gregarious indeed, and so far resemble the other, as also in size; but they seek not the same place of retreat; for the rabbit burrows most generally in the sand. Nor is there any thing in the character of rabbits that denotes excellent wisdom, or that they supply the want of strength by any remarkable sagacity. The shaphan, then, is not the rabbit; which last, unless it was brought to him by his ships from Europe, Solomon never saw.

Let us now apply the characters of the ashkoko to the shaphan. "He is above all other animals so much attached to the rocks, that I never once," says Mr. Bruce, "saw him on the ground, or from among large stones in the mouth of caves, where is his constant residence. He lives in families or flocks. He is in Judea, Palestine, and Arabia, and consequently must have been familiar to Solomon. David describes him very pertinently, and joins him to other animals perfectly known: 'The hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the shaphan;' and Solomon says that 'they are exceeding wise,' that they are 'but a feeble folk, yet make their houses in the rocks.'" Now this, I think, very obviously fixes the ashkoko to be the shaphan; for his weakness seems to allude to his feet, and how inadequate these are to dig holes in the rock, where yet, however, he lodges. From their tenderness, these are very liable to be excoriated or hurt; notwithstanding which, they build houses in the rocks more inaccessible than those of the rabbit, and in which they abide in greater safety, not by exertion of strength, for they have it not, but are truly, as Solomon says, "a feeble folk," but by their own sagacity and judgment; and are therefore justly described as wise. Lastly, what leaves the thing without doubt is, that some of the Arabs, particularly Damir, say that the shaphan has no tail, that it is less than a cat, that it lives in houses or nests, which it builds of straw, in contradistinction to the rabbit and the ae rat, and those animals that burrow in the ground.—Watson.

CONFERENCE, the act of discoursing with another in order to treat upon some subject, or to settle some point of dispute. Conference meetings, in a religious sense, are meetings assembled for the purpose of relating experience, discoursing on some religious subject, or for transacting religious business. "Religious conference," says a divine, "is one way of teaching religion. We all have leisure time, and it is well spent when it is employed in set conferences on religion. There the doubting man may open all his suspicions, and confirmed Christians will strengthen his belief; there the fearful may learn to be valiant for the truth; there the liberal may learn to devise liberal things; there the tongue of the stammerer may learn to speak plainly; there Paul will withstand Peter to the face, because he deserves to be blamed; there the gospel may be communicated severally to them of reputation; there, in one word, ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. One hour in a week spent thus, will contribute much to our edification, provided we abstain from the disorders that have often disgraced, and sometimes destroyed, this excellent Christian practice. Time should be kept, order should be preserved, no idle questions should be asked; freedom of inquiry should be nourished; immodest forwardness should be restrained; practical, experimental, and substantial subjects should be examined; Charity, with all its gentle train, should be there, for she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness." (See EXPERIENCE MEETINGS.)—Head. Buck.

CONFERENCE. (HAMPTON COURT;) a meeting of the Puritans and their opponents, appointed by James I. to be held at that place in January, 1604. Archbishop Whitgift, eight bishops, and eight or ten other learned dignitaries, were appointed to defend the cause of conformity, while only Reynolds, Chatterton, and Knewstubs, were allowed to maintain that of the Puritans. James himself was moderator, and his courtiers were the witnesses. Reynolds, who was the principal speaker on the side of the Non-conformists, insisted that certain alterations should be made in the thirty-nine articles; that confirmation should be considered, plurality of benefices disallowed, and preaching ministers every where settled; that the reading of the Apocrypha in public worship, the baptismal interrogation of infants, the sign of the cross in baptism, the sacerdotal vestments, the symbolical ring in marriage, and the churning of women, should be abolished, because they were relics of popery. Bancroft stood forth as the champion of the other party; and the king himself, having no relish for Puritanical notions, and proud of his theological abilities, poured forth his royal dicta, and threatened the Puritans with expatriation if they did not conform.—Head. Buck.

CONFERENCE, (METHODIST.) See METHODIST.

CONFESSION; the open and penitential acknowledgment which a Christian makes of his sins. Among the Jews, it was the custom, on the annual feast of expiation, for the high-priest to make confession of sins to God, in the name of the whole people: besides this general confession, the Jews were enjoined, if their sins were a breach of the first table of the law, to make confession of them to God; but violations of the second table were to be acknowledged to their brethren. Among the modern Jews, some of them scourge themselves at the confession.

Confession, according to Dr. Watts, is the third part of prayer, and includes, 1. A confession of the meanness of our original, our distance from God, our subjection to him, and constant dependence on him. 2. A confession of our sins, both original and actual, in thought, life, omission, and commission. 3. A confession of our desert of punishment, and our unworthiness of mercy. 4. A confession or humble representation of our wants and sorrows of every kind.

Confession also may be considered as a relative duty, or the acknowledgment of any offence we have been guilty of against a fellow-creature.

The confession of sins, says Andrew Fuller, is of the nature of a solemn oath—an oath of abjuration; and it is awful to think that we should ever use it without a desire and determination to forsake it. Prov. 28: 13.—H. Buck.

CONFESSION, (AUBICULAR,) in the Romish and Greek churches, is the disclosure of sins to the priest at the confessional, with a view to obtain absolution from them. The father confessor inquires of the person confessing concerning the circumstances of the sins confessed, and proportions his admonition, and the severity of the penitence which he enjoins, to the degree of the transgression. The person confessing is allowed to conceal no sin of consequence which he remembers to have committed; and the father confessor is bound to perpetual secrecy. The absolution granted has, according to the doctrines of the Catholic and Greek churches, sacramental efficacy. It was pope Leo the Great, in 450, who altered the public confession or profession of repentance by such as had been guilty of scandalous sins, into a secret one before the priest. The fourth Lateran council (can. 21) ordains, "That every one of the faithful, of both sexes, on coming to years of discretion, shall, in private, faithfully confess all their sins, at least once a year, to their own pastor; and fulfil, to the best of their power, the penance enjoined them; receiving reverently, at least at Easter, the sacrament of the eucharist, unless, by the advice of their pastor, for some reasonable cause it be judged proper to abstain for a time; otherwise, they are to be excluded from the church while living, and when they die, to be deprived of Christian burial."

Confession obtains, also, in the Lutheran church, only with this difference, that while the Catholic church requires from the penitent the avowal of his particular and single crimes, the Lutheran requires only a general acknowledgment, leaving it, however, at the option of its members to reveal their particular sins to the confessor, and to relieve the conscience by such an avowal; for which reason, Protestant clergymen, as well as the Catholic priests, are bound to keep, under the seal of secrecy, whatever may be intrusted to them in the confessional. The history, both of nations and individuals, exhibits fearful examples of the abuse of confidence thus reposed in priests. In political affairs, especially, it has been made the means of effecting the basest intrigues, to the ruin of states and the disgrace of religion.—Head. Buck.

CONFESSION OF FAITH; a list of the several articles of the belief of any church. There is some difference between creeds and confessions. Creeds, in their commencement, were simply expressions of faith in a few of the leading and undisputed doctrines of the gospel. Confessions were, on the contrary, the result of many a hazardous and laborious effort, at the dawn of reviving literature, to recover these doctrines, and to separate them from the enormous mass of erroneous and corrupted tenets, which the negligence or ignorance of some, and the artifices of avarice and ambition in others, had conducted to accumulate for the space of a thousand years, under an implicit obedience to the arrogant pretensions of an absolute and infallible authority in the church of Rome. Objections have been formed against all creeds or confessions of faith, on the ground that they infringe Christian liberty, supersede the Scriptures, exclude such as ought not to be excluded, and admit such as ought not to be admitted; are often too particular and long; are liable to be abused; tempt men to hypocrisy; preclude improvement; and have been employed as means of persecution. On the other hand, the advocates for them observe, that all the arts and sciences have been reduced to a system; and why should not the truths of religion, which are of greater importance? That a compendious view of the chief and most necessary points of the Christian religion, which lie scattered up and down in the Scriptures, must be useful to inform the mind, as well also to hold forth to the world what are in general the sentiments of such a particular church or churches; they tend to discover the common friends of the same faith to one another, and to unite them; that the Scriptures seem to authorize and countenance them; such as the moral law, the Lord's prayer, the form of doctrine mentioned by Paul, Rom. 6: 17; and again, "the form of sound words," in 2 Tim. 1: 13, &c.; that their becoming the occasion of hypocrisy is no fault of the articles, but of those who subscribe them; that persecution has been raised more by the turbulent tempers of men, than from the nature of confessions. Some think that all articles and confessions of faith should be expressed in the bare words of Scripture; but it is replied, that this would destroy all exposition and interpretation of Scripture; that it would have a tendency to make the ministry of the word useless; in a great measure cramp all religious conversation; and that the sentiments of one man could not be distinguished from another in some points of importance. The following are the confessions of the different churches:—

1. That of the Greek church, entitled "The Confession of the True and Genuine Faith," which was presented to Mahomet II., in 1453, but which gave place to the "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Greek Church," composed by Mogila, metropolitan of Kiev, in Russia, and approved in 1643, with great solemnity, by the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It contains the standard of the principles of the Russian Greek church.

2. The church of Rome, though she has always received the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian creeds, had no fixed public and authoritative symbol till the council of Trent. A summary of the doctrines contained in the canons of that council is given in the creed published by Pius IV. (1564,) in the form of a bull. It is introduced by the Nicene creed, to which it adds twelve articles, comprising those doctrines which the church of Rome finally adopted after her controversies with the reformers.

3. The Lutherans call their standard books of faith and discipline, "Libri Symbolicæ Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ." They contain the three creeds above mentioned, the Augsburg Confession, the Apology for that confession by Melancthon, the Articles of Smalcald, drawn up by Luther, the Catechisms of Luther, and, in many churches, the Form of Concord, or Book of Torgau. The best edition is that by Titmann, Leipzig, 1817. The Saxon (composed by Melancthon), Württemberg, Suabian, Pomeranian, Mansfieldian, and Copenhagen confessions, agree in general with the symbolical books of the Lutherans, but are of authority only in the countries from which they are respectively called.

4. The confessions of the Calvinistic churches are numerous. The following are the principal. (1.) The Helvetic confessions are three—that of Basle, 1530; the Summary and Confession of the Helvetic Churches, 1536; and the Expositio Simplex, &c., 1566, ascribed to Bullinger. (2.) The Tetrapolitan Confession, 1531, which derives its name from the four cities of Strasburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Liadun, by the deputies of which it was signed, is attributed to Bucer. (3.) The Palatine or Heidelberg Confession, framed by order of the elector palatine, John Casimir, 1575. (4.) The Confession of the Gallic Churches, accepted at the first synod of the Reformed, held at Paris, 1559. (5.) The Confession of the Reformed Churches in Belgium, drawn up in 1559, and approved in 1561. (6.) The Confession of Faith of the Kirk of Scotland, which was that composed by the assembly at Westminster, was received as the standard of the national faith, in 1688. (7.) The Savoy Confession, a declaration of the faith and order of the Independents, agreed upon at a meeting of their elders and messengers at their meeting in the Savoy, 1658. (8.) The Anglican Confession, or Thirty-nine articles of the church of England, agreed on in the convocation held, London, 1552. They were drawn up in Latin; but, in 1571, they were revised, and subscribed both in Latin and English. They were adopted by the Episcopal church, in North America, in 1801, with some alterations, and the rejection of the Athanasian creed.

CONFESSORIAL; a cell in which the confessor sits to hear confessions. It is erected in a church, or chapel, and built of joinery, with a boarded back next the wall, or against a pillar or pier, divided into three niches, or small cells. The centre, which is for the reception of the priest, is closed half way up by a dwarf door, and has a seat within it. There is a small grated aperture in each of the partitions between the priest and the side cells, which are for those who come to confess, and have no doors. The numerous confessorials in St. Peter's at Rome, each with an inscription, setting forth in what language penitents may confess within, show to what an awful extent this traffic in the souls of men is carried.—Hend. Buck.

CONFESSOR; a Christian who has made a solemn and resolute profession of the faith, and has endured torments in its defence. A mere saint is called a confessor, to distinguish him from the roll of dignified saints, such as apostles, martyrs, &c. In ecclesiastical history, the word confessor is sometimes used for martyr; in after-times it was confined to those who, after having been tormented by the tyrants, were permitted to live and die in peace; and at last it was also used for those who, after having lived a good life, died under an opinion of sanctity. According to St. Cyprian, he who presented himself to torture, or even to martyrdom, without being called to it, was not called a confessor, but a professor; and if any out of want of courage abandoned his country, and became a voluntary exile for the sake of the faith, he was called ex terris.

Confessor is also a priest in the Romish church, who has a power to bear sinners in the sacrament of penance, and to give them absolution. The confessors of the kings of France, from the time of Henry IV., have been constantly Jesuits; before him, the Dominicans and Cordeliers shared the office between them. The confessors of the house of Austria have also ordinarily been Dominicans and Cordeliers, but the later emperors have all taken Jesuits.—Hend. Buck.

CONFIRMATION; the act of establishing any thing or person. 1. Divine confirmation is a work of the Spirit of God, strengthening, comforting, and establishing believers in faith and obedience. 1 Pet. 5: 10. 1 Cor. 1: 8. 2. Ecclesiastical confirmation is a rite whereby a person, arrived to years of discretion, undertakes the performance of every part of the baptismal vow made for him by his godfathers and godmothers. It is administered only by bishops, and consists in the imposition of hands on the head of the person confirmed.

In the ancient church it was done immediately after baptism, if the bishop happened to be present at the solemnity. Throughout the East it still accompanies baptism; but the Romanists make it a distinct independent sacrament. Seven years is the stated time for confirmation; however, they are sometimes after that age. The person to be confirmed has a godfather and godmother appointed him as in baptism. In the church of England, the age of the persons to be confirmed is not fixed.—Clarke's Essay on Confirmation; Wood on ditto; Howe's Episcopacy, p. 167, 174; Hend. Buck.

CONFLAGRATION, (GENERAL); a term used to denote that grand period or catastrophe of our world, when the face of nature is to be changed by fire as formerly it was by water.

1. Scripture assures us in general, that this earth in its present form will not be perpetual, but shall come to an end. 2. It further tells us, that this dissolution of the world shall be by a general conflagration, in which all things upon the face of the earth shall be destroyed, by which the atmosphere shall also be sensibly affected, as in such a case it necessarily must be. (2 Pet. 3: 5, 7, 10, 12.) where, from the connection of the words, the opposition between the conflagration and the deluge, as well as the most literal and apparent import of the phrases themselves, it is plain they cannot, as Dr. Hammond strangely supposes, refer to the desolation brought on Judea when destroyed by the Romans, but must refer to the dissolution of the whole earth. 3. The Scripture represents this great burning as a circumstance nearly connected with the day of judgment, (2 Pet. 3: 7, compared with 2 Thess. 1: 7, 8. Heb. 10: 27. 1 Cor. 3: 12, 13;) and it is probable there may be an allusion to this in several passages of the Old Testament, such as Ps. 11: 6. Ps. 50: 3, 96: 3. Isa. 34: 4, 8, 10. Isa. 66: 15. Dan. 7: 9, 10. Mal. 4: 1. Zeph. 3: 8. Dent. 32: 22, to which many parallel expressions might be added, from the canonical and apocryphal books. 4. It is not expressly declared how this burning shall be kindled, nor how it shall end; which has given occasion to various conjectures about it, which see below.

The ancient Pythagoreans, Platonists, Epicureans, and Stoics, appear to have had a notion of the conflagration; though whence they should derive it, unless from the sacred books, is difficult to conceive; except, perhaps, from the Phœnicians, who themselves had it from the Jews. Mention of the conflagration is made in the books of the Sibyls, Sophocles, Hystaspes, Ovid, Lucan, &c. Dr. Burnet, after J. Tachard and others, relates that the Siamese believe that the earth will at last be parched up with heat, the mountains melted down, the earth's whole surface reduced to a level, and then consumed with fire. And the Bramins of Siam do not only hold that the world shall be destroyed by fire, but also that a new earth shall be made out of the cinders of the old.

Divines ordinarily account for the conflagration theologically, and think it will take its rise from a miracle, as a fire from heaven. Philosophers contend for its being produced from natural causes, and will have it effected according to the laws of mechanics. Some think an eruption of the central fire sufficient for the purpose; and add, that this may be occasioned several ways, viz. either by having its intensity increased, which again may be effected either by being driven into less space by the encroachments of the superficial cold, or by an increase of the inflammability of the fuel whereon it is fed; or by having the resistance of the imprisoning earth weakened, which may happen either from the diminution of its matter, by the consumption of its central parts, or by weakening the cohesion of the constituent parts of the mass by the excess of the defect of moisture. Others look for the cause of the conflagration in the atmosphere, and suppose that some of the meteors there engendered in unusual quantities, and exploded with unusual vehemence, from the concurrence of various circumstances, may effect it without seeking any further. Lastly, others have recourse to a still more effectual and flaming machine, and conclude the world is to undergo its conflagration from the near approach of a comet in its return from the sun.

Various opinions are also entertained as to the renovation of the earth after the conflagration. 1. Some suppose that the earth will not be entirely consumed, but that the matter of which it consists will be fixed, purified, and refined, which they say will be the natural consequence of the action of the fire upon it; though it is hard to say what such a purification can do towards fitting it for its intended purpose, for it is certain a mass of crystal or glass would very ill answer the following parts of this hypothesis. 2. They suppose that from these materials thus refined, as from a second chaos, there will by the power of God arise a new creation; and then the face of the earth, and likewise the atmosphere, will then be so restored, as to resemble what it originally was in the paradisaical state; and consequently to render it a more desirable abode for human creatures than it at present is; and they urge for this purpose the following texts, viz. 2 Pet. 3: 13. (compare Isa. 65: 17. 66: 22.) Matt. 19: 28, 29. (compare Mark 10: 29, 30. Luke 18: 29, 30.) Ps. 102: 25, 26. Acts 3: 21. 1 Cor. 7: 31. Rom. 8: 21. 3. They agree in supposing that in this new state of things there will be no sea. Rev. 21: 1.

4. They suppose that the earth, thus beautified and improved, will be inhabited by those who shall inherit the first resurrection, and shall here enjoy a very considerable degree of happiness, though not equal to that which is to succeed the general judgment; which judgment shall, according to them, open when those thousand years are expired, mentioned in Rev. 20: 4, &c. 1 Thess. 4: 17, compare verse 15, which passage is thought by some to contain an insinuation that Paul expected to be alive at the appearance of Christ, which must imply an expectation of being thus raised from the dead before it; but it is answered that the expression, we that are alive, may only signify, "those of us that are so," speaking of all Christians as one body. 1 Cor. 15: 49—52. Dr. Hartley declared it as his opinion, that the millennium will consist of one thousand prophetic years, where each day is a year, i. e. three hundred and sixty thousand; pleading that this is the language used in other parts of the Revelation. But it seems an invincible objection against this hypothesis, which places the millennium after the conflagration, that the saints inhabiting the earth after the first resurrection, are represented as distressed by the invasion of some wicked enemies. Rev. 20: 7—9. Ezek. 38: 39. (See MILLENNIUM.)

Divine revelation, not human philosophy, must here be our only guide. It is probable that the earth will survive its fiery trial, and become the everlasting abode of righteousness, as part of the holy empire of God; but, seeing the language used in Scripture, and especially in the book of Revelation, is often to be considered as figurative rather than literal, it becomes us to be cautious in our conclusions. — Burnet's Theory of the Earth; Whitby on the Millennium; Hartley on Man, vol. ii. p. 400; Fleming on the First Resurrection; Roy's Three Discourses; Whiston's Theory of the Earth; Scott, and Fuller on the Apocalypse; Hend. Buck; and article DISSOLUTION in this work.

CONFORMITY. The saints are conformed to Christ; they are made like him in their covenant relation to God, in their privileges, graces, and holy deportment on earth; and they will be made like him in glory when they shall see him as he is. Rom. 8: 29. They are conformable, or like to him in his death; they gradually die to their corrupt lusts; have their old man crucified with him; its lusts and deeds mortified through the influence of his death, and they are exposed to suffering for his sake. Phil. 3: 10. They ought not to be conformed to this world; ought not to imitate or join in the vain or wicked maxims, customs, and practices thereof. Rom. 12: 2.—Brown.

CONFOUND. He that believeth shall not be confounded; he shall not be disappointed of his expected salvation; shall not, with perplexity or surprise, be exposed to any fearful destruction; nor shall he make haste; shall not basely catch at unlawful means of deliverance, but patiently wait till God deliver him. 1 Pet. 2: 6. Isa. 28: 16. Rom. 9: 33.—Brown.

CONFUCIANS; the disciples of Confucius, (Kung-tsi, or Kung-fut-si,) a celebrated Chinese philosopher, who lived about 500 years before the Christian era. This religion, which is professed by the literati and persons of rank in China and Tonquin, consists in a deep inward veneration for the God or King of heaven, and in the practice of every moral virtue. They have neither temples nor priests, nor any settled form of external worship; every one adores the Supreme Being in the way he likes best.

Confucius, like Socrates, who was nearly his contemporary, did not dive into abstruse notions, but confined himself to speak with the deepest regard of the great Author of all things, whom he represents as the most pure and perfect essence and fountain of all things; to inspire men with greater fear, veneration, gratitude, and love of him; to assert his divine providence over all his creatures; and to represent him as a being of such infinite knowledge, that even our most secret thoughts are not hidden from him; and of such boundless goodness and justice, that he can let no virtue go unrewarded, or vice unpunished.

So highly is Confucius esteemed in China, that there are more than fifteen hundred and sixty temples dedicated to him, and sixty-two thousand animals, (chiefly pigs and rabbits,) immolated annually to his memory. This is asserted by Dr. Milne, on the authority of their own writers.—Chinese Gleaner, p. 255.

Mr. Maurice asserts, that Confucius strictly forbade all images of the Deity, and the deification of dead men; and that, in his dying moments, (like Socrates in this also,) he encouraged his disciples, by predicting that "in the West the Holy One would appear."

The Chinese, however, still honor their deceased ancestors, burn incense before their images, bow themselves before their pictures, and invoke from them all temporal blessings.—Maurice's Ind. Antiq. vol. v. p. 468; Encyc. Brit. in Confucius; Villiams.

CONFUSION OF TONGUES; a memorable event which happened in the one hundred and first year, according to the Hebrew chronology, and the four hundred and first year by the Samaritan, after the flood, at the overthrow of Babel. Gen. 11. Until this period there had been but one common language, which formed a bond of union that prevented the separation of mankind into distinct nations. Writers have differed much as to the nature of this confusion, and the manner in which it was effected. Some think that no new languages were formed; but that this event was accomplished by creating a misunderstanding and variance among the builders, without any immediate influence on their language; and that a distinction is to be made between confounding a language and forming new ones. Others account for this event by the privation of all language, and by supposing that mankind were under a necessity of associating together, and of imposing new names on things by common consent. Some, again, ascribe the confusion to such an indistinct remembrance of the original language which they spoke before, as made them speak it very differently; but the most common opinion is, that God caused the builders actually to forget their former language, and each family to speak a new tongue; whence originated the various languages at present in the world. It is, however, but of little consequence to know precisely how this was effected, as the Scriptures are silent as to the manner of it; and after all that can be said, it is but conjecture still. There are some truths, however, we may learn from this part of sacred writ. 1. It teaches us God's sovereignty and power, by which he can easily blast the greatest attempts of men to aggrandize themselves. Gen. 11: 7, 8. 2. God's justice in punishing those who, in idolizing their own fame, forget him to whom praise is due, ver. 4. 3. God's wisdom in overruling evil for good: for by this confusion he facilitated the dispersion of mankind, in order to execute his own purposes, ver. 8, 9. See Henry and Gill, in loc.; *Stillingfleet's Orig. CONGREGATIONALISTS;* a class of Protestants, who hold that each congregation of Christians meeting in one place, and united by a solemn covenant, is a complete church, with Christ for its only head, and deriving from him the right to choose its own officers, to observe the sacraments, to have public worship, and to discipline its own members. They also hold to the parity of ministers and of churches, and regard as of sacred and binding force, the great principle of the fellowship or communion of churches, by which all whom they regard as true churches of Jesus Christ are bound together by ties similar in their nature and obligation to those which unite to each other the members of a single church. The churches are the source of all power, and councils, and other ecclesiastical bodies, have only a delegated authority, by which they act for and in the name of their constituents; and their decisions have no other force than the moral power which united wisdom and piety give them. Still there are certain public acts of church order and discipline, which, from a regard to custom, and to the great and fundamental principle of the communion of churches, can be performed by councils only, except in cases where it is impossible for a church to avail itself of such assistance.

Thus as to church order and discipline, Congregationalists occupy a middle ground between Episcopalians and Presbyterians on the one hand, and Independents on the other. While the two former of these denominations maintain that judicial and other power belongs either to bishops or to synods, or other ecclesiastical bodies, the Independents do not give the principle of the communion of churches the high importance nor the broad extent that is claimed for it by Congregationalists; nor are there any acts of church order or discipline for the validity of which they consider a council of the churches necessary.

It is a fundamental principle with Congregationalists, that as Christ has purchased Christians with his own blood, so he is the supreme head and lawgiver of the church, which is spoken of as a holy temple of which he is himself the chief corner-stone, and as the apostle says, having in all things the pre-eminence. In the exercise of this power, he has himself, and by those whom he has commissioned, taught that men are not to forsake the assembling themselves together for the worship of God, and that the sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper, with holiness of heart and of life, are incumbent on his followers. Thus has Christ unfolded the distinctive peculiarities of a Christian church, as differing in important respects both from the antediluvian and the ancient Jewish church. The church of Christ then has laws, covenants, principles, and duties, both of officers and private members, given by its supreme head, on the due observance of which its distinctive character and its continuance depends.

Every true church must receive the doctrines of the word of God, and maintain discipline and religions instruction. The Bible is the supreme and only binding code of laws for the government of the church, and no one church has a right to force its own interpretations of Scripture upon another, or to use other than moral means either to advance its own views of truth and duty, or in the discipline of its own members. While we are bound to follow the direction of the Scriptures in all matters of church government where plain and explicit directions are given, yet on those points where they are silent, we are to be guided by the light of human reason. The need of this guidance arises from the fact that the Scriptures have not prescribed to the church a form in all respects fixed and immutable. Hence it is that there are many denominations, who regard each other as Christians, each having its own peculiar constitution and creed founded, it is claimed, on scriptural authority, and binding its own members.

It is a fundamental principle with Congregationalists, that it is the birthright of all men, by a vote of the majority of the community of which they are members, to govern themselves under God, both in politics and religion, and that they possess an equal authority with others to think and decide for themselves in these matters. Thus, with the Bible for their only code of laws, with a clergy who know no gradation of ranks, and who are chosen by, and are dependent on the people, with whom they have a common interest, with Christ for their only head, and the church the only executive of his laws, while they embrace in the wide extent of their fellowship and communion all denominations, whom they believe to be true Christians; they thus foster a catholic spirit, and lay broad and deep the foundations of civil and religious liberty and toleration. Thus too they effectually guard against priestcraft and spiritual domination, and against that unholy union of church and state, which in ages past has proved the bane of civil liberty, and the most deadly curse of religion. It was from the influence of principles like these that the Puritans extorted from Hume the eulogy, that in Great Britain they had kindled and preserved the precious spark of liberty, and that the English owe to them the whole freedom of their constitution.

The prominence which was given to the Bible as being the great text-book of both civil and religious rights, led in New England to the early establishment of colleges, whose great and avowed object was to train up those who should explain and enforce the truths of the Bible, that men might thus not only become true Christians, but also intelligent and enlightened citizens. Their leaders, both civil and religious, being chosen by themselves, they regarded only as their "servants for good," and acknowledging no superior but God, they feared only him, and cherished a high and devoted love of freedom. These principles of their religious system have given birth and vigor to the republican habits and republican virtue and intelligence of the sons of New England.*

The importance that was attached to religious knowledge, and other motives growing out of their system of faith, led the first settlers of New England to commence their system of common schools, in which all the people might attain an education. This was many years before the system of free schools in Scotland had their origin, and was the first experiment of the kind on earth.

In the year 1602, a dissenting church was formed in the north of England, which had for one of its pastors the Rev. John Robinson. This church was driven by persecution to Holland, in 1608, where Mr. Robinson soon followed them. He is regarded as the father of Congregationalism, and the principles which he established in his church at Leyden are the same, in substance, as still prevail in New England. Some of these principles were held by the early Puritans, and were acted upon by the Independents in England as early as 1580. But as there were other and distinctive principles at which they did not arrive, they are not considered as Congregationalists. The younger members of Mr. Robinson's church were the first settlers of New England, where they landed in 1620.

One reason why Congregationalists have been commended with Independents, is found partly in the following statement made by Mr. Robinson in his "Apology;"—"Every particular society is a complete church; and as far as regards other churches, immediately and independently under Christ alone." He here only means to assert that no church, or body of churches, has any right to control or force the opinions of another church by means of pains and penalties. He does not deny the right of using such influence as may arise from knowledge and piety, nor does he oppose the fundamental principle of the communion of churches, from which arise duties of one church to another as binding and as strictly defined, as those which members of the same church owe to each other. These duties cannot be performed where the principle on which they rest is not admitted. The following summary of them is abridged from the Cambridge Platform, adopted in 1648, and from the acts of the synod at Boston in 1662. 1. Hearty care and prayer one for another. 2. By way of relief in case of want, either temporal or spiritual. 3. By giving an account one to another of their public actions when it is orderly desired, and in upholding each other, in inflicting censure and other acts of church government. 4. Seeking and giving help to each other in case of divisions, contentions, difficult questions, errors and scandals, and also in the ordination, translation, and deposition of ministers. 5. Giving aid to another church in cases of error, scandal, &c., even though they should so far neglect their duty as not to seek such aid. 6. Admonishing one another when there is need and cause for it, and after due means with patience used, withdrawing from a church or peccant party therein, which obstinately persists in error or scandal. These rules are carried into effect by means of either temporary or standing councils of the churches.

* Several years before the American revolution, there was near the house of Mr. Jefferson, in Virginia, a church which was governed on Congregational principles, and whose monthly meetings he often attended. Being asked how he was pleased with their church government, he replied that it had struck him with great force, and interested him very much; that he considered it the only form of pure democracy that then existed in the world, and had concluded that it would be the best plan of government for the American colonies.

The Pilgrims had been harassed by prelacy on one side, and independency on the other, and strove to avoid the evils of both. Hence the Cambridge Platform takes the ground that the church before the law was in families; that under the law it was national, and since the coming of Christ only Congregational; and adds, "The term Independent we approve not." Increase Mather, who knew well the usages of the churches, says, "That the churches of New England have been originally Congregational is known to every one. Their platform does expressly disclaim the name of Independent." Samuel Mather says, "The churches of New England are Congregational. They do not approve the name of Independent, and are abhorrent from such principles of independency as would keep them from giving an account of their matters to members of neighboring churches, regularly demanding it of them." In speaking of those who would not act on the principle of the communion of churches, he says that "they" (the Congregationalists) "think it will not be safe or prudent for any Christian to commit his soul to the direction and conduct of such an independent church." It were easy to multiply quotations on this point were it necessary, but enough have been adduced.

The doctrinal articles of the Congregational churches, if we except the Unitarians, have been in general those of Calvin, modified to some extent by the views of Hopkins, Emmons, and other writers. Still they admit to their communion and fellowship all those churches which require evidence of Christian character as essential to church membership. The Westminster and Savoy confessions of faith, and the thirty-nine articles of the church of England, have been repeatedly approved by synods and councils in New England, as in general agreeable to the word of God; but the Bible is the only standard by which to test heresy. The churches are not bound by any one creed; but each church makes its own, and alters it at pleasure. Other churches can admonish, and if they see fit withdraw fellowship where any of the essential doctrines of the gospel have been renounced. All that synods and councils have done has been to set forth the prevailing belief of the churches at the time when they were held.

Congregationalists in general hold that the word church in the New Testament, is applied either to the whole Christian community, or to a single congregation, and that it is used in no other sense. But some maintain that the whole body of Christians residing in a particular city or vicinity were but one church, though far too numerous to meet in a single place of worship. Hence they derive the propriety of regarding a number of contiguous churches, when consecrated, as in certain respects but one body, and the removal of a cause from a particular church to a consociation, as a reference from a part to the whole, rather than an appeal from a lower to a higher tribunal. The common opinion however is, that a single church is the highest judicial or executive tribunal known in the Scriptures, and that councils of all kinds are merely human devices. Their decisions are considered merely advisory, having no force except as they are sanctioned and carried into effect by the churches. The only seeming exception to this remark is in the consociations in Connecticut, and it has been questioned whether they have any farther power than that of being the final council in any disputed case. Still the Saybrook Platform holds that any church which does not regard the decisions of a consociation shall be considered guilty of contempt, and that an act of non-communication shall be declared. But the question whether the churches will withhold communion, and thus sustain the decision of the consociation, is left to their own judgment and choice, though in ninety-nine cases in one hundred, the decisions of councils are final, and fully sustained by the churches.

It is held that where the whole body of believers in any province or country are mentioned in the New Testament, they are spoken of not as the church, but as the churches of that country, and that a church is often spoken of as meeting in one place not only for worship, but for the choice of officers and other business. In accordance with this, the following literal translation is given to Acts 14: 23, "They appointed elders or ministers in every church by the lifting up of hands."

As to the churches after the time of the apostles, the learned Dr. Owen asserts and defends the following proposition: That in no approved writer for the space of two hundred years after Christ, is there any mention of any other organical or visibly professing church, but that only which is parochial or congregational." It is held that the epistles of Clement and Polycarp contain statements which cannot be reconciled with any other views than those which have been given above. Mosheim says, "All the churches of those primitive times, until near the end of the second century, were independent bodies, none of them subject to the jurisdiction of any other. Each church was a little independent republic, governed by its own laws, which were enacted, or at least sanctioned by the people. For though the churches founded by the apostles were often consulted in different cases, yet they had no judicial authority, no control, no power of giving laws. On the contrary, it is clear as the noon day, that all Christian churches had equal rights, and were in all respects on a footing of equality. The meeting at Jerusalem, as given in the book of Acts, was only a conference of a single church. The councils of delegates of the churches to consult for the common good, were first held near the close of the second century. This custom arose in Greece, and was an imitation of the political councils which had long been known there."

Synods in New England are those larger bodies of delegates of the churches which assemble for making platforms or other matters of general interest. The synod of Newtown, in 1637, condemned eighty-two erroneous opinions which had been disseminated in New England. Councils are smaller bodies, and act on objects of less interest. Consociations, such as exist in Connecticut, are standing councils. There is in each county one or more of these bodies, composed of the ministers and lay delegates of such churches as see fit to unite for the objects proposed. In cases of great importance, two or three adjoining consociations may unite and act together, or a temporary council, without regard to local limits, may be called for the occasion. A majority of the ministers, and enough of the lay delegates to make a majority of the whole council, is necessary in order to a valid decision. Most of the Congregational churches in Connecticut are consociated. So also are those in Rhode Island, and some in Vermont and in the state of New York.

Associations are composed of ministers only, who meet for their own benefit, and to consult for the good of the churches. They examine and license candidates for the ministry, but have no power of making laws for the churches. Some maintain that on the general principle that a man is to be tried by his peers, a minister is accountable in the first case only to the association of which he is a member, so that until he is deposed by them, or by the consociation, before which they bring him for trial, he is not amenable to the church of which he is a member. Others hold that a church has a right to try its minister in the same way that it would one of its private members. The principle laid down in the platforms is that in the discipline of ministers, there is to be a council of churches where it may be had; but where this cannot be, the church may proceed to act. In Connecticut, a church cannot arraign a minister before a consociation, until the association have first decided whether there is sufficient cause for a trial.

Associations have been held from the first settlement of New England, and as early as 1690 had spread throughout the country. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, have state or general associations, and Vermont a general convention, composed of delegates from the district associations. In Massachusetts, some of the minor associations are not connected with the general association. In the state of Maine, and in the eastern part of Massachusetts, conferences of churches exist. This organization was commenced in Maine soon after the separation of that state from Massachusetts in 1820. Conferences are composed of the pastors and one or more delegates from the churches within a convenient district, meeting at stated times, to promote a mutual acquaintance with the state of the churches represented, and consult and adopt measures for the promotion of their prosperity, having no legislative or judicial power. In Maine, the district conferences are united, by a clerical and lay representation, in a general conference, meeting annually, and corresponding in its design and methods of proceeding to the general associations of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and the general convention of Vermont.

In the year 1690, certain articles of union, called "Heads of Agreement," were adopted by the Presbyterians and Congregationalists of London and the vicinity, by which, waving points of difference in church organization, they agreed to act together on all matters, of common interest. This union was effected mainly by the influence of Increase Mather, president of Harvard college, who was then on a visit to England. Recently, however, they have separated, though perfect harmony of feeling exists between them. These heads of agreement have been sanctioned in New England, and contain the distinctive features of Congregationalism.

The declaration of faith and order, as presented at the meeting of the Congregational union in London, May, 1832, enjoins the duty of communion with all churches whose faith and godliness is undoubted, but denies to any church or union of churches, the right of calling to an account or disciplining another church, otherwise than to separate from such as in faith or practice depart from the gospel of Christ. It does not appear that the Congregationalists of Great Britain have any organized church polity and government like what exists in New England. Indeed, they differ but slightly from the most rigid Independents, and are commonly ranked with them under the same name. (See INDEPENDENTS.)

In the year 1791, a plan was adopted by the general assembly of the Presbyterian church and the general association of Connecticut, by which Presbyterians and Congregationalists, in the new settlements of the western states, were effectually amalgamated. This plan places the two classes on equal terms in union churches, securing to each a mode of discipline corresponding to their principles, and gives to the members of the standing committee of Congregational churches the same standing and powers in presbyteries and synods, as belong to the ruling elders of the Presbyterians. Four hundred of these union churches have been planted in the western states, by the Congregationalists in Connecticut alone.

A work entitled, "The Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and power thereof," by the Rev. John Cotton, of Boston, had been the principal directory in ecclesiastical affairs next to the Bible, prior to the adoption of the Cambridge platform, in 1648. This platform was in force throughout New England, until it was superseded in Connecticut by the Saybrook platform, in 1708. They both contain the confessions of faith, and the rules of order and discipline of the churches of New England, and also sanction and approve of the Westminster and Savoy confessions of faith. If we except Connecticut, there is throughout New England much practical neglect of some of the fundamental principles laid down in these formulas.

In Massachusetts, about one hundred and fifty churches have become Unitarian, while in Connecticut there is but one minister of that faith, and but few in the other New England states. This change in Massachusetts has been mainly attributed to the operation of what is called the "half-way covenant," and to the neglect of congregational usage, as to watching over and disciplining churches. Owing to the fact, that in early times church membership was necessary in order to become a voter, or eligible to office, there was a strong desire on the part of men not pious to enter the church. Hence an act was passed by the synod of Boston, in 1663, which recognised all baptized persons as members of the church, and their children were entitled to baptism. Still they made no profession of their faith in Christ, and did not partake of the Lord's supper. This is what is called the "half-way covenant." (See HALF-WAY COVENANT.) Thus many who were not pious were introduced into the churches, and the pure and spiritual character of these bodies being lost, many of them have never recovered from the shock thus given them; though the "half-way covenant" has long since become a dead letter, and the Trinitarian churches have all returned to their old principle of admitting to their communion only such as give evidence of piety.

"The Jews of old, (says Cotton Mather,) held that less than ten men of leisure could not form a congregation." Tertullian says, "Where there are three there is a church, although they are laity," but as seven is the least number, by which the rule of church discipline, in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, can be reduced to practice, and for other reasons, that number has been held necessary to form a church state; but usually there is a larger number expected. Thus, in the formation of the church at New Haven, and also at other places, seven men were selected, who were called the seven pillars, and these being united by solemn covenant, they admitted others to their communion afterwards. A consociation, or a council, of the neighboring churches is called when a church is to be organized, who first proceed to examine into the religious character of those who propose thus to unite, and the reasons which exist for taking such a step. They then examine the confession of faith which they purpose to adopt, and if satisfied on these points, they organize the church with appropriate public religious exercises. A solemn covenant, to which the members assent, and by which they bind themselves to perform the duties which they owe to God and to their brethren, is considered essential to the existence of a church. The authority for this is derived from both the Old and New Testament, and also from the practice of the primitive churches as recorded by Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Pliny.

Officers are not considered as essential to the existence of a church, but as necessary to its completeness and prosperity. By the early writers of New England, and by the Cambridge platform, the officers of the church were pastors and teachers, whose duties were distinct; ruling elders, like those of the Presbyterians; and deacons, who looked to the temporal interests of the church, and provided for the poor. For all these officers they claimed the sanction of divine authority. The duty of the pastor was "to attend to exhortation, and therein to administer a word of wisdom; and of the teacher to attend to doctrine, and therein to administer a word of knowledge." Both might administer the sacraments, and execute the censures of the church. Many of the first churches of New England, though small and poor, supported two able ministers. The first ten towns in Connecticut enjoyed the constant labors of ten ministers, making an average of one minister to fifty families, or to two hundred and sixty or seventy souls. The offices of pastor and teacher are now united, and that of ruling elder for the most part dropped.

Efforts were made at an early period, by Eliot and others, to christianize the Indians, and in 1700, there were in

New England thirty Indian churches under the pastoral care of the same number of Indian preachers.

Licentiates are those who have received a commission to preach, but have not been ordained or set apart by the imposition of hands and other ceremonies. Evangelists are those who have been ordained, and hence have power to administer the sacraments, but are not put over any particular church.

Missionaries to the heathen and those who go as pastors to remote and isolated churches, are ordained before they are sent forth. Ministers who have been previously ordained, are installed when they are placed over a church. In this ceremony there is no imposition of hands.

Churches are by law corporate bodies; and, in the call of a minister to become their pastor, they act separately from and generally prior to the society, or parish, which embraces both the church and those who worship with them. The call of the church, however, is not valid unless the parish assents to it. The contract of settlement is made wholly between the parish and minister, and is obligatory on them only. In the dismissal of a minister, the church is expected to call a council for that purpose, and by the dissolution of his connexion with the church, his connexion with the parish ceases also. If the church refuse to call a council, and the parish are dissatisfied, they can vote not to pay the minister, when he can bring his claims before a court of justice, who may decide whether he has been guilty of such immorality, or neglect of pastoral duties, as to amount to a violation of the contract.

The Congregationalists have founded in New England eight colleges, two theological seminaries, and a large number of high schools and academies. Besides this, they have contributed liberally to establish similar institutions in other parts of the United States.

In commencing and carrying forward the various benevolent operations of the present day, the Congregationalists of New England have had a leading and prominent agency.

The first ministers who came to New England were men of learning and piety. Most of them had been educated in the English universities, and they had been fully tried in the school of adversity. Fifteen of them had received episcopal ordination, and a number had held benefices in England. "Many of the clergy (says Trumbull) had good estates, and assisted their poor brethren and parishioners. The clergy possessed a very great proportion of the literature of the colony. They were the principal instructors of those who received an education for public life. For many years they were consulted by the legislature, in all affairs of importance, civil or religious. They were appointed committees with the governors and magistrates, to assist them in the most delicate concerns of the commonwealth." They were often sent on messages of importance to the government of Great Britain. As the churches were republics, the people were led to conform their civil institutions to the same model. The clergy taught their hearers to reject with abhorrence the divine right of kings, passive obedience and non-resistance, and to hold that all civil power is originally with the people. Says an able writer, "The pulpit has always been in this land an engine of immense power. The people are thinly scattered over a large extent of country, and accustomed to meet only on the Sabbath. This strong resource in favor of the American revolution was early seen and faithfully applied. As a body of men, the clergy were pre-eminent in their attachment to liberty. The pulpits of the land rang with the notes of freedom. The tongues of the hoary-headed servants of Jesus were eloquent upon the all-inspiring theme, while the youthful soldier of the cross girded on the whole armor of his country, and fought with weapons that were carnal." They preached and published sermons to excite the people, and not a few of them left for a time their parishes, to be chaplains in the army.

The most distinguished writers among the Congregational divines of New England, are John Cotton, Increase and Cotton Mather, Thomas Hooker, the two Edwardses, father and son; the former, president of Princeton, and the latter, of Union college; Hopkins, Trumbull, Bellamy, Smalley and Dwight. To these might be added a list of living authors who are exerting a great and important influence on the theology and morals of this and other nations.

There are now nine hundred and forty-three Trinitarian Congregational ministers in New England. A number also of those who are born and educated there, go abroad every year, and are settled in other parts of the United States, or sent as missionaries to foreign countries.

In twenty-seven years from the first settlement of New England, forty-three churches were formed; and in an equal number of succeeding years, eighty churches more rose into existence. The present number is one thousand and fifty-nine, exclusive of from one to two hundred Unitarian churches. The number of communicants is about one hundred and twenty thousand. Congregational churches also exist in other parts of the United States, and in connexion with missionary stations in various parts of the heathen world.

The denomination styled Congregational are Pedo-baptists. The Baptist churches are in their government Congregational, but with some modifications of the system as presented in this article, approaching Independency.

CONONITES; the followers of Conon, bishop of Tarsus, in the sixth century. He was a Trinitarian, and even a Tritheist, carrying too far the distinct personality. But his peculiar tenet was a scholastic distinction. Pbiloponus, his contemporary, (an Alexandrian philosopher and grammarian,) taught, that the form, as well as matter of all bodies, was subject to corruption. Conon, on the contrary, taught, that the body never lost its essential form; that its matter alone was subject to corruption and decay, and was to be restored when this mortal shall put on immortality. Such was the ingenuity of these times in multiplying sects and parties!—Mosheim's E. H. vol. ii. p. 150; Williams.

CONQUERORS. In all their tribulations the saints are more than conquerors through Christ; by his grace and presence they overcome them most certainly, easily and quickly; they patiently bear them, rejoice in them, and gain much advantage by them. Rom. 8: 37.—Brown.

CONSCIENCE; the moral sense, or that capacity of our mental constitution, by which we irresistibly feel the difference between right and wrong. As South observes, it implies a double or joint knowledge, namely, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action. Conscience is the crowning faculty in man. Its peculiar office is to arbitrate and direct all our other powers and propensities, according to the will of God; and there is a certain feeling of internal violence and disorder when it dictates in this capacity are not obeyed. Its legitimate business is to prescribe that man shall be as he ought, and do as he ought. And its existence within us is an evidence for the righteousness of God, which keeps its ground amid all the disorders and aberrations to which human nature is liable. For as the existence of a regulator in a disordered watch shows the design of its maker that its movements should harmonize with time; so conscience shows the design of our Creator that all our movements should harmonize with truth and righteousness.

The rules of conscience. We must distinguish between a rule that of itself and immediately binds the conscience, and a rule that is occasionally of use to direct and satisfy the conscience. Now, in the first sense, the will of God is the only rule immediately binding the conscience. No one has authority over the conscience but God. All penal laws, therefore, in matters of mere conscience, or things that do not evidently affect the civil state, are certainly unlawful; yet, secondly, the commands of superiors, not only natural parents, but civil, as magistrates or masters, and every man's private engagements, are rules of conscience in things indifferent. 3. The examples of wise and good men may become rules of conscience; but here it must be observed, that no example or judgment is of any authority against law; where the law is doubtful, and even where there is no doubt, the side of example cannot be taken till inquiry has been first made concerning what the law directs.

Conscience has been considered as, 1. Natural, or that common principle which instructs men of all countries and religions in the duties to which they are all alike obliged. There seems to be something of this in the minds of all men. Even in the darkest regions of the earth, and among the rudest tribes of men, a distinction has ever been made between just and unjust, a duty and a crime.

2. A right conscience is that which decides aright, or according to the only rule of rectitude, the law of God. This is also called a well-informed conscience, which in all its decisions proceeds upon the most evident principles of truth.

3. A probable conscience is that which, in cases which admit of the brightest and fullest light, contents itself with bare probabilities. The consciences of many are of no higher character; and though we must not say a man cannot be saved with such a conscience, yet such a conscience is not so perfect as it might be.

4. An ignorant conscience is that which may declare right, but, as it were, by chance, and without any just ground to build on.

5. An erroneous conscience is a conscience mistaken in its rule or standard of judgment.

6. A doubting conscience is a conscience unresolved about the nature of action; on account of the equal or nearly equal probabilities which appear for, and against each side of the question.

7. Of an evil conscience there are several kinds. Conscience, in regard to actions in general, is evil when it has lost more or less the sense it ought to have of the natural distinctions of moral good and evil: this is a polluted or defiled conscience. Conscience is evil in itself when it gives either none or a false testimony as to past actions; when reflecting upon wickedness it feels no pain, it is evil, and said to be seared or hardened. 1 Tim. 4: 2. It is also evil when, during the commission of sin, it lies quiet. In regard to future actions, conscience is evil if it does not startle at the proposal of sin, or consents at the commission of it.

For the right management of conscience, we should, 1. Endeavor to obtain acquaintance with the law of God, and with our own motives, tempers and lives, and frequently compare them together.

2. Furnish conscience with general principles of the most extensive nature and strongest influence; such as the supreme love of God; love to our neighbors as ourselves; and that the care of our souls is of the greatest importance.

3. Preserve the purity and sensibility of conscience.

4. Maintain the freedom of conscience, particularly against interest, passion, temper, example, and the authority of great names.

5. We should accustom ourselves to cool reflection on our past actions. See DuRley's Analogy and Sermons; Stewart and Mackintosh on Moral Philosophy; Tillotson's Sermons; South's Sermons, vol. 1, serm. 12; Abercrombie on the Moral Feelings; Chalmers's Bridgewater Treatise on the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man; and books under CASUALTY.—Hend. Buck.

CONSCIOUSNESS, the perception of what passes in a man's own mind. We must not confound the terms consciousness and conscience; for though the Latin be ignorant of any such distinction, including both in the word conscientia, yet there is a great deal of difference between them in our language. Consciousness is confined to the actions of the mind, being nothing else but that knowledge of itself which is inseparable from every thought and voluntary motion of the soul. Conscience extends to all human actions, bodily as well as mental. Consciousness is the knowledge of the existence; conscience, of the moral nature of actions. Consciousness is a province of metaphysics; conscience, of morality.—Hend. Buck.

CONSECRATION, a devoting or setting apart any thing to the worship or service of God. The Mosaic law ordained that all the first-born, both of man and beast, should be sanctified or consecrated to God. The whole race of Abraham was in a peculiar manner consecrated to his worship; and the tribe of Levi and family of Aaron were more immediately consecrated to the service of God. Exod. 13: 2, 12, 15. Num. 3: 12. 1 Pet. 2: 9. Besides the consecrations ordained by the sovereign authority of God, there were others which depended on the will of men, and were either to continue forever or for a time only. David and Solomon devoted the Nethinims to the service of the temple forever. Ezra 8: 20. 2: 58. Hannah, the mother of Samuel, offered her son to the Lord, to serve all his lifetime in the tabernacle. 1 Sam. 1: 11. Luke 1: 15. The Hebrews sometimes devoted their fields and cattle to the Lord, and the spoils taken in war. Lev. 27: 28, 29. 1 Chron. 18: 11. The New Testament furnishes us with instances of consecration. Christians in general are consecrated to the Lord, and are a holy race, a chosen people. 1 Pet. 2: 9. Ministers of the gospel are in a peculiar manner set apart for his service, and so are places of worship; the forms of dedication varying according to the views of different bodies of Christians; and by some a series of ceremonies has been introduced, savoring of superstition, or at best of Judaism.—Watson.

CONSIDER. God considers men, in general, by a perfect knowledge and exact observation of their works. Ps. 33: 15. He considers his people, in graciously observing and regarding their persons, prayers, and troubles, in order to deliver and bless them. Ps. 5: 1. 13: 3. 9: 13, and 25: 19. We consider Jesus Christ by thinking on, observing, and admiring his person, offices, relations, undertaking, incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and glory, and applying him to ourselves in all these respects. Heb. 3: 1. We consider ourselves when, with serious concern, and earnest care, we mark and ponder our own frailty, sinfulness, and danger of being led astray. Gal. 6: 1. We consider one another when we charitably observe our brethren's tempers, circumstances, infirmities, and temptations, that we may accordingly excite and encourage them to their duty. Heb. 10: 24.—Brown.

CONSISTENTES; a kind of penitents, who were allowed to assist at prayers, but who could not be admitted to receive the sacrament.—Hend. Buck.

CONSISTORY; a word commonly used for a council-house of ecclesiastical persons, or place of justice in the spiritual court; a session or assembly of prelates. Every archbishop and bishop of every diocese has a consistory court, held before his chancellor or commissary, in his cathedral church, or other convenient place of his diocese, for ecclesiastical causes. The bishop's chancellor is the judge of this court, supposed to be skilled in the civil and canon law; and in places of the diocese far remote from the bishop's consistory, the bishop appoints a commissary to judge in all causes within a certain district, and a register to enter his decrees, &c. Consistory at Rome, denotes the college of cardinals, or the pope's senate and council, before whom judiciary causes are pleaded, and all political affairs of importance, the election of bishops, archbishops, &c. are transacted. There is the ordinary consistory, which the pope assembles every week in the papal palace, and the extraordinary, or secret consistories, called together on special and important occasions. Consistory is also used among the Lutherans for a council or assembly of ministers and lawyers to regulate their affairs, discipline, &c. They are the highest Protestant ecclesiastical bodies on the continent.—Hend. Buck.

CONSOLATION. The great work of God the Holy Ghost is consolation; and it is most blessed to the souls of the truly regenerate, in whose hearts the Lord graciously carries it on by his inward spiritual refreshments, to watch and observe how the tendencies of his grace are made towards them. "He takes of the things of Christ, and showeth to them." And he it is that sheds abroad the love of God the Father in the heart, and directs the minds of his people into "the patient waiting" for Jesus Christ. So that all the acting of our faith upon either of the persons of the Godhead are from his sweet influences; and all the manifestations the holy and sacred Persons make to the believer, it is God the Holy Ghost teacheth the soul how to receive and enjoy. And "in this continual process of grace, he doth what the apostle prayed he might do for the church, as "the God of hope, fill the soul with all joy and peace in believing, that they might abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost." Rom. 15: 13.—Hawker.

CONSTANCE, (COUNCIL OF;) 1414—1418. The German emperor, the pope, twenty princes, one hundred and forty counts, more than twenty cardinals, seven patriarchs, twenty archbishops, ninety-one bishops, six hundred other clerical dignitaries, and about four thousand priests were present at this celebrated ecclesiastical assembly, which was occasioned by the divisions and contests that had arisen about the affairs of the church. From 1305—77, the popes had resided at Avignon; but in 1378, Gregory XI. removed the papal seat back to Rome; after his death, the French and Italian cardinals could not agree upon a successor, and so each party chose its own candidate. This led to a schism which lasted forty years. Indeed, when the emperor Sigismund ascended the throne, in 1411, there were three popes, each of whom had anathematized the two others. To put an end to these disorders, and to stop the diffusion of the doctrines of Huss, Sigismund went in person to Italy, France, Spain, and England, and (as the emperor Maximilian I. used to say, in jest, performing the part of the beadle of the Roman empire,) summoned a general council. The pretended heresies of Wickliffe and Huss were here condemned, and the latter, notwithstanding the assurances of safety given him by the emperor, was burnt, July 6, 1415; and his friend and companion, Jerome of Prague, met with the same fate, May 30, 1416. The three popes were formally deposed, and Martin V. was legally chosen to the chair of St. Peter; but instead of furthering the emperor's wishes for a reformation in the affairs of the church, he thwarted his plans, and nothing was done till the council of Basle, which see.—Hend. Buck.

CONSTANCY, in a general sense, denotes immutability, or invariableness. When applied to the human mind, it is a steady adherence to those plans and resolutions which have been maturely formed: the effect of which is, that a man never drops a good design out of fear, and is consistent with himself in all his words and actions.

Constancy is more particularly required of us, 1. In our devotions. Luke 18: 1. 1 Thess. 5: 17, 18. 2. Under our sufferings. Matt. 5: 12, 13. 1 Pet. 4: 12, 13. 3. In our profession and character. Heb. 10: 23. 4. In our beneficence. Gal. 6: 9. 5. In our friendships. Prov. 27: 10.—Hend. Buck.

CONSTANTINE, (surnamed the Great,) son of the emperor Constantine Chlorus and of his wife Helena, was born A. D. 274. On the death of his father, he was chosen emperor by the soldiery in 306. Galerius, however, would not allow him the title of Augustus, and gave him that of Cæsar only; but having taken possession of the countries which had been subject to his father, viz. Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and overcome the Franks, he turned his arms against Maxentius, vanquished his army under the walls of Rome, and was declared by the senate Augustus and Pontifex Maximus. It was in this campaign in Italy that he is said to have seen a flaming cross in the heavens, beneath the sun, bearing this inscription: In hoc signo vinces, i. e. "By this sign thou shalt conquer;" and on the same authority it is stated that Christ himself appeared to him the following night, and ordered him to take for his standard an imitation of the fiery cross which he had seen. He accordingly caused a standard to be made in this form, which was called the labarum. In 313, he published the memorable edict of toleration in favor of the Christians. By this, every one was allowed to embrace the religion most agreeable to his own mode of thinking, and all the property that had been taken from the Christians during the persecutions was restored to them. They were also made eligible to public offices. This edict has accordingly been regarded as marking the triumph of the cross, and the downfall of paganism.

Having defeated Licinius, who showed a mortal hatred to the Christians, Constantine became sole head of the Eastern and Western empires, in 325; the year noted for the œcumenical council which he convened at Nice, in Bithynia, and which he attended in person, for the purpose of settling the Arian controversy. Towards the close of his life, he favored the Arians, to which he was induced by Eusebius, of Nicomedia, in consequence of which he banished many orthodox bishops. Though he professed Christianity, he was not baptized till he fell sick in 337, in which year he died in the vicinity of Nicomedia, after a reign of thirty-one years.

Whatever may have been the true character of Constantine's conversion to the Christian faith, its consequences were of vast importance both to the empire and to the church of Christ. It opened the way for the unobstructed propagation of the gospel to a wider extent than at any former period of its history. All impediments to an open profession of Christianity were removed, and it became the established religion of the empire. Numerous, however, in various points of view, as were the advantages accruing to it from this change, it soon began to suffer from being brought into close contact with the fostering influence of secular power. The simplicity of the gospel was corrupted; pompous rites and ceremonies were introduced; worldly honors and emoluments were conferred on the teachers of Christianity; and the kingdom of Christ in a great measure converted into a kingdom of this world.—Hend. Buck.

CONSTANTINE, (called also Sylvanus;) an eminent reformer and martyr of the seventh century, and the founder of the sect of Paulicians. He was born in Mananalis, an obscure town in the vicinity of Samosata. His conversion is thus related: A Christian deacon, who had been a prisoner among the Mahometans, about the year 660, returning from Syria, was entertained by Constantine. From this stranger, Constantine received the precious gift of the New Testament in its original language, which even at this early age was so concealed from the people, that Peter Siculus, to whom we owe most of our information on the history of the Paulicians, tells us the first scruples of a Catholic, when he was advised to read the Bible, was, "It is not lawful for us, profane persons, to read those sacred writings, but for the priests only." Indeed, the gross ignorance which pervaded Europe at that time, rendered the generality of the people incapable of reading that or any other book; but even those who could read were dissuaded by their religious guides. Constantine, however, made the best use of his present: he studied the New Testament with unwearied assiduity, and more particularly the writings of the apostle Paul, from which he endeavored to deduce the system of doctrine and worship divinely revealed. "He investigated the creed of primitive Christianity," says Gibbon, "and whatever might be the success, a Protestant reader will applaud the spirit of the inquiry." The knowledge thus attained, Constantine gladly communicated to others around him. A Christian church was collected. Several individuals rose among them qualified for the work of the ministry, new churches were formed, and Christianity, in its primitive simplicity and power, was widely diffused through Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia. (See PAULICIANS.)

Constantine, who had assumed or received the name of Sylvanus, was at length seized at Colonia by the arm of persecution. By a refinement of cruelty, he was placed before a line of his disciples, who were commanded, as the price of their own pardon and the proof of their repentance, to massacre their spiritual father. They turned aside from the impious office; the stones dropped from their filial hands, and of the whole number only one man, named Justus, could be found base enough to become his executioner. Thus, after the evangelical labors of twenty-seven years, this venerable leader of the Paulician churches fell a martyr to the truth of the gospel.—Jones's His. Chris. Church, p. 239.

CONSTANTINOPLE, the metropolis of the extensive empire of European Turkey, is situated at the confluence of the Bosphorus with the sea of Marmora, and stands on the site of the ancient Byzantium. Constantine, sensible of the great advantages of its position, fixed his residence here in 330, in preference to Rome. It became afterwards the capital of the Greek empire, and was in the meridian of its glory in the time of the crusades. The whole circuit of the city is about twelve miles. Its external appearance is magnificent; palaces, mosques, seraglios, domes, turrets, and spires, tower one above another. The magic of the prospect, however, disappears on entering the city, for the streets are narrow and crooked, and the houses small, and built of wood, brick, and mud. The number of mosques here has been stated at more than three hundred, many of which are composed of marble and covered with lead, serving to create a greater contrast to the wretched appearance of the streets and inhabitants. The grand mosque of St. Sophia, a view of which is here presented, is the most renowned of the public buildings. It was formerly a Greek church, dedicated to the Holy Wisdom, or Sancta Sophia, and was built by the emperor Justinian. The plague has frequently committed great ravages in Constantinople, and the germs of the malady will remain there as long as the carelessness and fanaticism of the people continue. The Turks commonly designate Constantinople by the name of Stamboul, or Istantboul, which is a Romaine appellation, signifying "the City."

CONSTELLATION; a cluster of stars. About three thousand visible stars are classed into fifty-nine constellations, twelve of which are in the zodiac, or middle region of the firmament, twenty-three in the north part, and twenty-four in the south. Isa. 13: 10.—Brown.

CONSTITUTION; in the Roman church, a decree of the pope in matters of doctrine. In France, however, this name has been applied, by way of eminence, to the famous bull Unigenitus: which see.—Hend. Buck.

CONSTITUTIONS, APOSTOLIC. (See APOSTOLIC.)

CONSUBSTANTIALISTS. This term was applied to the orthodox, or Athanasians, who believed the Son to be of the same substance with the Father; whereas the Arians would only admit the Son to be of like substance with the Father.—Watson.

CONSUBSTANTIATION; a tenet of the Lutheran church respecting the presence of Christ in the Lord's supper. Luther denied that the elements were changed after consecration, and therefore taught that the bread and wine indeed remain; but that together with them, there is present the substance of the body of Christ, which is literally received by communicants. As in red-hot iron it may be said, two distinct substances, iron and fire, are united, so is the body of Christ joined with the bread. Some of his followers, who acknowledged that similes prove nothing, contented themselves with saying that the body and blood of Christ are really present in the sacrament in an inexplicable manner. (See LORD'S SUPPER.)—Watson.

CONTEMN. A vile person is rightly contemned when we shun intimacy with him, and prefer the meanest of the saints to him. Ps. 15: 4. The glory of Moab was contemned when their wealth, power, and honor were rendered despicable. Isa. 16: 14.—Brown.

CONTEMPLATION; studious thought on any subject; continued attention. "Monks and mystics consider contemplation as the highest degree of moral excellence; and with them a silent spectator is a divine man;" but it is evident we are not placed here only to think. There is something to be done as well as to contemplate. There are duties to be performed, offices to be discharged; and if we wish to be happy in ourselves, and useful to others, we must be active as well as thoughtful.—Baxter's Saint's Rest; Natural History of Enthusiasm; Hend. Buck.

CONTENTION, is either sinful, when, with carnal affections, we strive with one another, (Prov. 13: 10;) or lawful, when we eagerly promote that which is good, notwithstanding great opposition. 1 Thes. 2: 2. We contend earnestly for the faith when, notwithstanding manifold suffering and danger, we are strong in the faith of God's truth contained in his word; zealously profess and practise it, and excite others to do so, and exert ourselves to promote the censure of scandalous and heretical persons. Jude 3.—Brown.

CONTENTMENT, is a disposition of mind in which our desires are confined to what we enjoy without murmuring at our lot, or wishing ardently for more. It stands opposed to envy, (James 3: 16;) to avarice, (Job. 13: 5;) to pride and ambition, (Prov. 13: 10;) to anxiety of mind, (Matt. 6: 25, 34;) to murmurings and repinings. 1 Cor. 10: 10. Contentment does not imply unconcern about our welfare, or that we should not have a sense of any thing uneasy or distressing; nor does it give any countenance to idleness, or prevent diligent endeavors to improve our circumstances. It implies, however, that our desires of worldly good be moderate; that we do not indulge unnecessary care, or use unlawful efforts to better ourselves; but that we acquiesce with, and make the best of our condition, whatever it be. Contentment arises not from a man's outward condition, but from his inward disposition, and is the genuine offspring of humility, attended with a fixed habitual sense of God's particular providence, the recollection of past mercies, and a just estimate of the true nature of all earthly things. Motives to contentment arise from the consideration of the rectitude of the divine government, (Ps. 97: 1, 2;) the benignity of the divine providence, (Ps. 145;) the greatness of the divine promises, (2 Pet. 1: 4;) our own unworthiness, (Ge. 32: 10;) the punishments we deserve, (Lam. 3: 39, 40;) the reward which contentment itself brings with it, (1 Tim. 6: 6;) the speedy termination of all our troubles here, and the prospect of eternal felicity in a future state, Rom. 5: 2. See Barrow's Works, vol. iii. ser. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9; Burrows on Contentment; Watson's Art of ditto; Hale's Contentment, p. 59; Mason's Christian Morals, vol. i. ser. 2; Dwight's Theology, ser. cxxix.—Hend. Buck.

CONTINENCY, is that moral virtue by which we restrain concupiscence. There is this distinction between chastity and continence.—Chastity requires no effort, because it may result from constitution; whereas continency appears to be the consequence of a victory gained over ourselves. The term is most usually applied to men, as chastity is to women. (See CHASTITY.)—Hend. Buck.

CONTINGENT; any thing that happens without a foreknown cause, commonly called accidental. An event not come to pass is said to be contingent, which either may or may not be; what is already done, is said to have been contingent, if it might or might not have been. What is contingent or casual to us, is not so with God. As effects stand related to a second cause, they are many times contingent; but as they stand related to the first cause, they are acts of God's counsel, and directed by his wisdom.—Hend. Buck.

CONTRADICTION. The contradiction of sinners, which Christ endured, was the entire series of objections, evasions, reproaches, taunts, blasphemies, and political opposition to his doctrines and miracles. Heb. 12: 3.—Brown.

CONTRARY. Grace and corruption in the saints are contrary; their nature, quality, and exercise are destructive of one another. Gal. 5: 17. We walk contrary to God, doing what is abominable to his nature, and opposite to his law; and he walks contrary to us, in fearfully punishing us for our sin. Lev. 26: 27, 28. The ceremonial law was contrary to men; it laid heavy burdens on them, presented their guilt to them, and of itself could do them no good, and was a means of excluding the Gentiles from the church of God. Col. 2: 14.—Brown.

CONTRITE. This word signifies beaten or brused, as with hard blows, or a heavy burden; and so in Scripture language imports one whose heart is broken and wounded for sin, in opposition to the heart of stone. Is. 66: 2. Ps. 51: 17. 57: 15.

The evidences of a broken and contrite spirit are, 1. Deep conviction of the evil of sin.—2. Humiliation under a sense of it. Job 43: 5, 6.—3. Pungent sorrow for it. Zech. 12: 10.—4. Ingenuous confession of it. 1 John 1: 9.—5. Prayer for deliverance from it. Ps. 140. Luke 18: 13.—6. Susceptibility of good impressions. Ezek. 11: 19.—Hend. Buck.

CONTROVERSY, (RELIGIOUS,) is good or evil, according to the principles which it upholds, the purpose in which it originates, the object to which it is applied, and the temper with which it is conducted. If it spring from a mere spirit of contention; from desire of victory, not love of truth; or from stubbornness that will not be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, Christianity will not acknowledge it for her own. If it be employed on questions unbefitting human disputation; questions inaccessible to our finite understandings, unnecessary or unimportant in their issue, and only tending to perpetuate strife, or to unsettle the minds of men, then it is also unworthy of the Christian character. Nor is it void of offence, when, however sound in its principles, however important its subject, however irrefragable its argument, it is made the vehicle of personal malignity; when it is carried on with a spirit that rends asunder the social ties, and exasperates, instead of endeavoring to soften, the irritable feelings, which, even in its mildest aspect, it is but too apt to excite.

But these evil consequences, which flow from the abuse of controversy, and from causes by no means necessarily connected with religious discussion, ought not to deter us from its proper use, when truth requires its aid. Controversy is worse than useless if it have no better end in view than a display of mental superiority, or the self-gratification which, to minds of a certain cast, it appears to afford. For, as in secular disputes it is the legitimate end of warfare, to produce peace, so, in religious polemics, the attainment of unanimity ought to be the main object. War is waged, because peace cannot be obtained without it. Religious controversy is maintained, because agreement in the truth is not otherwise to be effected. When this necessity is laid upon us, we do but acquit ourselves of an indispensable duty in defending the charge committed to our care by the use of those weapons with which the armory of the divine word supplies us. See Van Mildert's Bampton Lect.; Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. p. 52, and 447.—Hend. Buck.

CONVENT. (See ABBEY; MONASTERY; MONK.)

CONVENTICLE; a private assembly, or meeting for religious purposes. The word is a diminutive of convent, denoting properly a cabal, or secret assembly of a part of the monks of a convent, to make a party in the election of an abbot. The name was first given as an application of reproach to the religious assemblies in the time of Wickliffe, and was afterwards applied to the illegal meetings of the Non-conformists. In some of the preceding reigns, several statutes were made for the suppression of conventicles; but by 1st William and Mary, it is ordained that dissenters may assemble for the performance of religious worship, provided their doors be not locked, barred, or bolted. The word, in strict propriety, denoting an unlawful assembly, cannot be justly applied to the assembling of persons in places certified, or licensed according to law.—Hend. Buck.

CONVERSATION. Conversation was held by the Orientals in the gate of the city. Accordingly, there was an open space near the gate, which was fitted up with seats for the accommodation of the people, Gen. 19: 1; Psalm 69: 12. Those who were at leisure occupied a position on these seats, and either amused themselves with witnessing those who came in and went out, and with any trifling occurrences that might offer themselves to their notice, or attended to the judicial trials, which were commonly investigated at public places of this kind, namely the gate of the city, (Gen. 19: 1; 31: 20; Psalm 26: 4, 5; 69: 12; 127: 5. Ruth 4: 11; Isa. 14: 31;) or held intercourse by conversation. Promenading, so fashionable and so agreeable in colder latitudes, was wearisome and unpleasant in the warm climates of the East, and this is probably one reason why the inhabitants of those climates preferred holding intercourse with one another, while sitting near the gate of the city, or beneath the shade of the fig-tree and the vine, 1 Sam. 22: 6; Micah 4: 8. The formula of assent in conversation was, Thou hast said, or, Thou hast rightly said. We are informed by the traveller Aryda, that this is the prevailing mode of a person's expressing his assent or affirmation to this day, in the vicinity of mount Lebanon, especially where he does not wish to assert any thing in express terms. This explains the answer of the Savior to the high-priest Caiaphas in Matt. 26: 64, when he was asked whether he was the Christ, the Son of God, and replied, Thou hast said.

The English word conversation has now a more restricted sense than formerly; and it is to be noted that in several passages of our translation of the Bible, it is used to comprehend our whole conduct.

When do modern Christians converse as did holy men of old, and especially as in the primitive times of the gospel, on the glorious works, wisdom and ways of God; on the love of the Savior; the privileges of the saints; the affecting vicissitudes of Christian experience; the state, progress, decay, or revival of religion; the diffusion of the gospel; and the fulness of its promises and blessings? Why do they not more habitually and freely interchange their sentiments on all that concerns the Christian's heavenly warfare, and is connected with his present and eternal destination? The reason is, they do not cultivate heavenly mindedness as they ought: they do not walk humbly and closely with God. It is in secret meditation and prayer, those graces are to be nourished which enrich the soul, which shed a holy radiance on the character, and open the lips in instruction, edification, and comfort. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth good things. In the society of such, conversation is found an eminent means of grace.—Chris. Obs.; Watson.

CONVERSION; a change which consists in the renovation of the heart and life, or a turning from the power of sin and Satan unto God, (Acts 26: 18,) and is produced by the influence of divine grace on the soul. Sometimes it is put for restoration, as in the case of Peter, Luke 22: 32. The instrumental cause of conversion is usually the ministry of the word; though sometimes it is produced by reading, by serious and appropriate conversation, sanctified afflictions, &c. "Conversion," says the great Charlock, "is to be distinguished from regeneration thus:—Regeneration is a spiritual change; conversion is a spiritual motion: in regeneration there is a power conferred; conversion is the exercise of this power; in regeneration there is given us a principle to turn; conversion is our actual turning. In the covenant, God's putting his Spirit into us is distinguished from our walking in his statutes from the first step we take in the way of God, and is set down as the cause of our motion, Ezek. 36: 27. In renewing us, God gives us a power; in converting us, he excites that power. Men are naturally dead, and have a stone upon them: regeneration is a rolling away the stone from the heart, and a raising to newness of life; and then conversion is as natural to a regenerate man as motion is to a lively body. A principle of activity will produce action. In regeneration, man is wholly passive; in conversion, he is active. The first reviving us is wholly the act of God, without any concurrence of the creature; but after we are revived, we do actively and voluntarily live in his sight. Regeneration is the motion of God in the creature; conversion is the motion of the creature to God, by virtue of that first principle: from this principle all the acts of believing, repenting, mortifying, quickening, do spring. In all these a man is active; in the other he is merely passive." Conversion evidences itself by ardent love to God, (Psalm 73: 25;) delight in his people, (John 13: 35;) attendance on his ordinances, (Psalm 27: 4;) confidence in his promises, (Psalm 9: 10;) abhorrence of self, and renunciation of the world, (Job 43: 5, Jam. 4: 4;) submission to his authority, and uniform obedience to his word, Matt. 7: 20. See CALLING, REGENERATION.—Hend. Buck.

CONVERT; a person who is converted. In a monastic sense, converts are lay friars, or brothers admitted for the service of the house, without orders, and not allowed to sing in the choir.—Hend. Buck.

CONVICTION, in general, is the assurance of the truth of any proposition. In a religious sense, it is the first degree of repentance, and implies an affecting sense that we are guilty before God; that we can do nothing of ourselves to gain his forfeited favor; that we deserve and are exposed to the wrath of God; that sin is very odious and hateful, yea, the greatest of evils.

There is a natural and just conviction which arises from natural conscience, fear of punishment, moral suasion, or alarming providences, but which is not of a permanent nature. Saving conviction is a work of the Spirit, as the cause; though the conscience, the law, the gospel, or affliction, may be the means, John 16: 8, 9.

Convictions of sin differ very much in their degree and pungency, in different persons. It has been observed that those who suffer the most agonizing sensations are such as never before enjoyed the external call of the gospel, or were favored with the tuition of religious parents, but have neglected or notoriously abused the means of grace. To these, conviction is often sudden, and produces that horror and shame which are not soon overcome; whereas those who have sat under the gospel from their infancy, have not often such alarming convictions, because they have already some notion of these things, and have so much acquaintance with the gospel as administrators to a believing heart, immediate comfort. As it is not, therefore, the constant method of the Spirit to convince in one way, it is improper for any to distress themselves because they are not, or have not been tormented almost to despair: they should be rather thankful that the Spirit of God has dealt tenderly with them, and opened to them the genuine source of consolation in Christ. It is necessary, however, to observe, that, in order to repentance and conversion to God, there must be real and lasting conviction, which, though it may not be the same in degree, is the same in nature.

Evangelical conviction differs from legal conviction thus: legal arises from a consideration of the divine law, God's justice, power, or omniscience; evangelical, from God's goodness and holiness as seen in the cross of Christ, and from a disaffection to sin; legal conviction still conceits there is something remaining good; but evangelical is sensible there is no good at all: legal wishes freedom from pain; evangelical from sin: legal hardens the heart; evangelical softens it; legal is only temporary; evangelical lasting.—Hend. Buck.

CONVOCAATION; an assembly of persons for the worship of God. Lev. 23. Numb. 28. Exod. 22: 16. An assembly of the clergy for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical.

As the parliament in England consists of two distinct houses, so does this convocation. The one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other, the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies. The inferior clergy are represented by their proctors, consisting of all the deans and archdeacons; of one proctor for every chapter, and two for the clergy, of every diocese—in all, one hundred and forty-three divines, viz. twenty-two deans, fifty-three archdeacons, twenty-four prebendaries, and forty-four proctors of the diocesan clergy. The lower house chooses its prolocutor, who is to take care that the members attend, to collect their debates and votes, and to carry their resolutions to the upper house. The convocation is summoned by the king's writ, directed to the archbishop of each province, requiring him to summon all bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. The power of the convocation is limited by a statute of Henry VIII. They are not to make any canons, or ecclesiastical laws, without the king's license; nor, when permitted, can they put them in execution but under several restrictions. They have the examining and censuring all heretical and schismatical books and persons, &c.; but there lies an appeal to the king in chancery, or to his delegates. The clergy in convocation, and their servants, have the same privileges as members of parliament. In 1665, the convocation of the clergy gave up the privilege of taxing themselves to the house of commons, in consideration of their being allowed to vote at the election of members for that house. Since that period, they have been seldom allowed to do any business; and are generally prorogued from time to time till dissolved, a new convocation being generally called along with a new parliament.—Hend. Buck.

CONVULSIONISTS; a term originally applied to such persons as were the subjects of convulsive fits, of which they were said to be cured by visiting the tomb of the Abbé Paris, a celebrated zealot among the Jansenists; and afterwards given to those in France whose fanaticism or imposture caused them to work themselves up into the strangest agitations and convulsions, during which they received wonderful visions and revelations, and abandoned themselves to the most extravagant antics that ever were exhibited by idiot or madman. They threw themselves into the most violent contortions of body, rolled about on the ground, imitated birds, beasts, and fishes, and at last when they had completely spent themselves, went off in a swoon. The greater number were of the female sex, who, like the dervishes, spun themselves round on one heel, and frequently presented themselves to the spectators in very indecent attitudes. Pinault, an advocate, who belonged to the Convulsionists, maintained that God had sent him a peculiar kind of fits by which to humble his pride. During these fits, he always barked like a dog. Though it is now more than a century since these disgusting scenes first came into notice in France, they have more or less continued till the present time. It is seldom, indeed, that they have been exhibited in Paris since the middle of the last century; but in country places, such as Forez, Pontoise, &c., they occasionally occur, when the cunning priests know how to make them tell on the credulity of the vulgar, and thus render them subservient to the interests of Roman superstition.—Hend. Buck.

COOK, (JOSEPH,) a minister of the gospel in South Carolina, was born of pious parents in the city of Bath, England, and called by divine grace at an early age under the ministry of the celebrated Whitefield. Being introduced by him to lady Huntingdon, and giving clear evidence both of a sound conversion and ministerial gifts, he was placed in her college at Trevecla in South Wales. Here he was highly esteemed, and his progress in study, as well as usefulness in preaching, was uncommonly great. In 1771, he was sent to Margate in company with Mr. Aldrich, and afterwards to Dover, where his ministry was blessed in a signal manner. Two years after, he was one among others who offered themselves for a mission in North America, and was accepted. On arriving in the southern colonies, he commenced his labors as an itinerant, but soon after settled at Dorchester, eighteen miles from Charleston. In 1776, he embraced the sentiments of the Baptists, and was baptized at Santee, and a few days afterwards ordained, and settled over the Baptist church at Euhaw. During the war he lost all his property. After its conclusion, he labored a number of years with much success, and fell a victim to his self-denying exertions, in September, 1790. Mr. Cook's mental powers were good and improved by education; his conversation was free and engaging; his preaching zealous, orthodox, and experimental. His talents were of the persuasive kind, so that at the end of his sermons he frequently left his audience in tears. He was greatly endeared to his people, from whom he was taken in the midst of his rising eminence and usefulness, at the age of forty. His end was peace. When informed, a short time before his death, that the Lord's supper would be administered to his people the next Sabbath, he replied, "Next Sabbath, while you are feasting below, I shall be at the banquet above."—Benedict's History of the Baptists, vol. ii. 250.

COOPER, (WILLIAM,) a minister of Boston, Mass. was a native of that city. Being early impressed by the truths of religion, and delighting in the study of the Scriptures, he passed through the temptations of youth without a blemish upon his character. Soon after he graduated at Harvard university, the eminence of his qualifications as a minister attracted the attention of the church in Brattle street, Boston, and he was invited to be colleague pastor with Mr. Colman. At his own request, his ordination was delayed for a year until May 23, 1716, when he was inducted into the sacred office. From this period to that of his death, his ministerial gifts, graces, and usefulness seemed constantly to increase, and the more he was known, the more he was esteemed, loved, and honored. In the year 1737, he was chosen president of Harvard college; but he declined the honorable trust. He died December 13, 1743, aged 49.

He was an eminent instrument and promoter of the great revival of religion, which occurred towards the close of his life. With a heart overflowing with joy he declared, that "since the year 1740, more people had sometimes come to him in concern about their souls in one week, than in the preceding twenty-four years of his ministry." To these applicants he was a most judicious and affectionate counsellor and guide. In the private walks of life he displayed the combined excellencies of the gentleman and Christian. He had but little warning of the approach of death; but in the lucid intervals of his disease he was enabled to declare, that he rejoiced in God his Savior. He published a number of sermons.—Colman's Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, ii. 537—549; Collec. Hist. Soc. x. 187; Eliot; Allen.

COOPER, (SAMUEL, D. D.) minister in Boston, son of the preceding, was born March 28, 1725. He exhibited early marks of genius. His mind was deeply impressed by religious truth. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1743, and devoted himself to the study of divinity. At the age of twenty years he was invited by the congregation in Brattle street, Boston, to succeed his father as colleague with Dr. Colman. In this office, he was ordained May 21, 1746, thirty years after the ordination of his father. He did not disappoint the hopes of his friends. His reputation increased, and he soon became one of the most popular preachers in the country. After a ministry of thirty-seven years, he died of the apoplexy, December 29, 1783, aged fifty-eight.

Dr. Cooper was very distinguished in the sacred office. His sermons were evangelical and perspicuous, and unequalled in America for elegance and taste. Delivering them with energy and pathos, his eloquence arrested attention and warmed the heart. In his prayers, which were uttered with humility and reverence, there was a grateful variety; and, as they were pertinent, scriptural, and animated with the spirit of devotion, they were admirably calculated to raise the souls of his fellow worshippers to God. His presence in the chambers of the sick was peculiarly acceptable, for he knew how to address the conscience without offence, to impart instruction, to soothe, and to comfort. His attention was not confined to theology; but he made himself acquainted with other branches of science, and was one of the most finished classical scholars of his day. His friendship to literature induced him, after the destruction of the library of Harvard college by fire, to exert himself to procure subscriptions to repair the loss. In 1767, he was elected a member of the corporation, in which office he continued until his death. He was an active member of the society for propagating the gospel among the aborigines of America. Most sincerely attached to the cause of civil and religious liberty, he was among the first of those patriots, who took a decided part in opposition to the arbitrary exactions of Great Britain. He was one of the foremost in laying the foundation of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and was chosen its first vice-president in the year 1780. In his last illness he informed his friends, that he was perfectly resigned to the will of heaven; that his hopes and consolations sprang from a firm belief of those truths, which he had preached to others; and that he wished not to be detained any longer from that state of perfection and felicity, which the gospel had opened to his view.

Besides his political writings, which appeared in the journals of the day, he published many discourses.—Clarke's Funeral Sermon; American Herald, January 19, 1784; Continental Journal, January 22; Holmes; Thatcher's Cent. Disc; Eliot; Allen.

COOS; an island in the Grecian Archipelago, at a short distance from the south-west point of Lesser Asia, 1 Mac. 15: 23. Paul passed it in his voyage to Jerusalem, Acts 24: 1. It is now called Stancora or Lango. It is thought by some to be the same as the Hebrew Koa, called by the Greeks Coon, and Coos. The Coan vests, which probably were not unlike our gauzes, or transparent muslins, are alluded to by Horace and Tibullus.—Calmet.

COPINISTS; a sort of Universaldists, who are said to have denied the resurrection of the body.—Williams.

COPOLÆ; (undertakers, grave-diggers, &c.) an order of persons instituted in the fourth century, to see to the decent burial of the dead; and thence entitled partly to the same privileges as the clergy.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

COPONIUS; the first governor of Judea, established by Augustus, after the banishment of Archelanus to Vienna, in France.—Calmet.

COPPER, (Heb. nehesh.) Anciently, copper was employed for all the purposes for which we now use iron. Arms, and tools for husbandry and the mechanic arts, were all of this metal for many ages. Job speaks of bows of copper, (Job 20: 24;) and when the Philistines had Samson in their power, they bound him with fetters of copper. Our translators indeed say "brass;" but under that article their mistake is pointed out. In Ezra 8: 27, are mentioned "two vessels of copper, precious as gold." The Septuagint renders it skewē chalkou ilontos; the Vulgate and Castello, following the Arabic, "vasa aris fulgentis;" and the Syriac, "vases of Corinthian brass." It is more probable, however, that this brass was not from Corinth, but a metal from Persia or India, which Aristotle describes in these terms: "It is said that there is in India a brass so shining, so pure, so free from tarnish, that its color differs nothing from that of gold. It is even said that among the vessels of Darius there were some respecting which the sense of smelling might determine whether they were gold or brass." Bochart is of opinion that this is the chasmal of Ezekiel 1: 27, the chalkolithanon, of Rev. 1: 15, and the electrum of the ancients.

Mr. Harmer quotes from the manuscript notes of Sir John Chardin a reference to a mixed metal in the East, and highly esteemed there; and suggests that this composition might have been as old as the time of Ezra, and be brought from those more remote countries into Persia, where these two basins were given to be conveyed to Jerusalem. Ezekiel (27: 13,) speaks of the merchants of Javan, Jubal, and Meshech, as bringing vessels of nehesh (copper) to the markets of Tyre. According to Bochart and Michaelis, these were people situated towards mount Caucasus, where copper mines are worked at this day. (See BRASS.)—Watson.

COPTI, or COPTS; a name given to the natives of Egypt belonging to the Jacobite or Monophysite sect, and is a term of Arab formation, manifestly a corruption of the Greek Agyptos. The Jacobites, who were of pure Egyptian blood, and far more numerous than their adversaries, the Melkites (Greeks in faith as well as in origin,) having been persecuted as heretics by the Greek emperor, were willing to submit to the arms of Amru-bn-el-âas, the Arabian commander, who granted to them immunities which they had not previously possessed, and protected their church from the encroachments of the Constantinopolitan see. But the Copts soon found that their privileges would be of little avail under oppressive or fanatical princes. Their wealth, numbers, and respectability rapidly declined; and, though rarely intermarrying with their conquerors, and preserving their features, manners, and religion unaltered, they soon lost their language, which had resisted the influence of a Grecian court for so many ages. Though studied and used as a learned language till the present time, it appears to have been little or at all spoken as early as the tenth century.

In person and features, the Copts differ much from the other natives of Egypt, and are evidently a distinct race—an intermediate link in the chain which connects the negro with the fairer tribes to the north and south of the tropics, strongly resembling the Abyssinians, who, though extremely dark, are much paler than the genuine negroes. Dark eyes, aquiline noses, and curled hair, are the usual characteristics of both nations; and the mummies which have been examined, show the resemblance of the modern Copts to their ancestors. At the highest calculation, they do not at present amount to more than between four hundred thousand and five hundred thousand souls. They have good capacities, and generally have the Turkish taxes, finances, &c., in their hands.

The Copts have a patriarch, who resides at Cairo; but he takes his title from Alexandria. He has no archbishop under him, but eleven or twelve bishops. The rest of the clergy, whether secular or regular, are composed of the orders of St. Anthony, St. Paul, St. Macarius, who have each their monasteries. Besides the orders of priests, deacons, and subdeacons, the Copts have likewise archimandrites, or abbots, the dignity whereof they confer with all the prayers and ceremonies of a strict ordination. By a custom of six hundred years' standing, if a priest elected bishop be not already archimandrite, that dignity must be conferred on him before episcopal ordination. The second person among the clergy, after the patriarch, is the titular patriarch of Jerusalem, who also resides at Cairo. To him belongs the government of the Coptic church during the vacancy of the patriarchal see. To be elected patriarch, it is necessary the person have lived all his life in continence. To be elected bishop, the person must be in the celibate; or, if he have been married, it must not be above once. The priests and inferior ministers are allowed to be married before ordination; but not forced to it, as some have observed. They have a great number of deacons, and even confer the dignity frequently on their children. None but the lowest rank among the people commence ecclesiastics, whence arises that excessive ignorance found among them; yet the respect of the laity towards the clergy is very extraordinary. The monastic life is in great esteem among them: to be admitted into it, there is always required the consent of the bishop. The religious Copts, it is said, make a vow of perpetual chastity; renounce the world, and live with great austerity in deserts; they are obliged to sleep in their clothes and their girdle, on a mat stretched on the ground; and to prostrate themselves every evening one hundred and fifty times with their face and breast on the ground. They are all, both men and women, of the lowest class of the people, and live on alms. The nunneries are properly hospitals, and few enter but widows reduced to beggary.—Hend. Buck.

COPTIC VERSION. (See BIBLE VERSIONS.)

COR, or CROMER; a measure equal to ten ephahs, or seventeen thousand four hundred and sixty-eight solid inches, which is forty-four solid inches more than the English quarter. Ezek. 45: 14.—Brown.

CORAL; (ramuth, Job 28: 18; Ezekiel 17: 16;) a hard, cretaceous, marine production, resembling in figure the with most of the oriental renderings: and I see no reason to deviate from it."—Watson.

CORBAN; a gift, a present made to God, or to his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or by gifts offered to God, Matt. 23: 18. Theophrastus says, that the Tyrians forbade the use of such oaths as were peculiar to foreigners, and particularly of corban; which, Josephus informs us, was used only by the Jews. Our Savior reproaches the Jews with cruelty towards their parents, in making a corban of what should have been appropriated to their use. Matthew expresses this reply from children to their parents: "It is a gift—whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me," i. e. I have already devoted to God that which you request of me. Is not the idea to this effect: "that succor which you request of me is already devoted to God; therefore I cannot profane it by giving it to you, although you are my parent, and such might be my duty?"—Now, this might take place in particular articles, without the child's whole property being so devoted; or it might be a pretence to put off the soliciting parent for the time. This the Jewish doctors esteemed binding; yet easily remitted. The form of the vow is in express terms mentioned in the Talmud; and though such a vow is against both nature and reason, yet the Pharisees, and the Talmudists, their successors, approve it. To facilitate the practice of these vows, so contrary to natural duty, to charity and religion, to confirm and increase the superstition of their people, the Jewish doctors did not require them to be pronounced in a formal manner; it was of little consequence whether the word corban were mentioned, though this was most in use, provided something was said which came near it. They permitted even debtors to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God; as if the property were their own, and not rather the right of their creditor.—Calmet.

CORD. To put cords about one's reins, to gird one's self with a cord, was a token of sorrow and humiliation, Job 12: 18. 1 Kings 20: 31, 32. "The cords of sin," (Prov. 5: 22,) are the consequences of crimes and bad habits: bad habits are, as it were, indissoluble bands, from which it is almost impossible to extricate ourselves. To stretch a line or cord about a city, signifies, to ruin it, to destroy it entirely, to level it with the ground, Lam. 2: 8. The cords extended in setting up tents furnish several metaphors, Isa. 33: 20. Jer. 10: 20.—Calmet.

CORDELIER; a Franciscan, or religious of the order of St. Francis. The denomination Cordelier is said to have been given in the war of St. Lewis against the infidels, wherein the friars minor having repulsed the barbarians, and that king having inquired their name, it was answered, they were people cordeliez, "tied with ropes;" alluding to the girdle of rope or cord, tied with three knots, which they wore as part of their habit.—Hend. Buck.

CORDICOLES, or CORDIA-LATRAS; a society of Catholic devotees, who professed to worship "the sacred heart of Jesus, and the heart of Mary," his virgin mother. M. Grégoire (in his "Histoire des Sectes Religieuses") has written what he calls "an Historical Critique" on this sect, which is full of blunders. M. de Fumel, a French bishop, however, published two volumes in twelves, on "Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus," which was followed by several other works in French and Italian on the same subject, about the middle of the last century; and the sect spread, as might be expected, into Naples, Sardinia, and Spain, notwithstanding several checks from the ecclesiastical authorities, and from the more sober and intelligent divines of the Catholic communion.—Grégoire's History, tome i. pp. 333—370;—Williams.

CORIANDER; (Exod. 16: 31; Numbers 11: 7;) a strongly aromatic plant. It bears a small round seed, of a very agreeable smell and taste. The manna might be compared to the coriander seed in respect to its form or shape, as it was to bdellium in its color. (See MANNA.)—Watson.

CORINTH; a renowned city, the capital of Achaia, situated on the isthmus which separates the Peloponnesus from Attica. This city was one of the most populous and stem of a plant, divided into branches. It is of different colors,—black, white, and red. The latter is the sort emphatically called coral, as being the most valuable, and usually made into ornaments. This, though no gem, is ranked by the author of the book of Job (28: 18,) with the onyx and sapphire. Dr. Good observes, "It is by no means certain what the words here rendered 'corals and pearls,' and those immediately afterwards rendered 'rubies and topaz,' really signified. Reiske has given up the inquiry as either hopeless or useless; and Schultens has generally introduced the Hebrew words themselves, and left the reader of the translation to determine as he may. Our common version is, in the main, concurrent wealthy of all Greece. Being destroyed by L. Mummius, B. C. 146, for its insolence to the Roman legates, it was rebuilt by Julius Cæsar, and restored to its ancient splendor. Situated about the middle of the isthmus, at the distance of about sixty stadia from the sea, on either side, it drew the commerce of both the East and West from all parts. The surrounding country being mountainous and rather barren, the inhabitants were not much addicted to agriculture, but from their local situation they possessed singular advantages for commerce, which they carried on to a great extent. The natural consequences of an extensive commerce were wealth and luxury; fostered in this manner, Corinth rose in magnitude and grandeur, and its elegant and magnificent temples, palaces, theatres, and other public buildings adorned with statues, columns, capitals and bases, not only rendered it the pride of its inhabitants, and the admiration of strangers, but gave rise to that order of architecture which still bears its name. Besides the citadel, built upon a mountain which overlooked the city, and which was called Acro-Corinthus, the works of art which principally displayed the opulence and taste of the Corinthians, were the grottos raised over the fountain Pyrenæ, sacred to the muses and constructed of white marble: the theatre and stadium, built of the same materials, and decorated in the most magnificent manner: the temple of Neptune, containing the chariots of that fabulous deity, and of Amphitrite drawn by horses covered over with gold, and adorned with ivory hoofs: the avenue which led to this edifice, decorated on the one side with the statues of those that had been victorious at the Isthmian games, and on the other, with rows of tall pine trees. We here give a view of the ruins of one of many magnificent edifices erected when the city was in its glory; a field of wheat now covers the spot where, in the times of the apostles, busy crowds were wont to assemble.

Corinth was scarcely less celebrated for the learning and ingenuity of its inhabitants than for the extent of its commerce and the magnificence of its buildings. The arts and sciences were here carried to such perfection that Cicero terms it, "totius Græciæ lumen," the light of all Greece; and Florus calls it, "Græciæ decus," the ornament of Greece. Seminars abounded in which philosophy and rhetoric were publicly taught by learned professors, and strangers resorted to them from all quarters to perfect their education. Hence the remark of the Roman poet, Horace, "Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum,"—"It does not fall to the lot of every one to visit Corinth." The lustre, however, which this famous city derived from the number and genius of its inhabitants, was greatly tarnished by their debauched manners. Strabo informs us that, "in the temple of Venus at Corinth, there were more than a thousand harlots, the slaves of the temple, who, in honor of the goddess, prostituted themselves to all comers for hire, and in consequence of these the city was crowded and became wealthy." Lib. 8. p. 581. It is accordingly known that lasciviousness was carried to such a pitch at Corinth, that the appellation of a Corinthian, given to a woman, imported that she was a prostitute.

Such was the state of Corinth, when the great apostle of the Gentiles came to preach the gospel there, in the year of Christ, 52. See Acts 18. Here he continued nearly two years, encouraged by the divine presence and blessing upon his ministry, converting numbers to the faith of Christ, whom he formed into a Christian church; and to whom after his departure, he wrote his two Epistles. (See CORINTHIANS.)

About A. D. 268, the Heruli burned Corinth to ashes. In 523, it was again almost ruined by an earthquake. About 1180, Roger, king of Sicily, took and plundered it. Since 1458, it was till lately under the power of the Turks; and is so decayed, that its inhabitants amount to no more than about fifteen hundred, or two thousand; half Mahometans, and half Christians. A late French writer, who visited this country, observes, "When the Cæsars rebuilt the walls of Corinth, and the temples of the gods rose from their ruins more magnificent than ever, an obscure architect was rearing in silence an edifice which still remains standing amidst the ruins of Greece. This man, unknown to the great, despised by the multitude, rejected as the offscouring of the world, at first associated with himself only two companions, Crispus and Gaius, with the family of Stephanas. These were the humble architects of an indestructible temple, and the first believers at Corinth. The traveller surveys the site of this celebrated city; he discovers not a vestige of the altars of paganism, but perceives some Christian chapels rising from among the cottages of the Greeks. The apostle might still, from his celestial abode, give the salutation of peace to his children, and address them in the words, 'Paul to the church of God, which is at Corinth.'"—Jones; Watson.

CORINTHIANS, (EPISTLES TO.) St. Paul left Corinth, A. D. 53 or 54, and went to Jerusalem. From Ephesus he wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, in the beginning of A. D. 56. In this epistle he reproves some who disturbed the peace of the church, complains of some disorders in their assemblies, of law-suits among them, and of a Christian who had committed incest with his mother-in-law, the wife of his father, and had not been separated from the church. This letter produced in the Corinthians great grief, vigilance against the vices reprov'd, and a very beneficial dread of God's anger. They repaired the scandal, and expressed indignant zeal against the crime committed, 2 Cor. 7: 9—11.

To form an idea of the condition of the Corinthian church, we must examine the epistles of the apostle. The root of the disturbance, as we shall see from the whole, related to the obligation of Judaism. The advocates of it had appealed, even in Galatia, to Cephas and James, for the sake of opposing to Paul, who had banished Jewish ceremonies from Christianity, authorities which were not less admitted than his own. The question itself divided all these various parties into two principal factions: the partisans of Cephas and James were for the law; the friends of Paul adopted his opinion, as well as Apollos, who, with his adherents, was always in heart in favor of Paul, and never wished to take part in a separation from him, 1 Cor. 16: 12. The leaders of the party against Paul, who declared themselves the promulgators and defenders of the doctrines of Cephas and James, were, as may be easily conceived, converted Jews, (2 Cor. 11: 22,) who had come from different places,—to all appearance from Palestine, (2 Cor. 11: 4.)—and could therefore boast of having had intercourse with the apostles at Jerusalem, and of an acquaintance with their principles. They were not even of the orthodox Jews, but those who adhered to the doctrines of the Sadducees; and though they were even now converted to Christianity, whilst they spoke zealously in favor of the law, they were undermining the hopes of the pious, and exciting doubts against the resurrection, (1 Cor. 15: 35;) so that Paul, from regard to the teachers, whose disciples they professed to be, was obliged to refute them from the testimony of James and Cephas, 1 Cor. 15: 5, 7. They, proud of their own opinions, (1 Cor. 1: 17,) not without private views deprecat'd Paul's authority, and extolled their own knowledge.

1 Cor. 2: 12; 2 Cor. 11: 16, 17. Violently as the contest was carried on, they still did not withdraw from the same place of assembly for instruction and mutual edification; even this, however, was the cause of too many scandalous scenes and disorders, 1 Cor. 11: 17; 12: 13, 14.

Each party gave to the other, as much as possible, motives for ill-will and reproach, 1 Cor. 6: 1. 7: 18. 8: 1. 10: 25—28. 11: 5—10. 7: 1—25. These were the evils, both in his own party and in that of his opponents, which St. Paul had to remedy, in his first epistle.

Paul, having understood the good effects of his first letter among the Corinthians, wrote a second to them, A. D. 57, from Macedonia, and probably from Philippi. He expresses his satisfaction at their conduct, justifies himself, and comforts them. He glories in his suffering, and exhorts them to liberality. Near the end of the year 57, he came again to Corinth, where he staid about three months, and whence he went to Jerusalem. Just before his second departure from Corinth, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans, probably in the beginning of A. D. 58.—Watson.

CORMORANT; (Levit. 11: 17; Deut. 14: 17;) a large sea bird. It is about three feet four inches in length, and four feet two inches in breadth from the tips of the extended wings. The bill is about five inches long, and of a dusky color; the base of the lower mandible is covered with a naked yellowish skin, which extends under the throat and forms a kind of pouch. It has a most voracious appetite, and lives chiefly upon fish, which it devours with unceasing gluttony. It darts down very rapidly upon its prey; and its Hebrew and Greek names are expressive of its impetuosity. The word which in our version of Isaiah, (34: 11,) is rendered cormorant, is the pelican.—Watson.

CORN. The generic name for grain, in the Old Testament writings, is dagen, corn, so named for its abundant increase. In Gen. 26: 12, and Matt. 13: 8, grain is spoken of as yielding a hundred-fold; and to the ancient fertility of Palestine all authorities bear testimony. Of the difference in quantity of produce in different parts, Wetstein has collected many accounts.

It is evident from Ruth 2: 14. 2 Sam. 17: 28, 29, &c. that parched corn constituted part of the ordinary food of the Israelites, as it still does of the Arabs resident in Syria.—Calmet.

CORNARISTS; the disciples of Theodore Cornhart, an enthusiastic secretary of the States of Holland. He wrote, at the same time, against the Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists. He maintained that every religious communion needed reformation; but he added, that no person had a right to engage in accomplishing it without a mission supported by miracles. He was also of opinion, that a person might be a good Christian without being a member of any visible church.—Head. Buck.

CORNELIUS; centurion of a cohort, belonging to the legion surnamed Italian, Acts 10. He was a Gentile; one who feared God; of constant devotion, and much charity. His whole family served God, and it pleased God to favor him in a miraculous manner with a knowledge of the gospel, through Peter, from whom he received instruction. As the apostle was speaking, the Holy Spirit fell upon Cornelius and his family, and they were added to the Christian church, as the first-fruits of the Gentiles. It deserves notice, that Julian the apostate reckons only two persons of consideration, who were converted to Christianity on its first promulgation:—Sergius Paulus the proconsul, and Cornelius the centurion. From this reference, it is probable that Cornelius was a person of greater distinction than he is usually supposed to be.—Calmet.

CORNELIUS, a bishop of Rome, was beheaded on the 14th of September, 252, for refusing at the orders of the emperor Gallus to sacrifice to the pagan deities.

CORNELIUS, (ELIAS, D. D.,) secretary of the American Education society, graduated at Yale college in 1813; and, after studying theology, engaged in 1816, as an agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in which capacity he was for one or two years very active and successful. In September and October, 1817, he visited the missions in the Cherokee nation. The subsequent winter he spent in the employment of the Missionary society of Connecticut, at New Orleans, where he was joined by Sylvester Larned, and they labored together till the congregation was organized and Mr. Larned invited to become the minister; after which he turned his attention to the poor and sick, and others of the destitute. In the spring, he returned to Andover; and July 21, 1819, was installed as colleague with Dr. Worcester at Salem. In September, 1826, he was appointed secretary of the American Education society. In the service of this institution, he devised the plan of permanent scholarships, and met with unexampled success in soliciting subscriptions. He established also the Quarterly Register and Journal of the American Education society, which he conducted for some years, assisted by Mr. E. B. Edwards. In October, 1831, he was chosen secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in the place of Mr. Everts deceased. But he had signified his acceptance of this office only a few weeks, and had just entered the new and wide field of toil for the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, when he was removed from the world. Exhausted by a journey from Boston, he was taken sick at Hartford, Connecticut, February 7, and died in that city of a fever on the brain, February 12, 1832, aged thirty-seven.

Dr. Corneliuss was enterprising, bold, and eloquent; though resolute, yet considerate and prudent. Of a vigorous frame and determined spirit, he was capable of meeting and surmounting great difficulties. He fell in the fulness of his strength; perhaps that the American churches might not trust in man. Besides his labors in the Quarterly Journal and the Annual Reports of the Education society, he published a discourse on the doctrine of the Trinity, reprinted as No. 185 of the Tract society.—Memoir by B. B. Edwards; Allen.

CORNER; the extremity of any thing, according to the Hebrews. "Ye shall not round the corners of your head, neither shall thou mar the corners of thy beard, Lev. 19: 27. "Draw near, all ye chief (Heb. corners) of the people." 1 Sam. 14: 38. "They have seduced Egypt, even they who are the stay (corner) of the tribes thereof," Isa. 19: 13. And, (Zeph. 3: 6,) "I have cut off the nations, their corners are desolate." The corner sometimes signifies the most distinguished place, that part of an edifice which is most in sight. Zechariah, speaking of Judah, after the return from captivity, says, "Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nail," 10: 4. This tribe shall afford corners, heads; it shall produce the corner-stone, the Messiah. Corner is taken likewise for the most retired part of a house, Prov. 21: 9. The corner of a bed or duan (Amos 3: 12,) is the place of honor. (See Ben.)—Calmet.

CORNET; a wind instrument of horn, or shaped like a horn for sounding in war, or at religious solemnities; but as sophar is commonly rendered trumpet, I know not why it is ever rendered cornet, (Hos. 5: 8;) but heren or karnah, is very properly rendered cornet, Dan. 3: 5: 7: 10.—Brown.

CORPUS CHRISTI, (FEAST OF;) a particular festival instituted in the Roman church, in honor of the consecrated host, and with a view to its adoration. It owes its origin to the vision of a nun of Liege, named Juliana, in 1230, who, while looking at the full moon, saw a gap in its orb; and, by a peculiar revelation from heaven, learned that the moon represented the Christian church, and the gap the want of a certain festival,—that of the adoration of the body of Christ in the consecrated host,—which she was to begin to celebrate, and announce to the world! In 1264, while a priest at Bolsena, who did not believe in the change of the bread into the body of Christ, was going through the ceremony of benediction, drops of blood fell on his surplice; and, when he endeavored to conceal them in the folds of his garment, formed bloody images of the host. The bloody surplice is still shown as a relic at Civita Vecchia. Urban IV. published in the same year, a bull, in which he appointed the Thursday of the week after Pentecost, for the celebration of the Corpus Christi feast throughout Christendom, and promised absolution for a period of from forty to one hundred days to the penitent who took part in it. Since then, the festival has been kept as one of the greatest in the Roman Catholic church. Splendid processions form an essential part of it. The children belonging to the choir, with flags, and the priests, with lighted tapers, move through the streets in front of the priest, who carries the host in a precious box, where it can be seen, under a canopy held by four laymen of rank. A crowd of the common people closes the procession. In Spain, it is customary for persons of distinction to send their children, dressed as angels, to join the procession; the different fraternities carry their patron saints before the host; astonishment and awe are produced, as well as feelings of superstitious devotion, by the splendor and magnificence of the procession, by the brilliant appearance of the streamers, by the clouds of smoke from the incense, and the solemn sound of the music. The festival is also a general holiday, in which bull fights, games, dances, and other amusements, are not wanting. In Sicily, all the liberties of a masquerade are allowed, and passages from Scripture history are theatrically exhibited in the streets. The whole people are in a state of the utmost excitement, and riot in the gratification of their carnal passions under the sanction of religious license.—Head. Buck.

CORRUPTION. (1.) The putrefaction of dead bodies. Psalm 16: 10. (2.) The lewisishes which rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice. Lev. 22: 25. (3.) Sinful inclinations, habits, and practices, which are hateful in themselves, and defile and ruin men. Rom. 8: 21: 2 Pet. 2: 12, 19. (4.) Everlasting ruin. Gal. 6: 8. (5.) Uncomeliness as of a dead body. Dan. 10: 8. (6.) Men in their mortal and imperfect state. 1 Cor. 15: 50. The mount of Olives is called the mount of Corruption, because there Solomon built high places or temples for abominable idols to gratify his heathenish wives. 2 Kings 23: 13.—Brown.

CORRUPTIBLE; a party of Monophysites in the sixth century, who maintained that the body of Christ was corruptible, like that of other men, before his resurrection, while Haliarnassus and others insisted that it was incorruptible from the moment of his conception. (See ΑΡΗΤΑΡΧΟΠΙΤΕΣ.)—Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. pp. 147-8; Williams.

COSMOGONY, (from the Greek kosmos, the world, and genos, generation), according to its etymology, should be defined—the origin of the world; but the term has become, to a great degree, associated with the numerous theories of different nations and individuals respecting this event. These hypotheses may be divided into three classes:—

1. That which represents the world as eternal in form as well as substance. Ocellus Lucanus is one of the most ancient philosophers who supposed the world to have existed from eternity. Aristotle appears to have embraced the same doctrine. His theory is, that not only the heaven and earth, but also animate and inanimate beings in general, were without beginning. His opinion rested on the belief, that the universe was necessarily the eternal effect of a cause equally eternal, such as the Divine Spirit, which, being at once power and action, could not remain idle. Yet he admitted that a spiritual substance was the cause of the universe, of its motion and its form. He says positively, in his Metaphysics, that God is an intelligent spirit, incorporeal, immovable, indivisible, the mover of all things. According to him, the universe is less a creation than an emanation of the Deity. Plato says the universe is an eternal image of the immutable Idea or Type, united, from eternity, with changeable matter. The followers of this philosopher both developed and distorted this idea. Ammonius, a disciple of Proclus, taught, in the sixth century, at Alexandria, the co-eternity of God and the universe. Several ancient philosophers (as also moderns) have gone further, and taught that the universe is one with Deity. Of this opinion were Xenophanes, Parmenides, Melissus, Zeno of Elea, and the Megaric sect.

2. The theory which considers the matter of the universe eternal, but not its form, was the prevailing one among the ancients, who, starting from the principle that out of nothing nothing could be made, could not admit the creation of matter, yet did not believe that the world had always been in its present state. The prior state of the world, subject to a constant succession of uncertain movements, which chance afterwards made regular, they called chaos. The Phœnicians, Babylonians, and also the Egyptians, seem to have adhered to this theory. The ancient poets, who have handed down to us the old mythological traditions, represent the universe as springing from chaos without the assistance of the Deity. Hesiod feigns that Chaos was the parent of Erebus and Night, from whose union sprang the Air and the Day. He further relates how the sky and the stars were separated from the earth, &c. The system of atoms is much more famous. Leucippus and Democritus of Abdera were its inventors. The atoms, or indivisible particles, said they, existed from eternity, moving at hazard, and producing, by their constant meeting, a variety of substances. After having given rise to an immense variety of combinations, they produced the present organization of bodies. This system of cosmogony was that of Epicurus, as described by Lucretius. Democritus attributed to atoms form and size; Epicurus added weight. Many other systems have existed, which must be classed under this division. We only mention that of the Stoics, who admitted two principles, God and matter,—in the abstract, both corporeal, for they did not admit spiritual beings. The first was active, the second passive.

3. The third theory of cosmogony makes God the creator of the world out of nothing. This is the doctrine of the sacred Scriptures, in which it is taught with the greatest simplicity and beauty. From its being more or less held by the Etruscans, Magi, Druids, and Brahmins, it would seem to have found its way as a tradition from the regions in which it was possessed as a divine revelation. Anaxagoras was the first who taught it among the Greeks; and it was generally adopted by the Romans, notwithstanding the efforts of Lucretius to establish the doctrine of Epicurus.

“The free-thinkers of our own and of former ages have denied the possibility of creation, as being a contradiction to reason; and of consequence have taken the opportunity from thence to discredit revelation. On the other hand, many defenders of the sacred writings have asserted that creation out of nothing, so far from being a contradiction to reason, is not only probable, but demonstrably certain. Nay, some have gone so far as to say, that from the very inspection of the visible system of nature, we are able to infer that it was once in a state of non-existence.” We cannot, however, here enter into the multiplicity of the arguments on both sides; it is enough for us to know what God has been pleased to reveal, both concerning himself and the works of his hands. Men, and other animals, that inhabit the earth and the seas; all the immense varieties of herbs and plants of which the vegetable kingdom consists; the globe of the earth; and the expanse of the ocean, these we know to have been produced by his power. Besides the terrestrial world, which we inhabit, we see many other material bodies disposed around it in the wide extent of space. The moon, which is in a particular manner connected with our earth, and even dependent upon it; the sun and the other planets, with their satellites, which, like the earth, circulate round the sun, and appear to derive from him light and heat; those bodies which we call fixed stars, and consider as illuminating and cherishing with heat each its peculiar system of planets; and the comets which, at certain periods, surprise us with their appearance, and the nature of whose connexion with the general system of nature, or with any particular system of planets, we cannot pretend to have fully discovered; these are so many more of the Deity's works, from the contemplation of which we cannot but conceive the most awful ideas of his creative power.

"Matter, however, whatever the varieties of form under which it is made to appear, the relative disposition of its parts, or the motions communicated to it, is but an inferior part of the works of creation. We believe ourselves to be animated with a much higher principle than brute matter; in viewing the manners and economy of the lower animals, we can scarce avoid acknowledging even them to consist of something more than various modifications of matter and motion. The other planetary bodies, which seem to be in circumstances nearly analogous to those of our earth, are surely, as well as it, destined for the habitations of rational, intelligent beings. The existence of intelligences of a higher order than man, though infinitely below the Deity, appears extremely probable. Of these spiritual beings, called angels, we have express intimation in Scripture (see the article ANGELS). But the limits of the creation we must not pretend to define. How far the regions of space extend, or how they are filled, we know not. How the planetary worlds, the sun, and the fixed stars are occupied, we do not pretend to have ascertained. We are even ignorant how wide a diversity of forms, what an infinity of living animated beings may inhabit our own globe. So confined is our knowledge of creation, yet so grand, so awful, that part which our narrow understandings can comprehend.

"Concerning the periods of time at which the Deity executed his several works, it cannot be pretended that mankind have had opportunities of receiving very particular information. Many have been the conjectures, and curious the fancies of learned men, respecting it; but, after all, we must be indebted to the sacred writings for the best information." Different copies, indeed, give different dates. (See CHRONOLOG.) But though these different systems of chronology are so inconsistent, and so slenderly supported, yet the differences among them are so inconsiderable, in comparison with those which arise before us when we contemplate the chronology of the Chinese, the Chaldeans, and the Egyptians, and they agree so well with the general information of authentic history, and with the appearances of nature, and of society, that they may be considered as nearly fixing the true period of the creation of the earth.

Uncertain, however, as we may be as to the exact time of the creation, we may profitably apply ourselves to the contemplation of this immense fabric. Indeed, the beautiful and multifarious works around us must strike the mind of every beholder with wonder and admiration, unless he be enveloped in ignorance, and chained down to the earth with sensuality. These works every way proclaim the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of the Creator. Creation is a book which the nicest philosopher may study with the deepest attention. Unlike the works of art, the more it is examined, the more it opens to us sources of admiration of its great Author; the more it calls for our inspection, and the more it demands our praise. Here every thing is adjusted in the exactest order; all answering the wisest ends, and acting according to the appointed laws of Deity. Here the Christian is led into the most delightful field of contemplation. To him every pebble becomes a preacher, and every atom a step by which he ascends to his Creator. Placed in this beautiful temple, and looking around on all its various parts, he cannot help joining with the psalmist in saying, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works; in wisdom hast thou made them all!" COTTAGE. (See TENT.)

COTTON; a white woolly or downy substance found in a brown bud, produced by a shrub, the leaves of which resemble those of the sycamore tree. The bud, which grows as large as a pigeon's egg, turns black, when ripe, and divides at top into three parts; the cotton is as white as snow, and with the heat of the sun swells to the size of a pullet's egg. Scripture speaks of cotton under the Hebrew name shech, Exod. 25: 4.—Culmrt.

COUCH. (See BED.)

COUNCIL; an assembly of ecclesiastical persons met together for the purpose of consultation on ecclesiastical matters.—Hand. Book.

COUNCIL, (ECUMENICAL OR GENERAL,) is an assembly which has been supposed to represent the whole body of the Christian church. It is obvious, however, that there is room for considerable diversity of opinion as to what constitutes a general council in the ecclesiastical sense of the expression; and it is no less clear that, in the proper sense of the phrase, such a council has never been held. The Romanists reckon eighteen of them, Bullinger six, Dr. Prideaux seven, and bishop Everidge eight, which, he says, are all the general councils which have ever been held since the time of the first Christian emperor. Adopting the number contended for by the Romish writers, they must be all divided into two classes—Eastern and Western—the former called by the emperors, the latter by the popes. The following is the order:—

EIGHT EASTERN COUNCILS.

1. At Nice, in Bithynia, in the year 325, which sat about two months, and was occasioned by the Arian heresy. Authors differ respecting the number of bishops that were assembled; Eusebius saying there were two hundred and fifty, and Socrates that there were three hundred and eighteen. The emperor himself honored it with his presence, Hosius, bishop of Cordova, in Spain—a man of great piety and learning—presided. It was at this council that the term homoousios, of the same substance, was applied to the Son to express the identity of his nature with that of the Father. The profession of the faith, called the Nicene creed, was then drawn up, and subscribed by all, except a small number of Arians.

2. Constantinople (I.) in 381, convened by the emperor Theodosius, in order to oppose the heresies of Sabellius, Marcellus, Photinus, and Apollinaris, which were still more or less privately taught; and to settle still more definitely some points of the Nicene creed against the Arians, especially by making additions declaratory of belief in the divinity of the Holy Spirit. At this council, a hundred and fifty prelates were present.

3. Ephesus, 431, consisting of two hundred bishops assembled to judge of the Nestorian heresy, which they condemned by a solemn sentence, confirmatory of the sentence pronounced against Nestorius, the year before, by pope Celestine I., in a synod held at Rome.

4. Chalcedon, 451, composed, according to some, of six hundred; and, according to others, of six hundred and fifty bishops. It condemned the errors of Eutychus, who affirmed that there was but one nature in Christ.

5. Constantinople (II.) in 553, convoked by Justinian, and consisting of a hundred and sixty-five bishops. Its principal transaction was the condemnation of what is called the "Three Chapters," by which is meant the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyr, and the Epistle of Ibas to Maris the Persian. It also issued an anathema against Origen, Arius, Macedonius and others.

6. Constantinople (III.) in 680, consisting of somewhere about two hundred prelates, renewed the condemnation of the Monothelite heresy, which asserted that there was only one will in Christ—a sentence which had been pronounced against its abettors, in a council held at Rome, the preceding year.

7. Nice, 787. This council, commonly called the Second Nicene, assembled at Constantinople the year before, but was so disturbed by the violence of the Iconoclasts, that the members were obliged to adjourn and meet elsewhere. There were present three hundred and fifty bishops, besides many monks and priests, who came to the conclusion, on the subject of image-worship, that it was relatively lawful; the effect of which was its confirmation and prevalence.

8. Constantinople (IV.,) in 869; the principal business of which was the deposition of Photius, who had intruded into the see of Constantinople, and the restoration of Ignatius, who had been unjustly expelled.

TEN WESTERN COUNCILS.

1. Lateran (I.,) in the year 1123. It was convened by pope Calixtus II., who presided in person, and consisted of three hundred bishops. It decreed that investiture to ecclesiastical dignities was the exclusive right of the church; and that the practice of secular princes giving such investiture was an usurpation. The celibacy of the clergy was also decreed.

2. Lateran (II.,) in 1139, composed of nearly a thousand bishops, under the presidency of pope Innocent II. It decided on the due election of this pope, and condemned the tenets of Peter de Bruys, and Arnold of Brescia.

3. Lateran (III.,) in 1179. At this council, with pope Alexander III. at their head, three hundred and two bishops condemned what they were pleased to call the "errors and impieties" of the Waldenscs and Albigenses.

4. Lateran (IV.,) in 1215, composed of four hundred and twelve bishops, under Innocent III., had for its objects the recovery of the Holy Land, reformation of abuses, and the extirpation of heresy.

5. Lyons (I.,) in 1245, consisting of a hundred and forty bishops, and convened for the purpose of promoting the crusades, restoring ecclesiastical discipline, and de-throning Frederic II. emperor of Germany. It was also decreed at this council, that cardinals should wear red hats.

6. Lyons (II.,) in 1274. There were five hundred bishops and about a thousand inferior clergy present. Its principal object was the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches.

7. Vienne in Gaul, 1311, consisting of three hundred bishops, who were convoked to suppress the Knights Templars, condemn those who were accused of heresy, and assist the Christians in Palestine.

8. Florence, 1439—42. It was composed of one hundred and forty one bishops, the patriarch of Constantinople, and the legates of the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It effected a renunciation of schism on the part of the Greeks, and an abjuration of heresy on the part of the Armenians.

9. Lateran (V.,) in 1512, convened by pope Julius II., to oppose another held by nine cardinals of high rank the year before at Piza, with a view to bridle his wild animosity, turbulence, and contumacy. It declared that council schismatic, abolished the pragmatic sanction, and strengthened the power of the Roman see.

10. Trent, convoked and opened by Paul III. in 1545; continued under Julius III., and, after numerous interruptions, brought to a close in 1563, under the pontificate of Pius IV. Its object was professedly to reform ecclesiastical abuses, but really to counteract and crush the reformation. It arrived at the following conclusions, which were enacted under the pain of anathema:—

[1.] All the books of Scripture, canonical and apocryphal, not excluding that of Baruch, though wanting in the old catalogues, which are contained in the Latin church version, commonly called the Vulgate, are possessed of the same divine authority.

[2.] Tradition, whether it regards matters of faith or practice, must be received with the same veneration, forasmuch it is the unwritten word of God.

[3.] The Holy Scriptures are only to be read and interpreted in and according to the Vulgate, which is the only authentic version.

[4.] No person shall presume, in reliance on his own insight and wisdom, to pervert the Holy Scriptures, to make them favor his views of faith and morals, and contrary to the sense which the church has received, and still receives, which alone can determine what is the true meaning and interpretation; or to explain them contrary to the universal consent of the fathers.

[5.] Faith is the commencement, foundation, and roof of justification, but not altogether exclusive of good works; for persons who are justified increase in the righteousness which they acquire through Christ, by means of their observance of the commandments of God, and the rules of the church. Justification does not consist merely in the forgiveness of sins, but also in the renovation and sanctification of the inner man through grace.

[6.] In the sacrament of the Lord's supper, after the consecration of the bread and wine, the God-man, Jesus Christ, is really and substantially present under the form of bread and wine, which contains no contradiction; for though, in accordance with his natural existence, he is always in heaven, yet sacramentaliter he is present in many other places in regard to his substance. The other sacraments have only the virtue of sanctification when they are used; but that of the Lord's supper possesses it previous to the use; for the apostles had not yet received the supper from the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ, when he assured them,—that it was his body that he communicated to them; and it has always been the faith of the church that immediately on the consecration, the true body and the true blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are, together with his soul and his divine nature, present under the form of the bread and wine. This takes place in virtue of that natural union and concourancy according to which the flesh and blood of our risen Lord are constantly united, so that under either of the forms as much is contained as under both. By the consecration of the bread and wine, a conversion of the substance of both into the substance of the body and blood of Christ is effected; which conversion the church hath very properly denominated transubstantiation. It is on this account that the bread and wine are to have (latræ cultus) divine worship paid to them.

On the subject of the general councils see L'Abbé, Baronius, Nat. Alexander, Berti, Fleury, Dupin, Mosheim, Jortin, and Grier.

Whatever may be said in favor of general councils, their utility has been doubted by some of the wisest men. Dr. Jortin says, "They have been too much extolled by papists, and by some Protestants. They were a collection of men who were frail and fallible. Some of those councils were not assemblies of pious and learned divines, but cabals, the majority of which were quarrelsome, fanatical, domineering, dishonest prelates, who wanted to compel men to approve all their opinions, of which they themselves had no clear conceptions, and to anathematize and oppress those who would not implicitly submit to their determinations." Jortin's Works, vol. vii. charge 2.

COUNCILS, Provincial or Occasional, have been numerous. At Aix la Chapelle, A. D. 816, a council was held for regulating the canons of cathedral churches. The council of Savonnières, in 859, was the first which gave the title of Most Christian King to the king of France; but it did not become the peculiar appellation of that sovereign till 1469. Of Troyes, in 887, to decide the disputes about the imperial dignity. The second council of Troyes, 1107, restrains the clergy from marrying. The council of Clermont, in 1095. The first crusade was determined in this council. The bishops had yet the precedence of cardinals. In this assembly the name of pope was for the first time given to the head of the church, exclusively of the bishops, who used to assume that title. Here, also, Hugh, archbishop of Lyons, obtained of the pope a confirmation of the primacy of his see over that of Sens. The council of Rheims, summoned by Eugenius III. in 1148, called an assembly of Cisastria Gaul, in which advowes, or patrons of churches, are prohibited from taking more than ancient fees, upon pain of deprivation and ecclesiastical burial. Bishops, deacons, sub-deacons, monks, and nuns, are restrained from marrying. In this council the doctrine of the Trinity was decided; but upon separation the pope called a congregation, in which the cardinals pretended they had no right to judge of doctrinal points; that this was the privilege peculiar to the pope. The council of Sutrium, in 1046, wherein three popes who had assumed the chair were deposed. The council of Clarendon in England, against Becket, held in 1164. The council of Lombez, in the country of Albigeois, in 1200, occasioned by some disturbances on account of the Albigeois; a crusade was formed on this account, and an army sent to extirpate them. Innocent III. spirited up this barbarous war. Dominic was the apostle, the count of Toulouse the victim, and Simon, count of Montfort, the conductor or chief. The council of Paris in 1210, in which Aristotle's metaphysics were condemned to the flames, test the refinements of that philosopher should have a bad tendency on men's minds, by applying those subjects to religion. The council of Piza, begun March 2d, 1109, in which Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. were deposed. Another council, sometimes called general, held at Pisa, in 1505. Lewis XII. of France, assembled a national council at Tours (being highly disgusted with the pope,) 1510, where was present the cardinal De Gurce, deputed by the emperor; and it was then agreed to convene a general council at Pisa.—Murray's Hist. Relig.; Hend. Buck.

COUNSEL. God's counsel is, (1.) his purpose or decree. Acts 4: 28. Isa. 45: 10. Psalm 33: 11. (2.) His will and doctrine, concerning the way of salvation to sinful men. Luke 7: 30. (3.) The direction of his word, the teaching of his Spirit, and the guidance of his providence. Psalm 73: 24. Rev. 3: 18. To stand in God's counsel is to be familiar with him, and know his revealed will and purpose. Jer. 23: 18, 22.—Brown.

COUNSELLOR. Christ is called the Counsellor; with him his Father deliberately fixed the whole plan of our salvation; and he, possessed of infinite wisdom and knowledge, directs and admonishes his people in every case. Isa. 9: 6. God's statutes are the saints' counsellors, which they consult, and from which they receive direction in every hard and difficult case. Psalm 119: 24.—Brown.

COUNTENANCE. As by the countenance we manifest our love, hatred, grief, joy, pleasure, and anger; the lifting up or shining of God's countenance denotes the manifestation of his favor and love; and the hiding, frown, or rebuke of his countenance, denotes the manifestation of his anger in just judgments. Psalm 44: 3. and 80: 16. Christ's countenance as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars, is his whole appearance in person, office, relations, and work, which is ever delightful and glorious. Song 5: 15. The saints cause Christ to see their countenance, when, in the confident exercise of faith and hope, they come with boldness to his throne of grace. Song 2: 14. Thou shalt not countenance a poor man in his cause; thou shalt not unjustly pity and favor him on account of his poverty. Exod. 23: 3.—Brown.

COUNTRY. Heaven is called a country, in allusion to Canaan; how extensive its limits! how wholesome its air of divine influence! how wide its prospect; how numerous its privileges and inhabitants! And it is a better country, as its inhabitants, privileges, and employments are far more excellent than any on earth. Heb. 11: 14, 16. It is a far country, very distant from and unknown in our world. Matt. 21: 37. and 25: 14. Luke 19: 12. A state of apostasy from God, whether of men in general, or of the Gentile world, is called a far country; it is distant from that in which we ought to be, in it we are ignorant of God, exposed to danger, and have none to pity or help us. Luke 15: 13. A state or place of gross ignorance, and wickedness is called the region and shadow of death. Matt. 4: 16.—Brown.

COURAGE, is that quality of the mind that enables men to encounter difficulties and dangers. Natural courage is that which arises chiefly from constitution; moral or spiritual is that which is produced from principle, or a sense of duty. Courage and fortitude are often used as synonyms, but they may be distinguished thus: fortitude is firmness of mind that supports pain; courage is active fortitude, that meets dangers, and attempts to repel them. (See FORTITUDE.) Courage, says Addison, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion; but that courage which arises from a sense of duty, and from a fear of offending Him that made us, always acts in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.—Hend. Buck.

COURT, an entrance into a palace or house. (See HOUSE.) The great courts belonging to the temple of Jerusalem were three; the first called the court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were allowed to enter so far, and no farther; the second was the court of Israel, because all the Israelites, provided they were purified, had a right of admission into it; the third was that of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood, where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Common Israelites, who were desirous of offering sacrifices, were at liberty to bring their victims as far as the inner part of the court; but they could not pass a certain line of separation, which divided it into two; and they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priests, or had made their confession with the ceremony of laying their hands upon the head of the victim, if it were a sin-offering. Before the temple was built, there was a court belonging to the tabernacle, but not near so large as that of the temple, and encompassed only with pillars, and veils hung with cords.—Hend. Buck.

COURTS, (CHURCH;) among the Presbyterians, those ecclesiastical associations of ministers and elders, consisting of sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the general assembly, which in Scotland are considered as forming the perfection of church government and discipline. Each subordinate court takes cognizance of ecclesiastical matters within its own bounds; and from each there is an appeal to that which is above it in order, till the matter is carried before the general assembly, which is the supreme court, and the decision of which is final.—Hend. Buck.

COURT, (SPIRITUAL;) a seat of ecclesiastical judgment for the administration of justice in ecclesiastical matters. In England there are six spiritual courts; the Archdeacon's court; the Consistory courts; the Prærogative, and the Arches court; the court of Peculiars, and the court of Delegates.

These courts proceed according to the civil and canon laws, by citation, libel or articles, answer upon oath, proofs by witnesses and presumptions, definitive sentence without a jury, and by excommunication for contempt of sentence. In times of intolerance, many acts of the most cruel enormity were committed in these courts.—Hend. Buck.

COVEL, (LEMUEL,) a Baptist minister of distinguished usefulness, was a native of the state of New York. His life was chiefly spent in missionary labors in New England, New York, and Canada. He commenced his ministry under great disadvantages, and most of his life was obliged to labor, like Paul, working with his own hands; yet such were the astonishing powers of his mind that he became one of the most distinguished men of his denomination. His voice was clear and majestic; his address, manly and engaging; his doctrine, salvation by the cross; and his preaching of the most solid, perspicuous and interesting kind. His spirit resembled that of the excellent Pearce. He lived the religion he professed; and wherever he was known was highly and universally esteemed. He died suddenly in Upper Canada, 1806, in the meridian of life and usefulness, but in the triumphs of holy faith.—Benedict.

COVENANT; in ordinary life, a contract or agreement between two or more parties on certain terms. In theology, it is used either in the scriptural, or in a systematic and popular acceptation.

1. In the Scriptures, when employed to designate a transaction between God and man, it uniformly denotes an arrangement, disposition, or institution, according to which the divine favor is dispensed to those with whom it is made. It is represented, not as a contract or bargain, in virtue of which, on the ground of something done by man, its blessings are to be communicated; but as a free and voluntary constitution on the part of Jehovah, consisting of a deed or grant of blessings, and the particular mode or tenure of their conveyance. Besides minor arrangements of this description, the Bible exhibits two primary covenants or dispensations, (Gal. 5:24—26,) which it denominates the first and second, (Heb. 8: 7,) and the old and new covenants, verse 13. Of these, the first or old covenant is expressly stated to be that which God made with the children of Israel, when he took them to be a peculiar people to himself, and is the same that is commonly called the Mosaic or Sinai covenant, because given to Moses on mount Sinai. It was a covenant of peculiarity, by which the whole of the Israelites became what no other nation of this world, before or since, has been—the peculiar people of God, or a kingdom governed immediately by God, and whose visible rulers and judges were to have no legislative power, but were to act merely as vicegerents of Jehovah, and execute his laws. The great moral code, which is binding on all mankind, at all times, and under all circumstances, and the specific enactments of which are only so many expressions of that love to God and man which is essential to the well-being of creation, was laid as the basis of this constitution, and on this account it is frequently called the law: regular forms of divine worship were appointed; a regular priesthood separated for its performance; and the requisite civil and political institutes ordained. The whole, while admirably adapted to answer every purpose of existing legislation and government, had a prospective or prefigurative reference to a future and superior dispensation; or the second and new covenant, which was instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ, ratified by the shedding of his blood, and is the gracious charter or instrument according to which God has revealed it to be his pleasure to dispense the sovereign blessings of his mercy to sinners of all nations under heaven. Between these two dispensations there are several striking and important points of contrast. The former was national: the latter does not regard any nation more than another. The former was typical; the latter is anti-typical. The former was temporary; the latter is eternal. The former could only secure the enjoyment of Canaan; the latter secures the heavenly inheritance. The former could not bestow justification or eternal life: this the latter was specially instituted to do. The former did not preserve from apostasy, or render obedience certain; the latter does. See Heb. 8: 6—13.

But though the Christian economy may be termed the second or new covenant, in relation to the posteriority of its establishment to that of the first and old covenant, it has nevertheless a retrospective bearing and influence, not only on those who lived under the Mosaic institution, but even to the very period of the fall; and according to the plan of its constitution, formed in the divine mind from eternity, and gradually developed in promises and figures, sinners who believed the testimony of God, and confided in his mercy, were absolved from guilt, and admitted to the enjoyment of the divine favor. Gal. 3: 15—17; Rom. 3: 25, 26; Heb. 9: 15.

2. Besides this view, which the Scriptures furnish of the covenants, there is another which has been taken by systematic divines, though they are not altogether agreed with respect to it. Some speak of two, and others of three covenants. The latter position, which is most extensively propagated, holds forth—1. A covenant of works, which, it is maintained, was made with Adam on his creation, in virtue of which he was constituted the federal head of the human race, and which, as the law of nature, was to be binding on all his posterity. Of this covenant, that made at Sinai is considered to have been merely a republication. 2. A covenant of redemption, or a covenant-engagement entered into by the Father and the Son from eternity, with a view to the redemption of the elect, agreeably to which the Father constituted the Son their Head and Redeemer; and the Son voluntarily undertook their redemption, and became their sponsor or surety. 3. A covenant of grace, which is a compact or agreement between God and elect sinners, in which God, on his part, declares his free good-will concerning eternal salvation, and every thing relative thereto, freely to be given to those in covenant, by and for the sake of the Mediator Christ; and man, on his part, consenting to that goodness by a sincere faith. See Witsius, Boston, and Strong, on the Covenants; and Russel's Familiar Survey of the Old and New Covenants; Head. Buck.

COVENANT, in ecclesiastical history, denotes a contract or convention agreed to by the Scotch, in the year 1638, for maintaining their religion free from innovation. In 1581, the general assembly drew up a confession of faith, or national covenant, condemning episcopal government, which was signed by James I., and which he enjoined on all his subjects. It was again subscribed in 1590 and 1596. The subscription was renewed in 1638, and the subscribers engaged by oath to maintain religion in the same state as it was in 1580, and to reject all innovations introduced since that time. This oath annexed to the confession of faith, received the name of the covenant.—Head. Buck.

COVENANT, (SOLENN LEAGUE AND;) a compact established in the year 1643, which formed a bond of union between Scotland and England. It was sworn and subscribed by many in both nations, who hereby solemnly abjured popery and prelacy, and combined together for their mutual defence against the imposition of these evils. It was approved by the parliament and assembly at Westminster, and ratified by the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, in 1645. King Charles I. disapproved of it when he surrendered himself to the Scotch army, in 1646; but in 1650, Charles II. declared his approbation both of this and the national covenant by a solemn oath; and in August of the same year, made a further declaration at Dunfermline to the same purpose, which was also renewed at Scoone, in 1651. The league was ratified by parliament in this year, and subscription to it required by every member, without which the constitution of the parliament was declared null and void. It produced a serious distraction in the subsequent history of that country, and was voted illegal by parliament, and provision made against it.—Encyc. Brit.; Head. Buck.

COVENANTERS; those who subscribed to the covenant of 1638. The name is still usually given in Ireland to the Cameronians, (which see).—Head. Buck.

COVENANTING, (PERSONAL;) a solemn transaction by which many pious and devoted Christians have dedicated themselves to the service of God. Such bonds or covenants, written and subscribed with their own hands, have been found among their papers after their death, and it cannot be denied, that most of them are exceedingly edifying; but instances have also been known of persons abusing this custom for purposes of superstition and self-righteousness, and of some who have gone so far as to write and sign such a document with their own blood.—Head. Buck.

COVER. God covers himself with a cloud when he withholds the favorable smiles of his providence and presence, and manifests his just wrath and indignation. Lam. 3: 44. God covered the Jewish prophets, rulers, and seers, when he rendered them stupid, wretched and contemptible. Isa. 29: 10. God covers with a robe of righteousness, and covers sin, when, through the imputation of the Savior's obedience and suffering, he fully and irrevocably forgives it. Isa. 61: 10. Psalm 32: 1. Rom. 4: 7. Men cover their own sin when they deny, excuse, extenuate, or defend it. Prov. 28: 13. Men cover the sins of others when they forgive injuries done them, and binder others' faults from being publicly known. Prov. 10: 12. One's covering his own head, face, or lips imports shame, grief and perplexity. Jer. 14: 3. 2 Sam. 19: 4, and 15: 30. To have one's face covered by another, imports condemnation to death. Esth. 7: 8. Seraphim covering their face and feet with their wings, are angels and ministers unable to behold the divine glory that shines in the person and office of Christ, and blushing at their best works before him. Isa. 6: 2. To be covered with a cloud; anger, shame, confusion, horror, ashes, violence, is, through the anger of the Lord, to be reduced to a most wretched and shameful condition, and to be punished for oppression of others. Lam. 2: 1. Ezek. 7: 18. Hab. 2: 17. Obad. 10. Ps. 89: 45.

The Jews covered with a covering not of God's spirit: they depended on the assistance of the Egyptians, contrary to the will of God. Isa. 30: 1. The face covering and veil spread over all nations, is the gross ignorance and sentence of condemnation which lay on the Gentile world. Isa. 25: 7.—Brown.

COVERDALE, (MILES,) one of the earliest English reformers, was born in Yorkshire, in 1487, was educated at Cambridge, and went abroad on becoming a Protestant. He assisted Tyndal in his version of the Bible, and in 1535, published a complete translation. In 1551, after having been almoner to queen Catharine Parr, he was promoted to the see of Exeter. In the reign of Mary, he retired to the continent, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth. He died in 1568, or, according to some accounts, in 1580. Bishop Coverdale was a great and good man.—Davenport.

COVERT. Jesus Christ is a covert to his people: by his blood, his love, his power, and providence, he covers their crimes and infirmities, protects them from the wrath of God, the dominion of sin, and the rage of devils and men. Isa. 4: 6, and 32: 2.—Brown.

COVETOUSNESS; an unreasonable desire after that we have not, with a dissatisfaction with what we have. It may further be considered as consisting in, 1. An anxious carking care about the things of this world. 2. A rapacity in getting. 3. Too frequently includes sinister and illegal ways of obtaining wealth. 4. A tenaciousness in keeping. It is a vice which marvellously prevails upon and insinuates into the heart of man, and for these reasons: it often bears a near resemblance to virtue; brings with it many plausible reasons; and raises a man to a state of reputation on account of his riches. "There cannot be," as one observes, "a more unreasonable sin than this. It is unjust; only to covet, is to wish to be unjust. It is cruel; the covetous must harden themselves against a thousand plaintive voices. It is ungrateful; such forget their former obligations and their present supporters. It is foolish; it destroys reputation, breaks the rest, unfits for the performance of duty, and is a contempt of God himself: it is unprecedented in all our examples of virtue mentioned in the Scripture. One, indeed, spoke unadvisedly with his lips; another cursed and swore; a third was in a passion; and a fourth committed adultery; but which of the saints ever lived in a habit of covetousness? Lastly, it is idolatry, (Col. 3: 5,) the idolatry of the heart; where, as in a temple, the miserable wretch excludes God, sets up gold instead of him, and places that confidence in it which belongs to the Great Supreme alone." Let those who live in the habitual practice of it consider the judgments that have been inflicted on such characters, (Josh. 7: 21; Acts 5;) the misery with which it is attended; the curse such persons are to society; the denunciations and cautions respecting it in the holy Scripture; and how effectually it bars men from God, from happiness, and from heaven.—Scott's Essays, 72, 73; South's Sermons, vol. iv. ser. 1; Robinson's Moral Exercises, ex. iv.; Saurin's Sermons, vol. v. ser. 12; Eng. Trans.; Hend. Buck.

COWPER, (WILLIAM, ESQ.,) the celebrated author of the Task, was born at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, November 26, 1731, and was the son of the rector of that place. His constitution was highly delicate, and his feelings nervously susceptible. It is no wonder, therefore, that he endured so much from the tyranny of his seniors at Westminster school, as to inspire him with a disgust of all such public establishments; a disgust which he afterwards forcibly expressed in his poem of Tirocinium. He was articled for three years to an attorney, and subsequently studied at the Temple, but seems to have acquired no great relish for legal knowledge. So extreme was his dread of being placed in any conspicuous situation, that being unexpectedly called on to attend at the bar of the house of lords, as clerk of the journals, his agitation of mind not only compelled him to resign his post, but terminated in insanity. That disorder was heightened by his sense of sin, without any clear ideas of the way of salvation. In this state of mind he repeatedly attempted suicide, but by a most merciful providence his attempts were defeated. He was placed under the care of the excellent Dr. Cotton, by whose tender assiduities his mind was soothed, and led to the knowledge of the Savior. A correct understanding of Romans, 3: 25, 26, accompanied with the spirit of faith, opened the heart of Cowper to a flood of holy peace, hope, and joy. From this time, his health began rapidly to improve. After he recovered, he took up his residence, in 1765, as an inmate with the Rev. Mr. Unwin of Huntingdon. That gentleman died in 1767, but Cowper continued to reside with his widow, at Olney in Buckinghamshire, and Weston in Northamptonshire, till her death in 1796. It was at Olney, his acquaintance commenced with the Rev. John Newton; whose friendship, as well as that of Mrs. Unwin, was the source of great comfort to him under his distressing nervous malady, which haunted his delicate spirit to the last. From 1773 to 1778, and from 1794 till his decease, which took place at Derham in Norfolk, April 25, 1800, with little intermission he suffered again under the scourge of insanity.

In the mean while, however, he gained imperishable fame by his writings. His first appearance as an author, excepting a few papers to the Connoisseur, and some hymns to the Olney collection, was in 1782, when he published the first volume of his poems. The second, containing the Task, appeared in 1784. Of his subsequent works, the principal is, a blank verse translation of Homer, which has not become popular. It is a curious fact, that his humorous ballad of John Gilpin was written while he was a prey to the deepest melancholy. His Letters, which are models of that kind of composition, have been given to the world since his death. Cowper is a poet of varied powers; he is by turns playful and pathetic, tender and sarcastic; in some instances, he rises to sublimity; and in picturesque delineation he has no rival but Thomson, and he generally surpasses him in elegance. His other characteristics are simplicity, individuality, transparency of ideas, bold originality, singular purity, and experimental Christian piety. All his poems bear marks of his mature authorship, his accurate rather than extensive scholarship, and his unwearied desire to benefit mankind. His Christian life, though oppressed by disease, was pure, useful and lovely; and even while suffering under the deranged idea that he was an exception to God's general plan of grace—a deranged idea which hung like a cloud over his soul during the last years of his life—it is delightful to perceive that it had no tendency to lead him aside from the path of rectitude, or to relax in the least his efforts to maintain the life of religion in his soul. His last accents were those of most perfect and touching acquiescence in the will of God, with whom, we doubt not, his harassed spirit is now at rest. What a moment was that which dispelled forever its gloom!—Taylor's Life of Cowper; Davenport.

CRABBE, (GEORGE,) one of the most popular of modern British poets, was born in 1754, at Aldborough, in Suffolk. He displayed a taste for poetry at an early age, and was finally induced to give up the study of medicine and devote himself to belles lettres. He went to London at the age of twenty-four, and gained the friendship of Edmund Burke, at whose recommendation he published, in 1781, his poem of The Library. This was quickly followed by The Village, which gained for him the high approbation of Dr. Johnson. The study of theology for a long time withdrew Mr. Crabbe almost entirely from his poetic labors. After an interruption of nearly twenty years, he published a collection of poems, which was very successful. This was followed by The Borough, in 1810; Tales, in 1815; and Tales of the Hall, in 1819. He died in 1832. His works have been exceedingly popular, and have gone through many editions. Every thing about him is simple, and characteristic; and although he is sadly wanting in evangelical views, and in religious elevation, he has been described with much felicity as the poet of nature and the anatomist of the human soul.—Davenport.

CRACKNELS; a sort of hard cakes or buns. 1 Kings 14: 3.—Brown.

CRAMER, (JOHN ANDREW,) a German theologian and writer, was born at Josephstadt, in Saxony, in 1723; and, with the exception of three years, resided in Denmark from 1754 to 1788, in which latter year he died. He was invited to Denmark by the sovereign, and, at the time of his decease, was chancellor of the university of Kiel. He translated Bossuet's Universal History, the Homilies of St. Chrysostom, and the Psalms of David in verse; and wrote the Northern Spectator, three vols.; Sermons, twenty-two vols.; and Poems, three vols. Eminent in many ways, it is as a votary of the muses that he is most famous; Germany ranks him among her best lyric poets.—Davenport.

CRANE; a tall and long-necked fowl, which according to Isidore takes its name from its voice, which we imitate in mentioning it. The prophet Jeremiah mentions this bird as intelligent of the seasons by an instinctive and invariable observation of their appointed times, (8: 7.) The same thing is noticed by Aristophanes and Hesiod; the latter of whom says, "When thou hearest the voice of the crane, clamoring annually from the clouds on high, recollect that this is the signal for ploughing, and indicates the approach of showery winter."—Calmet; Albott; Ency. Amer.

CRANMER, (THOMAS,) a celebrated English reformer, was the son of a country gentleman. He was born at Aslacton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1489, and was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, where, in 1523, he became reader of the divinity lecture. For his rise, he was indebted to an opinion which he chanced to give to Gardiner and Fox, that the best way to settle the question relative to the king's divorce would be to refer it to the universities instead of to the pope. Henry instantly made him his chaplain, ordered him to write on the subject, and subsequently employed him in negotiations at Rome, and in other parts of the continent. On Cranmer's return, the monarch raised him, in 1533, to the archbishopric of Canterbury. Thus elevated, and invested with powerful influence, the archbishop pursued with vigor the work of religious reformation. His enemies labored as strenuously to ruin him; but he was always upheld by Henry. Being a member of the council of regency, during the reign of Edward VI., he was enabled to push forward an ecclesiastical reform with still more decisive effect. But, unfortunately, he now displayed a spirit which has stained his otherwise amiable character, with a deep and bloody spot. Besides being guilty of minor acts of tyranny, he consigned to the flames, as heretics, two unhappy beings, one of them a woman! This was Joan Bocher, the warrant for whose execution was in a manner extorted from the youthful monarch, who signed it in tears, and threw on Cranmer the moral responsibility of the barbarous deed. Having consented to the measures for placing lady Jane Grey on the throne, he became one of the victims after the accession of Mary. Lured by the promise not only of pardon but of royal favor, he was induced to sign six papers, by which he recanted his Protestant principles, and avowed his sorrow for having entertained them. In spite, however, of the promises made to him, he was brought to the stake, March 21, 1556. He had by this time recovered his firmness, and he died with the utmost fortitude, holding in the flames, till it was consumed, the hand which had signed the recantation, and exclaiming, "This unworthy hand! this unworthy hand!" His forgiving disposition, which led him never to revenge an injury, his extensive liberality, his services to the cause of ecclesiastical reform, and his courage at the hour of death, notwithstanding his faults, have shed a lustre round the memory of Cranmer.—Davenport; Middleton; Ency. Amer.; Jones's Chris. Biog.; Life of Cranmer, by Le Bas.

CRANTZ, or KRANZ, (DAVID,) a Moravian preacher, was born in Pomerania, in 1723, and resided for some years as a missionary in Greenland, where he was much respected for his virtues. He died, in 1777, minister of Guadenfroy, in Silesia. He is the author of a valuable history of Greenland; and of a history of the Moravians.—Davenport.

CREATION. (See COSMOGONY, and ADAM.)
CREATURE. By the creature (or, more properly, the creation) which waits for deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God, (Rom. 8: 19—23.) the apostle has by some been supposed to mean the unrenewed heathen world; by others, the new creature in Christ, or Christians in general; by others, all mankind of all generations. By others still it is supposed not to include mankind at all, but only the irrational tribes of creation who are now subjected to degradation and suffering in consequence of the sins of men. But from the context it appears rather to mean the whole material globe, which constitutes man's present residence; which is now subjected to imperfection, change, and decay, but is to undergo at the last day a transmutation of qualities similar to that of the bodies of just men, and become forever incorruptible. 1 Cor. 15: 50—54. 2 Cor. 5: 1—8. 2 Pet. 3. Rev. 21. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, (2 Cor. 5: 17.) that is, if any man becomes a Christian, a new disposition is produced within him, which transforms his whole character.—Fuller's Works, vol. ii. 322.

CREDITOR. God is represented as our creditor; to him we, as creatures, owe our existence, and all we have; to him, as sinners, we owe satisfaction for our infinite offences; and the more he forgives us, the more we ought to love him. Luke 7: 41—43.—Brown.

CREED; a form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended. It is derived from the Latin credo (I believe), with which the apostles' creed begins. In the Eastern church, a summary of this sort was called mathe-ma (the lesson), because it was learned by the catechu-mens; graphē (the writing), or kanōn (the rule). But the most common name in the Greek church was symbolon, or symbol, which term has also passed into the West. Hence creeds and confessions are commonly called symbolical books.

The most ancient form of creeds is that which goes under the name of the Apostles' creed (see below); besides this, there are several other ancient forms and scattered remains of creeds to be met with in the primitive records of the church; as, 1. The form of apostolical doctrine collected by Origen.—2. A fragment of a creed preserved by Tertullian.—3. A remnant of a creed in the works of Cyprian.—4. A creed composed by Gregory Thaumaturgus for the use of his own church.—5. The creed of Lucian, the martyr.—6. The creed of the apostolical constitutions. Besides these scattered remains of the ancient creeds, there are extant some perfect forms, as those of Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Antioch, &c.—Head. Buck.

CREED, (APOSTLES') is a formula or summary of the Christian faith, drawn up, according to Rufinus, by the apostles themselves; who, during their stay at Jerusalem, soon after our Lord's ascension, agreed upon this creed as a rule of faith. Baronius and others conjecture that they did not compose it till the second year of Claudius, a little before their dispersion; but there are many reasons which induce us to question whether the apostles composed any such creed. For, 1. Neither St. Luke, nor any other writer before the fifth century, make any mention of an assembly of the apostles for composing a creed.—2. The fathers of the first three centuries, in disputing against the heretics, endeavor to prove that the doctrine contained in this creed was the same which the apostles taught; but they never pretend that the apostles composed it.—3. If the apostles had made this creed, it would have been the same in all churches and in all ages; and all authors would have cited it after the same manner. But the case is quite otherwise. In the second and third ages of the church, there were as many creeds as authors; and the same author sets down the creed after a different manner in several places of his works; which is an evidence that there was not, at that time, any creed reputed to be the apostles'. In the fourth century, Rufinus compares together the three ancient creeds of the churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the East, which differ very considerably. Besides, these creeds differed not only in the terms and expressions, but even in the articles, some of which were omitted in one or other of them; such as those of the descent into hell, the communion of the saints, and the life everlasting. From all which it may be gathered, that though this creed may be said to be that of the apostles, in regard to the doctrines contained therein, yet it cannot be referred to them as the authors of it. Its great antiquity, however, may be inferred from hence, that the whole form, as it now stands in the English liturgy, is to be found in the works of Ambrose and Rufinus; the former of whom flourished in the third, and the latter in the fourth century. Christians did not publicly recite the creed, except at baptisms, which, unless in cases of necessity, were only at Easter and Whitsuntide. The constant repeating of it was not introduced into the church till the end of the fifth century; about which time Peter Gnaphius, bishop of Antioch, prescribed the recital of it every time divine service was performed. See King's History of the Apostles' Creed; and Borrow's Exposition of it in his Works, vol. ii.—Head. Buck.

CREED, (ATHANASIAN;) a formula or confession of faith, long supposed to have been drawn up by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, to justify himself against the calumnies of his Arian enemies; but it is now generally allowed not to have been his. Dr. Waterland ascribes it to Hilary, bishop of Arles. This creed obtained in France about A. D. 850, and was received in Spain and Germany about one hundred and eighty years later. We have clear proofs of its being sung alternately in the English churches in the tenth century. It was in common use in some parts of Italy in 960, and was received at Rome about 1014. As to the Greek and Oriental churches, it has been questioned whether they have ever received it, though some writers are of a contrary persuasion. The Episcopal churches in the United States have rejected it. As to the matter of it, it is given as a summary of the true orthodox faith. Unhappily, however, it has proved a fruitful source of unprofitable controversy. See Dr. Waterland's Critical History of it.—Head. Buck.

CREED, (NICENE;) a formula of Christian faith; so called, because it is a paraphrase of that creed which was made at the first general council of Nice. This latter was drawn up by the second general council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, and therefore might be more properly styled the Constantinopolitan creed. The creed was carried by a majority, and was admitted into the church as a barrier against Arius and his followers.

The three creeds above mentioned are used in the public offices of the church of England, and subscription to them is required of all the established clergy. Subscription to these was also required of the dissenting teachers by the toleration act; but from which they are now relieved by 19 George III.—Head. Buck.

CRESCENS; a companion of Paul, (2 Tim. 4: 10.) who is thought by Eusebius and others to have preached in Gaul, and to have founded the church of Vienne, in Dauphiny.—Calmet.

CRÈTE; a large island, now called Candia, in the Mediterranean, (1 Mac. 10: 67.) almost opposite to Egypt; and it may be considered as having been originally peopled from thence, probably by a branch of the Capthorim. The Cretans affected the utmost antiquity as a nation, and distinguished themselves as Etecretenses, "true Cretans." Homer celebrates this island as famous for its hundred gates, which Virgil (Æneid iii.) seems to refer to cities; but in the Odyssey, Homer calls it "ninety-cities." Being surrounded by the sea, its inhabitants were excellent sailors, and its vessels visited all coasts. They were also famous for archery, which they practised from their infancy. But the glory of Crete was Minos the legislator, the first, it is said, who reduced a wild people to regularity of life; and in order to effect this the more completely, he retired during nine years into the cavern of Jupiter. After nine years, Minos established religious rites; and these and other usages of Crete were copied by the Greeks.

The Cretans were one of the three K's against whose unfaithfulness the Grecian proverb cautioned: Kappadocia, Kivicia, and Krete. It appears, also, that the character of this people for lying was thoroughly established in ancient times; for in common speech, the expression "to cretanise," signified to tell lies; which contributes to account for that detestable character the apostle (Titus 1: 12.) has given of the Cretans, that they are "always liars." This was not only the opinion of Epimeneides, from whom Paul quotes this verse, but of Callimachus, who has the same words. When Epimeneides adds, that "the Cretans are savage beasts," or fierce beasts, "and gor-bellies,"—bellies which take a long time in being filled—he completes a most disgusting description. Polybius represents them as disgraced by piracy, robbery, and almost every crime, and Paul charges Titus to rebuke them sharply, and in strong terms, to prevent their adherence to Jewish fables, human ordinances, and legal observances.

Crete was taken by the Romans under Metellus, hence called Creticans, after a vigorous resistance of above two years, (A. D. 66.) and, with the small kingdom of Cyrene, on the coast of Libya, formed a Roman province. In the reign of the emperor Leo, it had twelve bishops, subject to Constantinople. In the reign of Michael II. the Saracens seized it, and held it, until, after a hundred and twenty-seven years, they were expelled by the emperor Phocas. It remained under the dominion of the emperor, till Baldwin, earl of Flanders, being raised to the throne, rewarded Bonifacio, marquis of Montserrat, with it, who sold it to the Venetians, A. D. 1194. Under their government it flourished greatly; but was unexpectedly attacked by the Turks, A. D. 1645, in the midst of peace. The siege lasted twenty-four years, and cost the Turks two hundred thousand men. It is now subject to the Turks, and, consequently, is impoverished and depopulated. In many places it is unhealthy.—Calmet.

CRIME; a voluntary breach of any known law. Faults result from human weakness, being transgressions of the rules of duty. Crimes proceed from the wickedness of the heart, being actions against the rules of nature. (See PUNISHMENT, and SIN).—Hend. Buck.

CRISP, (DR. TOBIAS;) a divine of the seventeenth century, born, 1600, died rector of Brinkworth, 1642. His life was distinguished by charity, piety, humility, and purity. He was, however, fond of expressions which alarm, and paradoxes which astonish; and perplexed himself much about the divine purposes. He did not distinguish, as he ought, between God's secret will in his decrees, and his revealed will in his covenant and promises. The root of his error seems to be this:—he viewed the union between Christ and the believer to be of such a kind as actually to make a Savior of the sinner, and a sinner of the Savior. He speaks as if God considered the sinner as doing and suffering what Christ did and suffered; and Christ as having committed their sins, and as being actually guilty of them. (See ANTIOMIANS, and NEOMIANS).—Crisp's Sermons, edited by Dr. Gill; Bogue and Benuet's History of Dissenters, vol. i. p. 400; Hend. Buck.

CRISPUS, chief of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, was converted and baptized by Paul, (Acts 18: 8.) about A. D. 52. 1 Cor. 1: 14. Some affirm that Crispus was bishop of Ægina, an island near Athens. The Greeks observe his festival, October 4.—Calmet.

CRITICISM. (See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.)

CROCODILE. (See LEVIATHAN.)

CROISADES. (See CRUSADES.)

CROISIERS; a religious order, founded in honor of the invention or discovery of the cross by the empress Helena. They were, till of late, dispersed in several parts of Europe, particularly in the Low Countries, France, and Bohemia; those of Italy were suppressed even before the late revolutions. These religious follow the rule of St. Augustine. They had in England the name of Crouched Friars.—Hend. Buck.

CROOKED. A crooked nation or generation are such as rebel against God, have their qualities, inclinations, and practices quite disagreeable to the even rule of his law, and unanswerable to their own profession. Phil. 2: 15. Deut. 32: 5. Crooked ways are practices and customs inconstant, uncanid, unlovely, and disagreeable to the law of God. Prov. 2: 12. God makes men's lot or path crooked when he inflicts on them changes from prosperity to adversity, or from one trouble to another, and renders their condition unsightly and disagreeable. Lam. 3: 9. Eccl. 1: 15 and 7: 12. He makes crooked places straight when he removes every impediment, and renders a work easy to his agents. Isa. 45: 2.—Drama.

CROSIER; a tall staff of silver or gold, curved at the upper end, which is carried before bishops, abbots, and abbesses, as an ensign expressive of their dignity, while they are exercising the functions of their office; and the figure of which is also borne in their coat of arms. When bestowing the blessing upon the people, they take the staff into their own hands. It was originally a shepherd's crook, the bishops being regarded as the pastors of their dioceses. By degrees, the humble emblem became highly adorned, and was made of costly materials. Artists, like Benvenuto Cellini and Giovanni da Bologna, were employed to make it. The investiture of the bishop is indicated by the delivery of the crosier. Some say that the crosier was originally only a simple staff, which, from the earliest times, has been given as an emblem of authority to judges, kings, &c. In conformity to this explanation, St. Isidore says that bishops bear the staff because they have the right to correct the erring, and the duty to support the weak. The excess of splendor lavished in later times upon this instrument, gave occasion to the following satirical lines:—

In ancient times, as I have been told,

The crosier was wood, and the bishop was gold;

But now I perceive, without being told,

The bishop is wood, and the crosier is gold. [Hend. Buck.]

CROSS; an ancient instrument of capital punishment. The cross was the punishment inflicted by the Romans, on servants who had perpetrated crimes, on robbers, assassins, and rebels; among which last Jesus was reckoned, on the ground of his making himself King or Messiah, Luke 23: 1—5, 13—15. The words in which the sentence was given were, "Thou shalt go to the cross." The person who was subjected to this punishment was then deprived of all his clothes, excepting something around the loins. In this state of nudity he was beaten, sometimes with rods, but more generally with whips. Such was the severity of this flagellation, that numbers died under it. Jesus was crowned with thorns, and made the subject of mockery; but insults of this kind were not among the ordinary attendants of crucifixion. They were owing, in this case, merely to the petulant spirit of the Roman soldiers, Matt. 27: 29. Mark 15: 17. John 19: 2, 5. The criminal, having been beaten, was subjected to the further suffering of being obliged to carry the cross himself to the place of punishment, which was commonly a hill, near the public way, and out of the city. The place of crucifixion at Jerusalem was a hill to the north-west of the city. The cross, stauros, a post, otherwise called the unpropitious or infamous tree, consisted of a piece of wood erected perpendicularly, and intersected by another at right angles near the top, so as to resemble the letter T. The crime for which the person suffered was inscribed on the transverse piece near the top of the perpendicular one.

There is no mention made in ancient writers of any thing on which the feet of the person crucified rested. Near the middle, however, of the perpendicular beam, there projected a piece of wood, on which he sat, and which answered as a support to the body, since the weight of the body might otherwise have torn away the hands from the nails driven through them. The cross, which was erected at the place of punishment, being there firmly fixed in the ground, rarely exceeded ten feet in height. The victim, perfectly naked, was elevated to the small projection in the middle: the hands were then bound by a rope round the transverse beam, and nailed through the palm.

The assertion that the persons who suffered crucifixion were not in some instances fastened to the cross by nails through the hands and feet, but were merely bound to it by ropes, cannot be proved by the testimony of any ancient writer whatever. That the feet, as well as the hands, were fastened to the cross by means of nails, is expressly asserted in the play of Plautus, entitled "Mostellaria," compared with Tertullian against the Jews, and against Marcion. In regard to the nailing of the feet, it may be furthermore observed, that Gregory Nazianzenus has asserted, that one nail only was driven through both of them; but Cyprian, (de passione), who had been a personal witness to crucifixions, and is, consequently, in this case, the better authority, states, on the contrary, that two nails or spikes were driven, one through each foot. The crucified person remained suspended in this way till he died, and the corpse had become putrid. While he exhibited any signs of life, he was watched by a guard; but they left him when it appeared that he was dead. The corpse was not buried, except by express permission, which was sometimes granted by the emperor on his birth-day, but only to a very few. An exception, however, to this general practice was made by the Romans in favor of the Jews, on account of Deut. 21: 22, 23; and in Judea, accordingly, crucified persons were buried on the same day. When, therefore, there was not a prospect that they would die on the day of the crucifixion, the executioners hastened the extinction of life, by kindling a fire under the cross, so as to suffocate them with the smoke, or by letting loose wild beasts upon them, or by breaking their bones upon the cross with a mallet, as upon an anvil. The Jews, in the times of which we are speaking, namely, while they were under the jurisdiction of the Romans, were in the habit of giving the criminal, before the commencement of his sufferings, a medicated drink of wine and myrrh, Prov. 31: 6. The object of this was to produce intoxication, and thereby render the pains of the crucifixion less sensible to the sufferer. This beverage was refused by the Savior, for the obvious reason, that he chose to die with the faculties of his mind undisturbed and unclouded, Matt. 27: 34. Mark 15: 23. It should be remarked, that this sort of drink, which was probably offered out of kindness, was different from the vinegar which was subsequently offered to the Savior by the Roman soldiers. The latter was a mixture of vinegar and water, denominated posca, and was a common drink for the soldiers in the Roman army, Luke 23: 35. John 19: 29.

2. Crucifixion was not only the most ignominious, it was likewise the most cruel, mode of punishment: so very much so, that Cicero is justified in saying, in respect to crucifixion, "Ab oculis, auribusque et omni cogitatione hominum removendum esse." The sufferings endured by a person on whom this punishment is inflicted are narrated by George Gottlieb Richter, a German physician, in a "Dissertation on the Savior's Crucifixion." The position of the body is unnatural, the arms being extended back, and almost immovable. In case of the least motion, an extremely painful sensation is experienced in the hands and feet, which are pierced with nails, and in the back, which is lacerated with stripes. The nails, being driven through the parts of the hands and feet which abound in nerves and tendons, create the most exquisite anguish. The exposure of so many wounds to the open air brings on an inflammation, which every motion increases the poignancy of the suffering. In those parts of the body which are distended or pressed, more blood flows through the arteries than can be carried back in the veins. The consequence is, that a greater quantity of blood finds its way from the aorta into the head and stomach, than would be carried there by a natural and undisturbed circulation. The blood vessels of the head become pressed and swollen, which of course causes pain, and a redness of the face. The circumstance of the blood being impelled in more than ordinary quantities into the stomach is an unfavorable one also, because it is that part of the system which not only admits of the blood being stationary, but is peculiarly exposed to mortification. The aorta, not being at liberty to empty in the free and undisturbed way as formerly, the blood which it receives from the left ventricle of the heart, is unable to receive its usual quantity. The blood of the lungs, therefore, is unable to find a free circulation. This general obstruction extends its effects likewise to the right ventricle, and the consequence is, an internal excitement, and exertion, and anxiety, which are more intolerable than the anguish of death itself. All the large vessels about the heart, and all the veins and arteries in that part of the system, on account of the accumulation and pressure of blood, are the source of inexpressible misery. The degree of anguish is gradual in its increase; and the person crucified is able to live under it commonly till the third, and sometimes till the seventh day. Pilate, therefore, being surprised at the speedy termination of the Savior's life, inquired in respect to the truth of it of the centurion himself who commanded the soldiers, Mark 15: 44. In order to bring their life to a more speedy termination, so that they might be buried on the same day, the bones of the two thieves were broken with mallets, (John 19: 31—37;) and in order to ascertain this point in respect to Jesus, namely, whether he was really dead, or whether he had merely fallen into a swoon, a soldier thrust his lance into his side; but no signs of life appeared, John 19: 31—37.

Our Savior says, that whosoever will be his disciple must take up his cross and follow him, (Matt. 16: 24;) by which is meant, that his disciples must be willing to suffer for him, in any way in which God, in the course of his providence, may call them to suffer; even to endure martyrdom, if called to it. The cross is also often put for the whole of Christ's sufferings, (Eph. 2: 16. Heb. 12: 2;) and the doctrine of his perfect atonement, Gal. 6: 14.—Watson.

CROSS, (THE SIGN OF.) The cross was used emblematically before the Christian era. Upon a multitude of medals and ancient monuments are to be found crosses placed in the hands of statues of Victory, and of figures of emperors. It was also placed upon a globe, which, ever since the days of Augustus, has been the sign of the empire of the world, and the image of Victory. The shields, the cuirasses, the helmets, the imperial cap, were all thus decorated. The cross is now the universal Christian emblem, being used upon the arms and banners of the soldier, the vestments of the priest, and in the armorial bearings of nobles. The forms of cathedrals, and often the patterns of their pavements, are adapted to the representation of the cross, which is also sculptured and elevated upon tombs and sepulchres. In order to understand the meaning of the sign of the cross among the first Christians, it must be kept in mind, that the cross was in their eyes an instrument of infamous punishment, like the gallows at present, and that they assumed this sign to show that they gloried in being the followers of Christ, notwithstanding the infamy which had been attempted to be thrown upon him by the manner of his execution. When the true spirit of Christianity began to decay, this superstition spread rapidly. The custom of making the sign of the cross in memory of Jesus, may be traced to the third century of our era. Constantine the Great had crosses erected in public places, in palaces and churches. It was customary, in his time, to paint a cross at the entrance of a house, to denote that it belonged to a Christian. Subsequently, the churches were, for the greater part, built in the form of this instrument. But it did not become an object of adoration until the empress Helena (Constantine's mother) found a cross in Palestine, which was believed to be the one on which Christ suffered, and conveyed a part of it to Constantinople. This is the origin of the festival of the finding of the cross, which the Catholic church celebrates on the 3d of May. Standards and weapons were now ornamented with it; and the emperor Heraclius thought he had recovered the palladium of his empire, when he gained possession of a piece of the true cross, in 628, which had fallen into the hands of the Persians in 616. In memory of this event, the festival of the exaltation of the cross was instituted, Heraclius having caused the cross to be erected at Jerusalem, on mount Calvary. This festival is celebrated on the 14th of September. It is remarkable how this holy relic became multiplied. Numberless churches possessed some part of it, the miraculous power of which was said to have been proved by the most astonishing facts; and many persons actually believed that it could be infinitely divided without decreasing! It was in vain that the Iconoclasts, who condemned the worship of images, attempted to overthrow the adoration of the cross. The crucifix was considered as a principal object of worship, in preference to the images of the saints, and in compliance with the teachings of John of Damascus, was adored, during the seventh century, in all the churches of the East. That the West also ascribed a mysterious power to this symbol, is evident from the use which was made of it in the trials "by the judgment of God" in the middle ages. There never has existed any sign which has been so often repeated in works of art as the cross. This may be ascribed, in part, to its form being applicable to many more purposes than those of other emblems; such, for instance, as the crescent. The distinguishing cypher of the Jesuits is IHS, which signifies In hac cruce salus, or Jesus, in Greek letters, and abbreviated. Crosses have been the badge of numberless orders, military and civil. To make the sign of the cross, is thought by many people, in Catholic countries, a defence against evil spirits, evil influences, &c. The Greeks make this sign constantly, hardly taking a glass of raky without signing the cross over it. In Russia, the common people never commit any act of gross wickedness without doing the same. Catholic bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses wear a small golden cross. The Catholic benediction is generally performed by making the sign of the cross over the object.

In the administration of the ordinance of baptism, the practice of making the sign of the cross on the forehead of the person baptized, was adopted at an early period, though not enjoined by any command, or sanctioned by any example in Scripture. The first Christian writer who mentions it, in connection with baptism, is Tertullian, who wrote after the middle of the second century. How melancholy are the effects of human superstition!—Hend. Buck.

CROSS-BEARER, (porte-croix, cruciger;) in the Roman Catholic church, the chaplain of an archbishop, or a primate, who bears a cross before him on solemn occasions. The pope has the cross borne before him every where; a patriarch any where out of Rome; and primates, metropolitans, and those who have a right to the pallium, throughout their respective jurisdictions. Gregory XI. forbade all patriarchs and prelates to have it borne in the presence of cardinals. A prelate wears a single cross, a patriarch a double cross, and the pope a triple one on his arms.—Hend. Buck.

CROWN, is a term properly taken for a cap of state worn on the heads of sovereign princes, as a mark of regal dignity. In Scripture there is frequent mention made of crowns; and the use of them seems to have been very common among the Hebrews. The high-priest wore a crown, which was girt about his mitre, or the lower part of his bonnet, and was tied about his head. On the fore part was a plate of gold, with these words engraven on it: "Holiness to the Lord," Exod. 28: 36. 29: 6. New-married persons of both sexes wore crowns upon their wedding day, (Cant. 3: 11;) and, alluding to this custom, it is said that when God entered into covenant with the Jewish nation, he put a beautiful crown upon their head, Ez. 16: 12. The first crowns were no more than a bandelet drawn round the head, and tied behind, as we see it still represented on medals, &c. Afterwards, they consisted of two bandelets; by degrees they took branches of trees of divers kinds, &c.; at length they added flowers; and Claudius Sarrutinus says there was not any plant of which crowns had not been made.

There was always a difference, either in matter or form, between the crowns of kings and great men, and those of private persons. The crown of a king was generally a white fillet bound about his forehead, the extremities whereof being tied behind the head, fell back on the neck. Sometimes they were made of gold tissue, adorned with jewels. That of the Jewish high-priest, which is the most ancient of which we have any description, was a fillet of gold placed upon his forehead, and tied with a ribbon of a hyacinth color, or azure blue. The crown, mitre, and diadem, royal fillet and tiara, are frequently confounded. Crowns were bestowed on kings and princes, as the principal marks of their dignity. David took the crown of the king of the Ammonites from off his head: the crown weighed a talent of gold, and was moreover enriched with jewels, 2 Sam. 12: 30. 1 Chron. 20: 2. The Amalekite, who valued himself on killing Saul, brought this prince's crown unto David, 2 Sam. 1: 10. The crown was placed upon the head of young king Josiah, when he was presented to the people, in order to be acknowledged by them, 2 Chron. 23: 11. Baruch says that the idols of the Babylonians were golden crowns, Baruch 6: 9. Queens, too, wore diadems among the Persians. King Ahasuerus honored Vashti with this mark of power; and, after her divorce, the same favor was granted to Esther, chap. 2: 17. The elders, in Rev. 4: 10, are said to "cast their crowns before the throne." The allusion is here to the tributary kings dependent upon the Roman emperors. Herod took off his diadem in the presence of Augustus, till ordered to replace it. Tiridates did homage to Nero by laying the ensigns of royalty at the foot of his statue.

Pilate's guard platted a crown of thorns, and placed it on the head of Jesus Christ, (Matt. 27: 29,) with an intention to insult him, under the character of the king of the Jews. (See THORN.) In a figurative sense, a crown signifies honor, splendor, or dignity, (Lam. 5: 16. Phil. 4: 1,) and is also used for reward, because conquerors, in the Grecian games, were crowned, 1 Cor. 9: 25.—Watson.

CRUCIFIX; a cross, upon which the body of Christ is fastened in effigy, used by the Roman Catholics, to excite in their minds a strong idea of our Savior's passion.—Hend. Buck.

CRUCIFIXION. (See CROSS.)

CRUCIGER, (CASPAR,) one of the early reformers, was born at Leipsic, in 1504, of religious parents, who took pains with his religious as well as literary education. He was naturally inclined to melancholy, loved retirement and meditation, and spoke little. Collected in himself, he was absent in company, which led his parents to suppose him dull of understanding. This fear was soon dispelled; for when put under an able master, he displayed a reach and strength of genius which surprised every one that knew him. Nothing in human science was too difficult for his comprehension, and his industry equalled the clearness of his judgment and penetration of his mind. At the same time he was modest, meek, and humble, patient, chaste, and pious. He studied theology at Wittenburg, where also he became profoundly skilled in the Hebrew. Being called to Magdeburg, he there taught with great success and applause till 1527, when he was recalled to Wittenburg. Here he was occupied in preaching and expounding the Scriptures with such judgment and usefulness, that he soon received the degree of doctor in divinity. Botany and medicine also he studied and practised with much pleasure. Here also he aided Luther in his translation of the Bible, and became endeared to that great man by his probity and sound doctrine. He was very expert in writing, being able to write with ease and exactness whatever was spoken. To this extraordinary faculty we are indebted for many of Luther's precious remains. His health giving way under his incessant studies and labors, he continued to glorify God in sickness, realizing to the last the truth of the divine promises. He died in 1548, aged forty-four years.—Middleton's Evang. Biog.

CRUDEN, (ALEXANDER,) compiler of the Concordance to the Holy Scriptures, was born at Aberdeen, in 1704, and educated at the Marischal college in that city. In 1733, he took up his stated residence in London, and engaged as a corrector of the press, blending with this occupation the trade of a bookseller, which he carried on in a shop under the Royal Exchange. Here his literary attainments, indefatigable industry, and strict integrity, procured him the esteem of several persons eminent for their wealth and influence, through whose interference he obtained the appointment of bookseller to the queen, vacant by the death of Mr. Matthews. His Concordance first made its appearance in 1737, and was dedicated to her majesty queen Caroline, consort of George II., who graciously accepted a copy of the work at the hands of the author, expressed her great satisfaction therewith, and declared her intention of remembering him, but lived only sixteen days after the presentation. Her death precluded the performance of her promise, and was a sore disappointment to poor Cruden, who became embarrassed in pecuniary difficulties, which compelled him to dispose of his stock in trade, abandon his shop, and he was eventually confined in an asylum for insane persons, at Bethnal Green. Recovering the use of his mental faculties, he returned to his former occupation of correcting the press. He was a member of the Congregational church in Great Saint Helen's, under the pastoral care of Dr. Guyse, whom he styled his "faithful and beloved pastor." He lived to see a third edition of his valuable Concordance published, in 1769; after which he visited Aberdeen, his native place, where he continued about a year, and then returned to London, where he closed his days, at his lodgings in Camden street, Islington, on the 1st of November, 1770, aged seventy, being found dead in a praying posture. Among the many excellencies of his character, his liberality was none of the least; and the proceeds of the second and third editions of his Concordance (amounting to eight hundred pounds) enabled him to gratify it to a considerable extent. "Notwithstanding his natural infirmities," says Mr. Alexander Chalmers, "we cannot but venerate his character; he was a man whom neither infirmity nor neglect could debase; who sought consolation where alone it could be found; whose sorrows served to instruct him in the distresses of others; and who employed his prosperity to relieve those, who, in every sense, were ready to perish." Gen. Biog. Dict.; Hend. Buck.

CRUEL. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel; even their kindness ensnares and murders men's souls. Prov. 12: 10. To breathe out cruelty is to utter threatenings, and to delight in want of tender sympathy, and in doing mischief. Ps. 27: 12.—Brown.

CRUSADE, may be applied to any war undertaken on pretence of defending the cause of religion, but has been chiefly used for the expeditions of the Christians against the infidels for the conquest of Palestine.

These expeditions commenced A. D. 1096. The foundation of them was a superstitious veneration for those places where our Savior performed his miracles, and accomplished the work of man's redemption. Jerusalem had been taken and Palestine conquered by Omar. This proved a considerable interruption to the pilgrims, who flocked from all quarters to perform their devotions at the holy sepulchre. They had, however, still been allowed this liberty, on paying a small tribute to the Saracen caliphs, who were not much inclined to molest them. But, in 1064, this city changed its masters. The Turks took it from the Saracens; and being much more fierce and barbarous, the pilgrims now found they could no longer perform their devotions with the same safety. An opinion was about this time also prevalent in Europe, which made these pilgrimages much more frequent than formerly: it was imagined, that the thousand years mentioned in Rev. 20. were fulfilled; that Christ was soon to make his appearance in Palestine to judge the world; and consequently that journeys to that country were in the highest degree meritorious, and even absolutely necessary. The multitudes of pilgrims who now flocked to Palestine, meeting with a very rough reception from the Turks, filled all Europe with complaints against those infidels, who profaned the holy city, and derided the sacred mysteries of Christianity even in the place where they were fulfilled. Pope Gregory VII. had formed a design of uniting all the princes of Christendom against the Mahometans; but his exorbitant encroachments upon the civil power of princes had created him so many enemies, and rendered his schemes so suspicious, that he was not able to make great progress in his undertaking. The work was reserved for a meaner instrument. Peter, commonly called the Hermit, a native of Amiens, in Picardy, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and, being deeply affected with the dangers to which that act of piety now exposed the pilgrims, as well as with the oppression under which the Eastern Christians now labored, formed the bold, and, in all appearance, impracticable design, of leading into Asia, from the farthest extremities of the West, armies sufficient to subdue those potent and warlike nations that now held the Holy Land in slavery. He proposed his scheme to pope Martin II., who prudently resolving not to interpose his authority till he saw a probability of success, summoned at Placentia a council of four thousand ecclesiastics and thirty thousand seculars. As no hall could be found large enough to contain such a multitude, the assembly was held in a plain. Here the pope himself, as well as Peter, harangued the people, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the East, and the indignity offered to the Christian name in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of the infidels. These speeches were so agreeable to those who heard them, that the whole multitude suddenly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devoted themselves to perform this service, which they believed to be meritorious in the sight of God. But though Italy seemed to have embraced the design with ardor, Martin thought it necessary, in order to obtain perfect success, to engage the greater and more warlike nations in the same enterprise. Having, therefore, exhorted Peter to visit the chief cities and sovereigns of Christendom, he summoned another council at Clermont, in Auvergne. The fame of this great and pious design being now universally diffused, procured the attendance of the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes; and when the pope and the hermit renewed their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, as if impelled by immediate inspiration, exclaimed with one voice, "It is the will of God!" These words were deemed so much the effect of a divine impulse, that they were employed as the signal of rendezvous and battle in all future exploits of these adventurers. Men of all ranks now flew to arms with the utmost ardor, and a cross was affixed to their right shoulder by all who enlisted in this holy enterprise. At this time, Europe was sunk in the most profound ignorance and superstition. The ecclesiastics had gained the greatest ascendancy over the human mind; and the people, who committed the most horrid crimes and disorders, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed on them by their spiritual pastors. But amidst the abject superstition which now prevailed, the military spirit had also universally diffused itself; and, though not supported by art or discipline, was become the general passion of the nations governed by the feudal law. All the great lords possessed the right of peace and war. They were engaged in continual hostilities with one another: the open country was become a scene of outrage and disorder: the cities, still mean and poor, were neither guarded by walls nor protected by privileges. Every man was obliged to depend for safety on his own force, or his private alliances; and valor was the only excellence which was held in esteem, or gave one man the pre-eminence above another. When all the particular superstitions therefore were here united in one great object, the ardor for private hostilities took the same direction; "and all Europe," as the princess Anna Comnena expresses it, "torn from its foundations, seemed ready to precipitate itself in one united body upon Asia."

All ranks of men now deeming the crusades the only road to heaven, were impatient to open the way with their swords to the holy city. Nobles, artisans, peasants, even priests, enrolled their names; and to decline this service, was branded with the reproach of impiety or cowardice. The nobles were moved, by the romantic spirit of the age, to hope for opulent establishments in the East, the chief seat of arts and commerce at that time. In pursuit of these chimerical projects, they sold at low prices their ancient castles and inheritances, which had now lost all value in their eyes. The infirm and aged contributed to the expedition by presents and money, and many of them attended it in person; being determined, if possible, to breathe their last in sight of that city where their Savior died for them. Even women, concealing their sex under the disguise of armor, attended the camp; and often forgot their duty still more by prostituting themselves to the army. The greatest criminals were forward in a service which they considered as an expiation for all crimes; and the most enormous disorders were, during the course of these expeditions, committed by men inured to wickedness, encouraged by example, and impelled by necessity. The adventurers were at last so numerous, that their sagacious leaders became apprehensive lest the greatness of the armament would be the cause of its own disappointment. For this reason they permitted an undisciplined multitude, computed at three hundred thousand men, to go before them under the command of Peter the Hermit, and Gautier or Walter, surnamed the Moneyless, from his being a soldier of fortune. These took the road towards Constantinople, through Hungary and Bulgaria; and trusting that Heaven, by supernatural assistance, would supply all their necessities, they made no provision for subsistence in their march. They soon found themselves obliged to obtain by plunder what they vainly expected from miracles; and the enraged inhabitants of the countries through which they passed attacked the disorderly multitude, and slaughtered them without resistance. The more disciplined armies followed after; and, passing the straits of Constantinople, were mustered in the plains of Asia, and amounted in the whole to seven hundred thousand men. The princes engaged in this first crusade were, Hugo, count of Vermandois, brother to Philip I., king of France; Robert, duke of Normandy; Robert, earl of Flanders; Raymond, earl of Toulouse and St. Giles; the celebrated Godfrey of Bouillon, duke of Lorraine, with his brothers Baldwin and Eustace; Stephen, earl of Chartres and Blois; Hugo, count of St. Paul; with many other lords. The general rendezvous was at Constantinople. In this expedition, Godfrey besieged and took the city of Nice. Jerusalem was taken by the confederated army, and Godfrey chosen king. The Christians gained the famous battle of Ascalon against the sultan of Egypt, which put an end to the first crusade, but not to the spirit of crusading. The rage continued for near two centuries. The second crusade, in 1144, was headed by the emperor Conrade III., and Louis VII., king of France. The emperor's army was either destroyed by the enemy, or perished through the treachery of Manuel, the Greek emperor; and the second army, through the unfaithfulness of the Christians of Syria, was forced to break up the siege of Damascus. The third crusade, in 1188, immediately followed the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin, the sultan of Egypt. The princes engaged in this expedition were, the emperor Frederic Barbarossa; Frederic, duke of Swabia, his second son; Leopold, duke of Austria; Berthold, duke of Moravia; Herman, marquis of Baden; the counts of Nassau, Thuringia, Missen, and Holland; and above sixty other princes of the empire; with the bishops of Besancon, Cambray, Munster, Osnaburg, Missen, Passau, Visburg, and several others. In this expedition, the emperor Frederic defeated the sultan of Iconium: his son Frederic, joined by Guy Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, in vain endeavored to take Acre or Ptolemais. During these transactions, Philip Augustus, king of France, and Richard I. king of England, joined the crusade; by which means the Christian army consisted of three hundred thousand fighting men; but great disputes happening between the kings of France and England, the former quitted the Holy Land, and Richard concluded a peace with Saladin. The fourth crusade was undertaken in 1195, by the emperor Henry VI., after Saladin's death. In this expedition, the Christians gained several battles against the infidels, took a great many towns, and were in the way of success, when the death of the emperor obliged them to quit the Holy Land and return into Germany. The fifth crusade was published by pope Innocent III., in 1198. Those engaged in it made fruitless efforts for the recovery of the Holy Land; for, though John de Neule, who commanded the fleet equipped in Flanders, arrived at Ptolemais a little after Simon of Montfort, Renard of Dampierre, and others, yet the plague destroying many of them, and the rest either returning, or engaging in the petty quarrels of the Christian princes, there was nothing done; so that the sultan of Aleppo easily defeated their troops, in 1204. The sixth crusade began in 1228; in which the Christians took the town of Damietta, but were forced to surrender it again. In 1229, the emperor Frederic made peace with the sultan for ten years. About 1240, Richard earl of Cornwall, brother to Henry III. king of England, arrived in Palestine, at the head of the English crusade; but finding it most advantageous to conclude a peace, he re-embarked, and steered towards Italy. In 1244, the Karasians, being driven out of Turkey by the Tartars, broke into Palestine, and gave the Christians a general defeat near Gaza. The seventh crusade was headed, in 1249, by St. Lewis, who took the town of Damietta; but a sickness happening in the Christian army, the king endeavored a retreat; in which, being pursued by the infidels, most of his army were miserably butchered, and himself and the nobility taken prisoners. A truce was agreed upon for ten years, and the king and lords set at liberty. The eighth crusade, in 1279, was headed by the same prince, who made himself master of the port and castle of Carthage, in Africa; but dying a short time after, he left his army in a very ill condition. Soon after, the king of Sicily coming up with a good fleet, and joining Philip the Bold, son and successor of Lewis, the king of Tunis, after several engagements with the Christians, in which he was always worsted, desired peace, which was granted upon conditions advantageous to the Christians; after which, both princes embarked to their own kingdoms. Prince Edward, of England, who arrived at Tunis at the time of this treaty, sailed towards Ptolemais, where he landed a small body of three hundred English and French, and hindered Bendochar from laying siege to Ptolemais: but being obliged to return to take possession of the crown of England, this crusade ended without contributing any thing to the recovery of the Holy Land. In 1291, the town of Acre or Ptolemais was taken and plundered by the sultan of Egypt, and the Christians quite driven out of Syria. There has been no crusade since that period, though several popes have attempted to stir up the Christians to such an undertaking; particularly Nicholas IV., in 1292, and Clement V., in 1311.

Though these crusades were effects of the most absurd superstition, they tended greatly to promote the good of Europe. Multitudes, indeed, were destroyed. M. Voltaire computes the people who perished in the different expeditions, at upwards of two millions. Many there were, however, who returned; and these having conversed so long with people who lived in a much more magnificent way than themselves, began to entertain some taste for a refined and polished way of life. Thus the barbarism in which Europe had been so long immersed, began to wear off soon after. The princes, also, who remained at home, found means to avail themselves of the frenzy of the people. By the absence of such numbers of restless and martial adventurers, peace was established in their dominions. They also took the opportunity of annexing to their crowns many considerable fiefs, either by purchase, or the extinction of the heirs; and thus the mischiefs which must always attend feudal governments were considerably lessened. With regard to the bad success of the crusaders, it was scarcely possible that any other thing could happen to them. The emperors of Constantinople, instead of assisting, did all in their power to disconcert their schemes; they were jealous, and not without reason, of such an inundation of barbarians. Yet, had they considered their true interests, they would rather have assisted them, or at least stood neuter, than enter into alliances with the Turks. They followed the latter method, however, and were often of very great disservice to the western adventurers, which at last occasioned the loss of their city. But the worst enemies the crusaders had were their own internal feuds and dissensions. They neither could agree while marching together in armies with a view to conquest, nor could they unite their conquests under one government after they had made them. They set up three small states, one at Jerusalem, another at Antioch, and another at Edessa. These states, instead of assisting, made war upon each other, and on the Greek emperors; and thus became an easy prey to the common enemy. The horrid cruelties they committed, too, must have inspired the Turks with the most invincible hatred against them, and made them resist with the greatest obstinacy. They were such as could have been committed only by barbarians inflamed with the most bigoted enthusiasm. When Jerusalem was taken, not only the numerous garrison were put to the sword, but the inhabitants were massacred without mercy and without distinction. No age or sex was spared, not even sucking children. According to Voltaire, some Christians, who had been suffered by the Turks to live in that city, led the conquerors into the most private caves, where women had concealed themselves with their children, and not one of them was suffered to escape. What eminently shows the enthusiasm by which these conquerors were animated, is their behavior after this terrible slaughter. They marched over heaps of dead bodies towards the holy sepulchre, and, while their hands were polluted with the blood of so many innocent persons, sung anthems to the common Savior of mankind. Nay, so far did their religious enthusiasm overcome their fury, that these ferocious conquerors now burst into tears. If the absurdity and wickedness of their conduct can be exceeded by any thing, it must be by what follows. In 1204, the frenzy of crusading seized the children, who are ever ready to imitate what they see their parents engaged in. Their childish folly was encouraged by the monks and school-masters; and thousands of those innocents were conducted from the houses of their parents, on the superstitious interpretation of these words:—"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise." Their base conductors sold a part of them to the Turks, and the rest perished miserably. See Hume's History of England, vol. i. p. 292, &c. and vol. ii. p. 280: Encyclopædia Britannica; and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History—Hend. Buch.

CRUSE; a small vessel for holding water, and other liquids, 1 Sam. 26: 11. Our translators have rendered by the word cruse, no less than three words, which are offered by the Hebrew; and which, no doubt, describe different utensils; though, perhaps, all may be taken as vessels for the purpose of containing liquid, 1 Sam. 26: 11. 1 Kings 14: 3. 2 Chron. 2: 20.—Calmet.

CRY. This word is used in several senses. "The blood of Abel crieth from the ground," where it was spilt, Gen. 4: 10. "The cry of Sodom ascended up to heaven," 18: 20. The cries of the Israelites, oppressed by the Egyptians, rose up to the throne of God, Exod. 3: 9. "He looked for judgment, but beheld oppression; for righteousness, but beheld a cry," Isa. 5: 7. "If my land cry against me, or the furrows likewise thereof complain," says Job, 31: 38. The force of these expressions is such, that any explanation would only weaken them.—Calmet.

CRYPTO-CALVINISTS; a name given, some time after the reformation, to the favorers of Calvinism in Saxony, Denmark, Sweden, &c., on account of their secret attachment to the Genevan doctrine and discipline.—Hend. Buch.

CRYSTAL. The Hebrew keresh is rendered by our translators, crystal, (Ezek. 1: 22.) fract, (Gen. 31: 40, &c.) and ice, Job 6: 16, &c. The word primarily denotes ice, and it is given to a perfectly transparent and hyaline gem, from its resemblance to this substance.—Calmet.

CUBIT; a measure used among the ancients. The Hebrews call it amek the mother of other measures; in Greek, pechus. A cubit originally was the distance from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger: this is the fourth part of a well-proportioned man's stature. The common cubit is eighteen inches. The Hebrew cubit, according to bishop Cumberland and M. Pelletier, is twenty-one inches; but others fix it at eighteen inches. The talmudists observe, that the Hebrew cubit was larger by one quarter than the Roman. Lewis Capellus and others have asserted that there were two sorts of cubits among the Hebrews, one sacred, the other common; the sacred containing three feet, the common containing a foot and a half. Moses assigns to the Levites a thousand sacred cubits of land round about their cities, (Num. 35: 4;) and in the next verse he gives them two thousand common ones. The opinion, however, is very probable, that the cubit varied in different districts and cities, and at different times, &c.—Watson.

CUCKOW; an unclean bird, Lev. 11: 16. We are not certain of the bird intended by Moses under this name: the strength of the versions is in favor of the sea-mew, or gull. Geddes renders, "the horn-owl;" but we incline to the opinion of Slaw, who understands it of the rhoad, or sof-saf, a granivorous and gregarious bird, which wants the hinder toe; though we confess we see no reason for the exclusion of this bird by Moses.—Calmet.

CUCUMBER, (Num. 11: 5;) the fruit of a plant very common in our gardens. Tournefort mentions six kinds, of which the white and green are most esteemed. They are very plentiful in the East, especially in Egypt, and much superior to ours. Maillet, in describing the vegetables which the modern Egyptians have for food, tells us, that melons, cucumbers, and onions are the most common; and Celsius and Alpinus describe the Egyptian cucumbers as more agreeable to the taste and of more easy digestion than the European.—Watson.

CUDWORTH, (RALPH, D. D.) now best known as the author of "The true Intellectual System of the Universe," was born in 1617, at Aller, in Somersetshire, of which place his father was rector. He was admitted as a pensioner of Emanuel college, Cambridge, at the age of thirteen; and so great was his diligence as an academical student, that in 1639 he took the degree of master of arts, and was elected fellow of his college. He became so eminent as a tutor, that the number of his pupils exceeded all precedent. In 1644, he took the degree of bachelor of divinity, and was chosen master of Clare-hall, and in the following year made Regius professor of Hebrew. In 1678, he was installed prebendary of Gloucester. In the same year, he published his grand work, entitled "The true Intellectual System of the Universe," &c. in folio. This work, which is an immense store-house of ancient literature, was intended by the author to be a confutation of atheism. It is a work of great power and erudition, although the attachment of the author to the Platonism of the Alexandrian school has led him to advance some opinions which border on incomprehensibility and mysticism. Besides the articles already mentioned, Dr. Cudworth published a sermon against the doctrine of "Reprobation," and also left behind him several unpublished manuscripts, of which one only, "A Treatise concerning eternal and immutable Morality," has been printed. His other unpublished manuscripts, now in the British museum, are, "A Treatise on moral Good and Evil," "A Treatise on Liberty and Necessity," "A Commentary on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel," "A Treatise on the Creation of the World," "A Treatise on the Learning of the Hebrews;" and "An Explanation of the Notion of Hobbes concerning God and Spirits."

Cudworth died at Cambridge, June 26, 1688, and was interred in the chapel of Christ's college. He was a man of very extensive erudition, excellently skilled in the learned languages and antiquity, a good mathematician, a subtle philosopher, and a profound metaphysician. Yet, with all his great attainments, he is said to have been scarcely less distinguished for his piety and modesty. According to Dr. Burnet, he considered Christianity as a revelation from God, whose object is to elevate the heart and affections, and sweeten human nature; and that "he prosecuted this with a strength of genius, and a vast compass of learning; that he was a man of great conduct and prudence; upon which his enemies did very falsely accuse him of craft and dissimulation." Lord Shaftesbury styles him "an excellent and learned divine, of the highest authority at home and abroad."—Birch's Gen. Biog.; Jones's Chris. Biog.

CULDEES; the members of a very ancient religious fraternity, whose principal seat was the island of Iona, or Icolmkill, one of the western islands of Scotland, but whose laborious missionary exertions were extended over considerable portions of Scotland, England, Wales, and Ireland, and in whose constitution we discover a simplicity of views and habits which necessarily lead us to associate them with the men of more primitive times. They owe their establishment to Columba, a native of Ireland, who, after proceeding to Scotland, and succeeding in the conversion of the northern Picts to Christianity, landed at Hii, or Iona, in the year 563, and received the island from the king of that people for the purpose of founding a monastery. Here he erected a seminary, in which he taught his disciples the Holy Scriptures, to the study of which he was himself devotedly attached; and when they were duly prepared, he sent them forth, with the holy book in their hand, to evangelize the dark and benighted regions which extended in every direction. They held no fellowship with the church of Rome, and for many centuries maintained their ground against the attempted encroachments of that see. They rejected articular confession, penance, and absolution; knew nothing of the chrism in baptism, or the rite of confirmation; and opposed the doctrine of the real presence, the worship of saints and angels, and the celibacy of the clergy, and works of supererogation. In the twelfth century, their influence began to be overpowered by the force of popish superstition; but they resisted to the very last every effort that was made to incorporate their secluded establishment with the dominant hierarchy.

Their form of government was essentially Presbyterian. To the members of their synod, or assembly, was given the name of seniores, or elders, to whom, in their collective capacity, belonged the right of appointing and ordaining those who engaged in the ministerial or missionary office. To these, when settled in any particular place, was given the designation of bishop—a dignity which does not appear to have been in any respect different from that of presbyter or pastor. These bishops, to how great soever a distance they resided from Iona, were subject to the discipline of the college, with which they kept up a regular correspondence.

It is not known in what precise year the Culdees became extinct, but there is reason to believe that, in the west of Scotland, they continued to exhibit a testimony on behalf of primitive truth in opposition to the corruptions of Rome, till very near the period when the light of the reformation was introduced into those northern parts of our island.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

CUMBER. Barren sinners in the church cumber God's ground; they offend God; they grieve ministers and saints; fill up room to no purpose, and hinder the spiritual growth of others. Luke 13: 7.—Brown.

CUMMIN, (Isa. 28: 25, 27. Matt. 23: 23.) This is an umbelliferous plant, in appearance resembling fennel, but smaller. Its seeds have a bitterish warm taste, accompanied with an aromatic flavor, not of the most agreeable kind. An essential oil is obtained from them by distillation. The Jews sowed it in their fields, and, when ripe, threshed out the seeds with a rod, Isa. 28: 25, 27. The Maltese sow it, and collect the seeds in the same manner.—Watson.

CUMMINGS, (ABRAHAM,) a missionary, graduated at Brown university, in 1776, and died at Phippsburgh, Maine, August 31, 1827, aged seventy-two. He had never any pastoral charge, but was strictly an itinerant preacher or missionary. He was known and respected in almost all the towns along the coast from Rhode Island to Passamaquoddy, especially in the islands which had no settled minister. In his little boat he often traversed, alone, the waters along the whole coast of Maine, and preached the gospel of Jesus Christ in the islands. For these toils in the cause of benevolence the world will not honor him, as it honors the blood-stained hero; but such toils will not be unrewarded. He published a few treatises.—Allea

CUP. This word is taken in a two-fold sense; proper, and figurative. In a proper sense, it signifies a vessel, such as people drink out of at meals. Gen. 40: 13. It was anciently the custom, at great entertainments, for the governor of the feast to appoint to each of his guests the kind and proportion of the wine which they were to drink, and what he had thus appointed them it was deemed a breach of good manners either to refuse or not to drink up; hence a man's cup, both in sacred and profane authors, came to signify the portion, whether of good or evil, which happens to him in this world. Thus, to drink "the cup of trembling," or of "the fury of the Lord," is to be afflicted with sore and terrible judgments, Isa. 51: 17. Jer. 25: 15—29. Ps. 75: 8. What Christ means by the expression, we cannot be at a loss to understand, since in two remarkable passages, Luke 22: 42, and John 18: 11, he has been his own interpreter. Lethale poculum bibere, "to drink the deadly cup," or cup of death, was a common phrase among the Jews; and from them, we have reason to believe, our Lord borrowed it.

CUP OF BLESSING, (1 Cor. 10: 16,) is that which was blessed in entertainments of ceremony, or solemn services; or, rather, a cup over which God was blessed for having furnished its contents; that is, for giving to men the fruit of the vine. Our Savior, in the last supper, blessed God over the cup, and gave it to each of his apostles to drink, Luke 22: 20.

CUP OF SALVATION, (Ps. 116: 13;) a phrase of nearly the same import as the former, a cup of thanksgiving, of blessing the Lord for his saving mercies. We see, in 2 Macc. 6: 27, that the Jews of Egypt, in their festivals for deliverance, offered cups of salvation. The Jews have at this day cups of thanksgiving, which are blessed, in their marriage ceremonies, and in entertainments made at the circumcision of their children. Some commentators think that "the cup of salvation" was a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses, Ex. 29: 40.—Watson.

CURATE; the lowest degree in the church of England; he who represents the incumbent of a church, parson, or vicar, and officiates in his stead: he is to be licensed and admitted by the bishop of the diocese, or by an ordinary having episcopal jurisdiction; and when a curate hath the approbation of the bishop, he usually appoints the salary too. A curate, having no fixed estate in his curacy, not being instituted and inducted, may be removed at pleasure by the bishop, or incumbent. But there are perpetual curates as well as temporary, who are appointed where tithes are inappropriate, and no vicarage endowed: these are not removable, and the appropriators are obliged to find them; some whereof have certain portions of the tithes settled on them. Curates must subscribe the declaration according to the act of uniformity, or are liable to imprisonment.—Head. Buck.

CURLA (PAPAL,) is a collective appellation of all the authorities in Rome, which exercise the rights and privileges enjoyed by the pope, as first bishop, superintendent, and pastor of the Roman Catholic church. The right to grant or confirm ecclesiastical appointments is exercised by the Dataria, or papal chancery, which has its name from the common subscription, Datum apud Sanctum Petrum. This body receives petitions, draws up answers, and collects the revenues of the pope, for the pallia, spolia, benefices, amates, &c. It is a lucrative branch of the papal government, and part of the receipts goes to the apostolic chamber. In former times, the cardinal grand penitentiary, as president of the penitentiaria, had a very great influence. He still issues all dispensations and absolutions in respect to vows, penances, fasts, &c.; in regard to which the pope has reserved to himself the dispensing power: also with respect to marriages within the degrees prohibited to Catholics. Besides these authorities, whose powers extend over all Catholic Christendom, there are in Rome several others occupied only with the government of the Roman state; as the sagra consulta, or chief criminal court, in which the cardinal secretary of state presides; the signatura di giustizia, a court for civil cases, consisting of twelve prelates, over which the cardinal pro-predicatore, or papal minister of justice, presides, and with which the signatura di grazia concurs; the apostolic chamber, in which twelve prelates are employed under the cardinal camerlingo, administering the property of the church and the papal domains, and receiving the revenue which belongs to the pope as temporal and spiritual sovereign of the Roman state, and also that which he derives from other countries which stand immediately under him, and are his fiefs. Besides these, there is a number of governors, prefects, procurators, &c. in the different branches of the administration. The drawing up of bulls, answers, and decrees, which are issued by the pope himself, or by these authorities, is done by the papal chancery, consisting of a vice-chancellor and twelve abbreviatori, assisted by several hundred secretaries: the brevés only are excepted, and are drawn up by a particular cardinal. All these offices are filled by clergymen; and many of them are so lucrative, that considerable sums are paid for them, somewhat in the same manner as commissions are purchased in the English army. At the death of Sixtus V. there existed four thousand venal offices of this kind; but this number has since been diminished, and many abuses have been abolished.

The highest council of the pope, corresponding in some measure to the privy council of a monarch, is the collegio of the cardinals, convened whenever the pope thinks fit. The sessions of this senate, which presides over all the other authorities in Rome, are called consistories. They are of three different kinds. The secret consistory is held generally twice a month, after the pope has given private audience to every cardinal. In these sessions, bishops are elected, pallia granted, ecclesiastical and political affairs of importance transacted, and resolutions adopted on the reports of the congregations delegated by the consistory. Beatifications and canonizations also originate in this body. Different from the secret are the semi-secret consistories, the deliberations of which relate principally to political affairs, and the results of them are communicated to the ambassadors of foreign powers. The public consistories are seldom held, and are principally ceremonial assemblies: in these the pope receives ambassadors, and makes known important resolutions, canonizations, establishments of orders, &c. According to rule, all cardinals residing in Rome should take part in the consistories; but, in point of fact, no one appears without being specially summoned by the pope; who, if able to do so, always presides in person, and the cardinal secretary of state (who is minister of the interior and for foreign affairs) is always present, as are likewise the cardinals presidents of the authorities.

At present, there are twenty-two congregations of cardinals at Rome: 1. The holy Roman and general inquisition, or holy office (santo officio.) 2. Visita apostolica. 3. Consistoriale. 4. Vescovi regolari. 5. De concilio (Tridentino). 6. Residenza di vescovi. 7. Immunita ecclesiastica. 8. Propaganda. 9. Indici (of prohibited books.) 10. Sagri riti. 11. Ceremoniale. 12. Disciplina regolare (orders of monks.) 13. Indulgenze e sagre reliquie. 14. Esame dei vescovi. 15. Correzioni dei libri della chiesa Orientale. 16. Fabbrica di S. Pietro. 17. Consulta. 18. Buon governo. 19. Loretto. 20. Hydraulic works and the Pontine marshes. 21. Economica. 22. Extraordinary ecclesiastical affairs. Few, however, of these congregations are fully supplied with officers.—Head. Buck.

CURIOSITY; a propensity or disposition of the soul which inclines it to inquire after new objects, and to delight in viewing them. Curiosity is proper, when it springs from a desire to know our duty, to mature our judgments, to enlarge our minds, and to regulate our conduct; but improper when it wishes to know more of God, of the decrees, the origin of evil, the state of men, or the nature of things, than it is designed for us to know. The evil of this is evident. It reproaches God's goodness; it is a violation of Scripture, (Deut. 22: 29;) it robs us of our time; it often makes us unhappy; lessens our usefulness, and produces mischief. To cure this disposition, let us consider the divine command, (Phil. 4: 6,) that every thing essential is revealed; that God cannot err; that we shall be satisfied in a future state, John 13: 7. Curiosity concerning the affairs of others is exceedingly reprehensible. "It interrupts," says an elegant writer, "the order, and breaks the peace of society. Persons of this disposition are dangerous troublers of the world. Crossing the lines in which others move, they create confusion, and awaken resentment. Hence, many a friendship has been broken; and the peace of many a family has been overthrown; and much bitter and lasting discord has been propagated through society. Such a disposition is entirely the reverse of that amiable spirit of charity our Lord inculcates. Charity, like the sun, brightens every object on which it shines: a censorious disposition casts every character into the darkest shade it will bear. It is to be further observed, that all impertinent curiosity about the affairs of others tends greatly to obstruct personal reformation. They who are so officiously occupied about their neighbors, have little leisure, and less inclination, to observe their own defects, or to mind their own duty. From their inquisitive researches, they find, or imagine they find, in the behavior of others, an apology for their own failings; and the favorite result of their inquiries generally is, to rest satisfied with themselves. We should consider, also, that every excursion of vain curiosity about others is a subtraction from that time and thought which are due to ourselves, and to God. In the great circle of human affairs, there is room for every one to be busy and well employed in his own province, without encroaching upon that of others. It is the province of superiors to direct—of inferiors to obey; of the learned to be instructive—of the ignorant to be docile; of the old to be communicative—of the young to be advisable and diligent. In all the various relations which subsist among us in life, as husband and wife, master and servants, parents and children, relations and friends, rulers and subjects, innumerable duties stand ready to be performed; innumerable calls to activity present themselves on every hand, sufficient to fill up with advantage and honor the whole time of man." See Blair's Sermons, vol. iv. ser. 8; Clarke's Sermons, ser. on Deut. 29: 29; Seed's Posthumous Sermons, ser. 7; Sprague's Poem.—Hend. Buck.

CURSE. In Scripture language, it signifies the just and lawful sentence of God's law, condemning sinners to suffer the full punishment of their sin, or the punishment inflicted on account of transgression. Gal. 3: 10.

God denounced his curse against the serpent which had seduced Eve, (Gen. 3: 14.) and against Cain, who had imbrued his hands in his brother Abel's blood, 4: 11. He also promised to bless those who should bless Abraham, and to curse those who should curse him. The divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, nor are they impotent wishes: but they carry their effects with them, and are attended with all the miseries they denounce or foretell. (See ANATHEMA.)

Holy men sometimes prophetically cursed particular persons; (Gen. 9: 25. 49: 7. Deut. 27: 15. Josh. 6: 26.) and history informs us, that these imprecations had their fulfilment; as had those of our Savior against the barren fig tree, Mark 11: 21. But such curses are not consequences of passion, impatience, or revenge;—they are predictions, and therefore not such as God condemns. Our Lord pronounces blessed those disciples who are (falsely) loaded with curses; and requires his followers to bless those who curse them; to render blessing for cursing, &c. Matt. 5: 11.—Watson; Calmet.

CUSH; the eldest son of Ham, and father of Nimrod, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha; and the grandfather of Sheba and Dedan. The posterity of Cush, spread over great part of Asia and Africa, were called Cushim, or Cushites; and by the Greeks and Romans, and in our Bible, Ethiopians.

CUSH, CUTHA, CUTHEA, CUSHAN, ETHIOPIA, Land of Cush, the country or countries peopled by the descendants of Cush; whose first plantations were on the gulf of Persia, in that part which still bears the name of Chuzestan, and from whence they spread over India and great part of Arabia; particularly its western part, on the coast of the Red sea; invaded Egypt, under the name of Hyksos, or shepherd-kings; and thence passed, as well probably as by the straits of Babelmandel, into Central Africa, and first peopled the countries to the south of Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and parts further to the south and west. The indiscriminate use of the term Ethiopia in our Bible, for all the countries peopled by the posterity of Cush, and the almost exclusive application of the same term by the Greek and Roman writers to the before-mentioned countries of Africa, have involved some portions of both sacred and profane history in almost inextricable confusion. The first country which bore this name, and which was doubtless the original settlement, was that which is described by Moses as encompassed by the river Gihon, or Gyndes; which encircles a great part of the province of Chuzestan in Persia. In process of time, the increasing family spread over the vast territory of India and Arabia: the whole of which tract, from the Ganges to the borders of Egypt, then became the land of Cush, or Asiatic Ethiopia, the Cusha Dweepa within, of Hindoo geography. Until dispossessed of this country, or a great part of it, by the posterity of Abraham, the Ishmaelites and Midianites, they, by a further dispersion, passed over into Africa; which, in its turn, became the land of Cush, or Ethiopia, the Cusha Dweepa without, of the Hiudoos: the only country so understood after the commencement of the Christian era. Even from this last refuge, they were compelled, by the influx of fresh settlers from Arabia, Egypt, and Canaan, to extend their migrations still further westward, into the heart of the African continent; where only, in the woolly-headed negro, the genuine Cushite is to be found.

Herodotus relates that Xerxes had, in the army prepared for his Grecian expedition, both Oriental and African Ethiopians; and adds, that they resembled each other in every outward circumstance except their hair; that of the Asiatic Ethiopians being long and straight, while the hair of those of Africa was curled.

In the time of our Savior, (and indeed from that time forward,) by Ethiopia, was meant, in a general sense, the countries south of Egypt, then but imperfectly known: of one of which, that Candace was queen whose eunuch was baptized by Philip. (See ETHIOPIA.)—Watson.

CUSTOM, a very comprehensive term, denoting the manners, ceremonies, and fashions of a people, which having turned into habit, and passed into use, obtain the force of laws. Custom and habit are often confounded. By custom, we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act; and by habit, the effect that custom has on the mind or the body. (See HABIT.)

"Viewing man," says lord Kaimes, "as a sensitive being, and perceiving the influence of novelty upon him, would one suspect that custom has an equal influence? And yet our nature is equally susceptible of both; not only in different objects, but frequently in the same. When an object is new, it is enchanting; familiarity renders it indifferent; and custom, after a longer familiarity, makes it again desirable. Human nature, diversified with many and various springs of action, is wonderful, and, indulging the expression, intricately constructed. Custom hath such influence upon many of our feelings, by warping and varying them, that we must attend to its operations if we would be acquainted with human nature. A walk upon the quarter-deck, though intolerably confined, becomes, however, so agreeable by custom, that a sailor, in his walk on shore, confines himself commonly within the same bounds. I knew a man who had relinquished the sea for a country life: in the corner of his garden he reared an artificial mount, with a level summit, resembling, most accurately, a quarter-deck, not only in shape, but in size; and here was his choice walk." Such, we find, is often the power of custom.—Hend. Buck.

CUTHITES, a people who dwelt beyond the Euphrates, and were from thence transplanted into Samaria, in place of the Israelites, who had before inhabited it. 2 Kings 1: 17. They came from the land of Cush, or Cutba, on the Araxes, their first settlement being in the cities of the Meles, subdued by Salmeser, and his predecessors. (See CUSA.) Josephus informs us, that they did not build a common temple on mount Gerizim, till the reign of Alexander the Great. (See SAMARITANS.)—Calmet.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. There has been much conjecture as to the reason for which the priests of Baal "cut themselves, after their manner, with knives, and with lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them," 1 Kings 18: 28. This seems, by the history, to have been after Elijah had mocked them, or while he was mocking them, and had worked up their fervor, and passions, to the utmost height. Mr. Harmer has touched lightly on this circumstance, but has not set it in so clear a view as it seems to be capable of, nor has he given very cogent instances. It may be taken as an instance of earnest entreaty, of conjuration, by the most powerful marks of affection: q. d. "Dost thou not see, O Baal! with what passion we adore thee?—how we give thee most decisive tokens of our affection? We shrink at no pain, we decline no disfigurement, to demonstrate our love for thee; and yet thou answerest not! By every token of our regard, answer us. By the freely-flowing blood we shed for thee, answer us!" &c. They certainly demonstrated their attachment to Baal; but Baal did not testify his reciprocal attachment to them, in proof of his divinity; which was the point in dispute between them and Elijah. This custom of cutting themselves, is taken in other places of Scripture, as a mark of affection: so, Jer. 48:37. "Every head shall be bald, every beard clip, and upon all hands cuttings; and upon the loins sackcloth:" as tokens of excessive grief, for the absence of those thus regarded. So, chap. 16: ver. 6. 41: 5. ¶ 5. The law says, (Lev. 19: 28. and Dent. 14: 1.) "Ye are the children of the Lord your God; ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes, for the dead," i. e. restrain such excessive tokens of grief: sorrow not as those without hope—if for a dead friend; but if for a dead idol, as Calmet always takes it—then it prohibits the idolatrous custom, of which it also manifests the antiquity. The custom still continues among the Turks and Hindoos, as appears from the travels of Aaron Hill and de la Motraye, of cutting their flesh in token of ardent affection.—Calmet.

CUTTY-STOOL, the stool or seat of repentance, in the Scotch kirks, placed near the roof, and painted black, on which offenders against chastity sit during service, professing repentance, and receiving the minister's rebukes. It is somewhat remarkable that a breach of the seventh commandment should be the only sin which subjects the offender to this lash of ecclesiastical discipline; drunkenness, lying, sabbath-breaking, &c. being suffered to pass with impunity.—Hend. Buck.

CYAXARES. (See DARIUS.)

CYNICS, (kynikoi, dogs), a philosophical sect, founded by Antisthenes, a disciple of Socrates, who chose for his school "the Cynosargum," or temple of the white dog, whence many have supposed the sect derived their name, though, in later times, it is more likely they were called dogs from their snarling disposition. The fundamental principle of Antisthenes was, that "virtue alone is a sufficient foundation for a happy life." From this principle, he despised all speculative and scientific studies, and affected poverty of appearance and coarseness of manners. This his master Socrates remarked, and one day observing him in a thread-bare cloak, of which he took pains rather to display than to conceal the rags, said to him, "Why so ostentatious? through your vanity I see your rags." Diogenes, however, the disciple of Antisthenes, exceeded his master both in coarseness of manners and a snarling disposition, which subsequent ages have considered as the characteristic of a Cynic.—(Enfield's Philos. vol. i. p. 190, &c.)—Williams.

CYMBAL, a musical instrument, consisting of two broad plates of brass, of a convex form, which, being struck together, produced a shrill piercing sound. They were used in the temple, and upon occasions of public rejoicings, (1 Chron. 16: 19.) as they are by the Armenians, at the present day. In 1 Cor. 13: 1. the apostle deduces a comparison from sounding brass and tinkling cymbals: if we may suppose that in the phrase "sounding brass" the apostle alluded to an instrument composed of merely two pieces of brass, shaken one against the other, and thereby producing a kind of rattling jingle, void of meaning, intensity, or harmony, perhaps we should be pretty near the true idea of the passage. Boys among ourselves have such a kind of snappers; and the crotastris of the ancients were no better.—Calmet.

CYPRESS, (Isaiah 44: 14;) a large evergreen tree. The wood is fragrant, very compact, and heavy. It scarcely ever rots, decays, or is worm-eaten; for which reason the ancients used to make the statues of their gods with it.

The unperishable chests which contain the Egyptian mummies were of cypress. The gates of St. Peter's church at Rome, which had lasted from the time of Constantine to that of pope Eugene IV., that is to say, eleven hundred years, were of cypress, and had in that time suffered no decay. But Celsus thinks that Isaiah speaks of the ilex, a kind of oak; and bishop Lowth, that the pine is intended. The cypress, however, was more frequently used, and more fit for the purpose which the prophet mentions, than either of these trees.—Watson.

CYPRIAN, bishop of Carthage, was born A. D. 200, of a respectable family, and was for some years teacher of rhetoric, in that city. His reputation in that office was great; but his habits were loose and expensive. At the age of 46, he was converted to Christianity; upon which he gave his property to the poor, and reduced his living to abstemiousness. The church in Carthage soon chose him a presbyter, and in 248, bishop. In this station he acquired an exalted character, and became the idol of both clergy and people. During the persecution under Decius he fled, but still exhorted his people to constancy in the faith. In 257, he was banished to Chruh, and the next year was beheaded. His only crime was preaching the gospel in his garden near Carthage. Cyprian is an eloquent writer, though with somewhat of the hardness of his master Tertullian. An explanation of the Lord's prayer and eighty-one of his epistles are extant.—Fox; Milner; Ency. Amer.

CYPRIAN, (called by way of distinction the magician) a martyr of the fourth century, was a native of Antioch. He received a liberal education, which he improved by travel in Greece, Egypt, India, and Chaldea. In Babylon, he addicted himself to the study of astrology and magic, and employed all his arts against female purity and against Christianity. Being employed by a friend to overcome the virtue of a young lady of Antioch, named Justina, of great beauty and accomplishments, but a decided Christian, his arts proved wholly ineffectual, and he was thereby led to investigate the truth of Christianity. It resulted in his conversion. His repentance was sincere and pungent; and it required all the efforts of Christian tenderness and enlightened zeal to save him from despair on account of his sins. His conduct now became reformed; he burnt his books of astrology, received baptism, and became animated with a powerful spirit of grace. His conversion led to that of his friend and employer. Cyprian himself suffered martyrdom under Dioclesian, being first torn with pincers, and then beheaded.—Fox.

CYPRUS; a large island in the Mediterranean, situated between Cilicia and Syria. Its inhabitants were plunged in all manner of luxury and debauchery. Their principal deity was Venus. The apostles Paul and Barnabas landed in the isle of Cyprus, A. D. 44, Acts 13: 4. While they continued at Salamis, they preached Jesus Christ in the Jewish synagogues; from thence they visited all the cities of the island, preaching the gospel. At Paphos, they found Bar-Jesus, a false prophet, with Sergius Paulus, the governor: Paul struck Bar-Jesus with blindness; and the proconsul embraced Christianity. Some time after, Barnabas went again into this island with John, surnamed Mark, Acts 15: 39. Barnabas is considered as the principal apostle and first bishop of Cyprus; where it is said he was martyred, being stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis.—Watson.

CYRENE, was a city of Libya in Africa, which, as it was the principal city of that province, gave to it the name of Cyrenaica. This city was once so powerful as to contend with Carthage for pre-eminence. In profane writers, it is mentioned as the birth-place of Eratosthenes the mathematician, and Callimachus the poet; and in holy writ, of Simon, whom the Jews compelled to bear our Savior's cross, Matt. 27: 32; Luke 23: 26. At Cyrene, resided many Jews, a great part of whom embraced the Christian religion; but others opposed it with much obstinacy. Among the most inveterate enemies of Christianity, Luke reckons those of this province, who had a synagogue at Jerusalem, and excited the people against St. Stephen, Acts 11: 20.—Watson.

CYRENAICS, a sect of philosophers, founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates, whose sentiments seem to have corresponded with those of Epicurus, that pleasure is the supreme good, interpreted in the grossest sense; for Cicero speaks of the school of Aristippus, as fruitful in debaucheries.—(Enfield's Philos. vol. i. p. 190, &c.)—Williams.

CYRENIUS; governor of Syria, Luke 2: 1, 2. Great difficulties have been raised on the history of the taxing or rather enrolment (apographia) under Cyrenius, for the different solutions of which we must refer to the commentators.

The narrative of St. Luke may be combined in the following order, which is probably not far from its true import: "In those days, Cæsar Augustus," who was displeased with the conduct of Herod, and wished him to feel his dependence on the Roman empire, "issued a decree that the whole land" of Judea "should be enrolled," as well persons as possessions, that the true state of the inhabitants, their families, and their property, might be known and recorded. Accordingly, "all were enrolled," but the taxation did not immediately follow this enrolment, because Augustus was reconciled to Herod; and this accounts for the silence of Josephus on an assessment (or enrolment) of Cyrenius, governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city;" and, as the emperor's order was urgent, and Cyrenius was known to be active in the despatch of business, even Mary, though far advanced "in her pregnancy, went with Joseph, and while they waited" for their turn to be enrolled, "Mary was delivered of Jesus." It is not, however, improbable, that Mary had some small landed estate, for which her appearance was necessary. Jesus, therefore, was enrolled with Mary and Joseph, as Julian the Apostate expressly says.

An officer being sent from Rome to enrol and assess the subjects of a king, implied that such king was dependent on the Roman emperor, and demonstrates that the sceptre was departed from Judah. This occurrence, added to the alarm of Herod on the inquiry of the Magi respecting the birth-place of the Messiah, might sufficiently exasperate Herod, not merely to slay the infants of Bethlehem, but to every act of cruelty. Hence, after such an occurrence, all Jerusalem might well be alarmed with Herod, (Matt. 2: 3;) and the priests, &c., study caution in their answers to him. This occurrence would quicken the attention of all who expected temporal redemption in Israel, as it would extremely mortify every Jewish national feeling.

The overruling providence of God appointed that, at the time of Christ's birth, there should be a public, authentic, and general production of titles, pedigrees, &c., which should prove that Jesus was descended from the house and direct family line of David; and that this should be proved judicially on such a scrutinizing occasion. This occurrence brought about the birth of the Messiah, at the very place appointed by prophecy long before, though the usual residence of Joseph and Mary was at Nazareth.—Watson.

CYRIL; bishop of Gortyna, a martyr of the third century. At the age of 81, being seized by order of Lucius, the governor of the city, and exhorted to save his venerable person from destruction by sacrificing to the gods, the good man replied that he could not do it, that he had long taught others to save their souls, and that he must now think only of the salvation of his own. Upon this the governor pronounced his sentence in the following remarkable words: "I order and appoint that Cyril, who has lost his senses, and is a declared enemy of our god, shall be burnt alive." The venerable Christian heard this sentence without emotion, walked cheerfully to the place of execution, and there patiently suffered for Christ his Lord.—Fox.

CYRIL; one of the Christian fathers, was born at Jerusalem, A. D. 315, ordained presbyter in 345, and after the death of Maximus in 356, became patriarch of Jerusalem. Being a zealous Trinitarian, he engaged in a warm controversy with Acacius the Arian, bishop of Cæsarea. His adversary accused him of having sold some valuable church ornaments, which he had indeed done, but for the laudable purpose of supporting the needy during a famine. Not satisfied with this, Acacius assembled a council at Cæsarea in 357, which deposed Cyril; but the council of Seleucia, two years after, deposed Acacius, and restored Cyril. The very next year, Acacius by his artifices succeeded in again depriving him of his dignity; but it was restored to him by the emperor Constantius. Valens, the Arian emperor, on ascending the throne, deposed Cyril the third time; and it was not until after the death of Valens that Cyril was allowed to return to Jerusalem. He was confirmed in his see by the council of Constantinople, in 381, and filled it till his death in 386. Of his writings there remain twenty-three catecheses, written in a style of clearness and simplicity, which are esteemed the oldest and best outline of Christian doctrine. (Paris, 1720, folio.)—There was another Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, in 412, a most turbulent and tyrannical prelate, and a disgrace to the Christian name.—A third Cyril, a native of Thessalonica, was a successful missionary to the Huns, Bulgarians, Moravians, and Bohemians in the ninth century.—Mosheim; Ency. Amr.

CYRUS; son of Cambyzes the Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. At the age of thirty, Cyrus was made general of the Persian troops, and sent, at the head of thirty thousand men, to assist his uncle, Cyaxares, whom the Babylonians were preparing to attack. Cyaxares and Cyrus gave them battle and dispersed them. After this, Cyrus carried the war into the countries beyond the river Halys; subdued Cappadocia; marched against Croesus, king of Lydia, defeated him, and took Sardis, his capital. Having reduced almost all Asia, Cyrus repassed the Euphrates, and turned his arms against the Assyrians: having defeated them, he laid siege to Babylon, which he took on a festival day, after having diverted the course of the river which ran through it. On his return to Persia, he married his cousin, the daughter and heiress of Cyaxares; after which he engaged in several wars, and subdued all the nations between Syria and the Red sea. He died at the age of seventy, after a reign of thirty years. Authors differ much concerning the manner of his death.

2. We learn few particulars respecting Cyrus from Scripture; but they are more certain than those derived from other sources. He was monarch, as he speaks, "of all the earth," (Ezra 1: 1, 2. 2 Chron. 36: 22, 23,) when he permitted the Jews to return into their own country, A. M. 3166, B. C. 538. He had always a particular regard for Daniel, and continued him in his great employments.

3. The prophets foretold the exploits of Cyrus. Isaiah, (44: 28,) particularly declares his name, above a century before he was born. Josephus says, that the Jews of Babylon showed this passage to Cyrus; and that, in the edict which he granted for their return, he acknowledged that he received the empire of the world from the God of Israel. The peculiar designation by name, which Cyrus received, must be regarded as one of the most remarkable circumstances in the prophetic writings. He was the heir of a monarch who ruled over one of the poorest and most inconsiderable kingdoms of Asia, but whose hardy inhabitants were at that time the bravest of the brave; and the providential circumstances in which he was placed precluded him from all knowledge of this oracular declaration in his favor. He did not become acquainted with the sacred books in which it was contained, nor with the singular people in whose possession it was found, till he had accomplished all the purposes for which he had been raised up, except that of saying to Jerusalem, as the "anointed" vicegerent of heaven, "Thou shalt be inhabited;" and to the cities of Judah, "Ye shall be built, and I will raise up their ruins." The national pride of the Jews during the days of their unhalloved prosperity, would hinder them from divulging among other nations such prophecies as this, which contained the most severe yet deserved reflections upon their wicked practices and ungrateful conduct; and it was only when they were captives in Babylon that they submitted to the humiliating expedient of exhibiting, to the mighty monarch whose bondsmen they had become, the prophetic record of their own apostasy and punishment, and of his still higher:

destination, as the rebuilder of Jerusalem. No temptation therefore could be laid before the conqueror in early life to excite his latent ambition to accomplish this very full and explicit prophecy; and the facts of his life, as recorded by historians of very opposite sentiments and feelings, all concur in developing a series of consecutive events, in which he acted no insignificant part; which, though astonishing in their results, differ greatly from those rapid strides perceptible in the hurried career of other mighty men of war in the East; and which, from the unbroken connexion in which they are presented to us, appear like the common occurrences of life naturally following each other, and mutually dependent. Yet this consideration does not preclude the presence of a mighty Spirit working within him; which, according to Isaiah, said to him, "I will gird thee, though thou hast not known me." Concerning the genius, or guardian angel, of Socrates, many learned controversies have arisen; but though a few of the disputants have endeavored to explain it away, the majority of them have left the Greek philosopher in possession of a greater portion of inspiration than, with marvellous inconsistency, some of them are willing to accord to the Jewish prophets. In this view, it is highly interesting to recollect that the elegant historian who first informed his refined countrymen of this moral prodigy, is he who subsequently introduced them to an acquaintance with the noble and heroic Cyrus. The didactic discourses and the comparatively elevated morality which Xenophon embodied in his "Memoirs of Socrates," are generally admitted to have been purposely illustrated in his subsequent admirable production, the Cyropædia, or "Education of Cyrus;" the basis of which is true history adorned and refined by philosophy, and exhibiting for universal imitation the life and actions of a prince who was cradled in the ancient Persian school of the Pischedadians, the parent of the Socratic. Isaiah describes, in fine poetic imagery, the Almighty going before Cyrus to remove every obstruction out of his way:—

"I will go before thee, and level mountains,
I will burst asunder the folding-doors of brass,
And split in twain the bars of iron.
Even I will give thee the dark treasures,
And the hidden wealth of secret places;
That thou mayst know, that I THE LORD,
Who call thee by thy name, am the God of ISRAEL."

Other particulars relating to him, and the accomplishment of prophecy in his conquest of that large city, will be found under the article BABYLON. It is the God of Israel who, in these sublime prophecies, confounds the omens and prognostics of the Babylonian soothsayers or diviners, after they had predicted the stability of that empire; and who announces the restoration of Israel, and the rebuilding of the city and temple of Jerusalem, through Cyrus his "shepherd;" and his "ancient" messenger. Chosen thus by God to execute his high behests, he subdued and reigned over many nations,—the Cilicians, Syrians, Paphlagonians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, Lydians, Carians, Phœnicians, Arabians, Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Bactrians, &c.

"I am He who frustrateth the tokens of the impostors,
And maketh the diviners mad; &c.
Who saith to the abyss, [Babylon,]
'Be desolate, and I will dry up thy rivers.'
Who saith to Cyrus, 'He is my shepherd,
And shall perform all my pleasure.'
Thus saith the Lord to his anointed,
To Cyrus, whom I hold by the right hand,
To subdue before him nations,
And ungrind the loins of kings,
To open before him [palace] folding-doors;
Even [river] gates shall not be shut:
For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel my chosen,
I have surmised thee;" &c.

4. Herodotus has painted the portrait of Cyrus in dark colors, and has been followed in many particulars by Ctesias, Diodorus Siculus, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Plato, Strabo, Justin, and others; in opposition to the contrary accounts of Æschylus, Xenophon, Josephus, the Persian historians, and apparently, the holy Scriptures. The motive for this conduct of Herodotus is probably to be found in his aversion to Cyrus, for having been the enslaver of his country. Xenophon informs us, that the seven last years of his full sovereignty, this prince spent in peace and tranquillity at home, revered and beloved by all classes of his subjects. In his dying moments he was surrounded by his family, friends and children, and delivered to them the noblest exhortations to the practice of piety, virtue, and concord. This testimony is in substance confirmed by the Persian historians, who relate, that after a long and bloody war, Khosru, or Cyrus, subdued the empire of Turan, and made the city of Balk, in Chorsan, a royal residence, to keep in order his new subjects; that he repaid every family in Persia Proper the amount of their war-taxes, out of the immense spoils which he had acquired by his conquests; that he endeavored to promote peace and harmony between the Turanians and Iranians; that he regulated the pay of his soldiery, reformed civil and religious abuses throughout the provinces, and, at length, after a long and glorious reign, resigned the crown to his son Lohorasp, and retired to solitude, confessing that he had lived long enough for his own glory, and that it was then time for him to devote the remainder of his days to God. Saadi, in his Gulistan, copies the wise inscription which Cyrus ordered to be inscribed on his crown:—"What avails a long life spent in the enjoyment of worldly grandeur, since others, mortal like ourselves, will one day trample under foot our pride! This crown, handed down to me from my predecessors, must soon pass in succession upon the head of many others."

5. Pliny notices the tomb of Cyrus at Passagardæ, in Persia. Arrian and Strabo describe it; and they agree with Curtius, that Alexander the Great offered funeral honors to his shade there; that he opened the tomb, and found, not the treasures he expected, but a rotten shield, two Scythian bows, and a Persian cimeter. And Plutarch records the following inscription upon it, in his life of Alexander:—"O man, whoever thou art, and whenever thou comest, (for come, I know, thou wilt,) I am Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire. Envy me not the little earth that covers my body." Alexander was much affected at this inscription, which set before him, in so striking a light, the uncertainty and vicissitude of worldly things. And he placed the crown of gold which he wore, upon the tomb in which the body lay, wondering that a prince so renowned, and possessed of such immense treasures, had not been buried more sumptuously than if he had been a private person. Cyrus, indeed, in his last instructions to his children, desired that "his body, when he died, might not be deposited in gold or silver, nor in any other sumptuous monument, but committed, as soon as possible, to the ground."

The observation which Dr. Hales here makes, is worthy of record:—"This is a most signal and extraordinary epitaph. It seems to have been designed as a useful memento mori, for Alexander the Great, in the full pride of conquest, "whose coming" it predicts with a prophetic spirit, "For come I know thou wilt." But how could Cyrus know of his coming?—Very easily. Daniel the Archimagus, his venerable friend, who warned the haughty Nebuchadnezzar, that "head of gold," or founder of the Babylonian empire, that it should be subverted by "the breast and arms of silver," (Dan. 2: 37, 39,) or "the Mede and the Persian," Darius and Cyrus, as he more plainly told the impious Belshazzar, (Dan. 5: 28,) we may rest assured, communicated to Cyrus also, the founder of the Persian empire, the symbolical vision of the goat, with the notable horn in his forehead, Alexander of Macedon, coming swiftly from the west, to overturn the Persian empire, (Dan. 8: 5, 8,) under the last king Codomanus, the fourth from Darius Nothus, as afterwards more distinctly explained, Dan. 11: 1, 4. Cyrus, therefore, decidedly addresses the short-lived conqueror, O man, whoever thou art, &c.—Watson.

D.

DAGON; (from dag, a fish,) god of the Philistines. It is the opinion of some that Dagon was represented like a woman, with the lower parts of a fish, like a triton or siren. Scripture shows clearly that the statue of Dagon was human, at least, the upper part of it, 1 Sam. 5: 4, 5. A temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Samson, Judg. 16: 23, &c. In another at Ashdod, the Philistines deposited the ark of God, 1 Sam. 5: 1—3. A city in Judah was called Beth-Dagon; that is, the house, or temple, of Dagon, (Joshua 15: 41;) and another on the frontiers of Asher, Joshua 19: 27.—Watson.

DALEITES, the followers of David Dale, a very industrious manufacturer, a most benevolent Christian, and the humble pastor of an Independent congregation at Glasgow. At first, he formed a connexion with the Glassites, in many of whose opinions he concurred, but was disgusted by their narrow and worldly spirit: he therefore separated from them, chiefly on the ground of preferring practical to speculative religion, and Christian charity to severity of church discipline. As he grew rich by industry, he devoted all his property to doing good, and ranks high among the philanthropists of his age. He was founder of the celebrated institution of New Lanark, now under Mr. Robert Owen, his son-in-law.

The Daleites now form the second class of Independents in Scotland, the Glassites being the first; and since the death of Mr. Dale, they have formed a connexion with the Inghamites, which see.—Scotch Theol. Dict.; Jones's Dict. of Rel. Opin.; Williams.

DALMANUTHA. St. Mark says that Jesus Christ embarked with his disciples on the lake of Tiberias, and came to Dalmanutha, (Mark 8: 10,) but St. Matthew calls it Magdala, Matt. 15: 39. It seems that Dalmanutha was near to Magdala, on the western side of the lake.—Watson.

DALMATIA; a part of Illyricum, or old Illyria, lying along the gulf of Venice. Titus preached here, 2 Tim. 4: 10.—Watson.

DAMASCENUS, (JOHN;) a Greek writer of great genius and eloquence in the eighth century, who composed a complete body of the Christian doctrine in a scientific method, under the title of Four Books concerning the Orthodox Faith. The two kinds of theology, which the Latins termed scholastic and didactic, were united in this laborious performance, in which the author not only explains the doctrines he delivers by subtle and profound reasoning, but also confirms his explications by the authority of the ancient doctors. This work was received among the Greeks with the highest applause, and was so excessively admired, that at length it came to be acknowledged among that people, as the only rule of divine truth. Many, however, complain of this applauded writer, as having consulted more in his theological system, the conjectures of human reason and the opinions of the ancients, than the genuine dictates of the sacred oracles, and of having, in consequence of this method, deviated from the true source and the essential principles of theology. To the work of Damascenus now mentioned, we may add his Sacred Parallels, in which he has collected with uncommon care and industry, the opinions of the ancient doctors concerning various points of the Christian religion. We may, therefore, look upon this writer, as the Thomas and Lombard of the Greeks.—Mosheim.

DAMASCUS; a celebrated city of Asia, and anciently the capital of Syria, is forty-five leagues north of Jerusalem, and may be accounted one of the most venerable places in the world for its antiquity. It is supposed to have been founded by Ux, the son of Aram; and is, at least, known to have subsisted in the time of Abraham, Gen. 15: 2. It was the residence of the Syrian kings, during the space of three centuries, and experienced a number of vicissitudes in every period of its history. Its sovereign, Hadad, whom Josephus calls the first of its kings, was conquered by David, king of Israel. In the reign of Ahaz, it was taken by Tiglath Pileser, who slew its last king, Rezin, and added its provinces to the Assyrian empire. It was taken and plundered, also, by Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, the generals of Alexander the Great, Judas Maccabeus, and at length by the Romans in the war conducted by Pompey against Tigranes, in the year before Christ 65. During the time of the emperors, it was one of their principal arsenals in Asia, and is celebrated by the emperor Julian as, even in his day, "the eye of the whole East." About the year 634, it was taken by the Saracen princes, who made it the place of their residence, till Bagdad was prepared for their reception; and, after suffering a variety of revolutions, it was taken and destroyed by Tamerlane, A. D. 1400. It was repaired by the Mamelukes, when they gained possession of Syria, but was wrested from them by the Turks, in 1506; and since that period has formed the capital of one of their pachalics.

The modern city is delightfully situated about fifty miles from the sea, in a fertile and extensive plain, watered by the river which the Greeks called Chrysorrhoas, or "Golden River," but which is known by the name of Barrady, and of which the ancient Abana and Pharpar are supposed to have been branches. The city is nearly two miles in length from its north-east to its north-west extremity; but of very inconsiderable breadth, especially near the middle of its extent, where its width is much contracted. It is surrounded by a circular wall, which is strong, though not lofty; but its suburbs are extensive and irregular. Its streets are narrow; and one of them, called Straight, mentioned in Acts. (9: 11,) still runs through the city about half a mile in length. The houses, and especially those which front the streets, are very indifferently built, chiefly of mud formed into the shape of bricks, and dried in the sun; but those towards the gardens, and in the squares, present a more handsome appearance. In these mud walls, however, the gates and doors are often adorned with marble portals, carved and inlaid with great beauty and variety; and the inside of the habitation, which is generally a large square court, is ornamented with fragrant trees and marble fountains, and surrounded with splendid apartments, furnished and painted in the highest style of luxury. The market-places are well constructed, and adorned with a rich colonnade of variegated marble. The principal public buildings are, the castle, which is about three hundred and forty paces in length; the hospital, a charitable establishment for the reception of strangers, composing a large quadrangle, lined with a colonnade, and roofed in small domes covered with lead; and the mosque, the entrance of which is supported by four large columns of red granite; the apartments in it are numerous and magnificent, and the top is covered with a cupola ornamented with two minarets.

Damascus is surrounded by a fruitful and delightful country, forming a plain nearly eighty miles in circumference; and the lands most adjacent to the city, are formed into gardens of great extent, which are stored with fruit trees of every description. "No place in the world," says Mr. Maundrell, "can promise to the beholder at a distance a greater voluptuousness;" and he mentions a tradition of the Turks, that their prophet, when approaching Damascus, took his station upon a certain precipice, in order to view the city; and after considering its ravishing beauty and delightful aspect, was unwilling to tempt his frailty by going farther, but instantly took his departure with this remark, that there was but one paradise designed for man, and that, for his part, he was resolved not to take his in this world. The air or water of Damascus, or both, are supposed to have a powerful effect in curing the leprosy, or at least, in arresting its progress, while the patient remains in the place.

The Rev. James Conner visited Damascus in 1820, as an agent of the Church Missionary Society. He had a letter from the archbishop of Cyprus to Seraphim, patriarch of Antioch, the head of the Christian church in the East, who resides at Damascus. This good man received Mr. Conner in the most friendly manner; and expressed himself delighted with the system and operations of the Bible Society. He undertook to encourage and promote, to the utmost of his power, the sale and distribution of the Scriptures throughout the patriarchate; and, as a proof of his earnestness in the cause, he ordered the next day, a number of letters to be prepared, and sent to his archbishops and bishops, urging them to promote the objects of the Bible Society in their respective stations.—Watson.

DAMIANISTS; disciples of Damian, bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century. Their opinions were similar to those of the Angelites, as already mentioned, and chiefly differed from the orthodox, in explaining the doctrine of the Trinity in a way peculiar to themselves. They admitted each of the Sacred Three to be God, as partaking of the Godhead—"a common divinity;" but perhaps denied the Athanasian doctrines of eternal generation, and the procession of the Holy Spirit.—(Mosheim's E. H. vol. ii. p. 150.)—Williams.

DAMM, (CHRISTIAN TOBIAS,) a Protestant theologian, and an excellent Hellenist, was born at Leipsic in 1699, and died in 1778. He edited and translated various classical authors, and produced a New Greek Etymological Lexicon.—Davenport.

DAMNATION; condemnation. This word is used to denote the final loss of the soul; but it is not always to be understood in this sense in the sacred Scripture. Thus it is said in Rom. 13:2, "They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," i. e. condemnation, "from the rulers, who are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." Again, in 1 Cor. 11:29, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself;" i. e. condemnation; exposes himself to severe temporal judgments from God, and to the judgment and censure of the wise and good. Again, Rom. 14:23, "He that doubteth is damned if he eat;" i. e. is condemned both by his own conscience and the word of God, because he is far from being satisfied that he is right in so doing.—Hend. Buck.

DAN; the fifth son of Jacob, Gen. 30:1—6. Dan had but one son, whose name was Hushim, (Gen. 46:23;)

yet he had a numerous posterity; for, on leaving Egypt, this tribe consisted of sixty-two thousand seven hundred men able to bear arms, Num. 1:38. Of Jacob's blessing Dan, see Gen. 49:16, 17. They took Laish, Judges 18:1; Joshua 19:47. They called the city Dan, after their progenitor. The city of Dan was situated at the northern extremity of the land of Israel: hence the phrase, "from Dan to Beersheba," denoting the whole length of the land of promise. Here Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, set up one of his golden calves, (1 Kings 12:29;) and the other at Bethel.—Watson.

DANA, (JAMES, D. D.) minister of New Haven, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1753. Some years afterwards he was a resident at Cambridge. He was ordained as the successor of Samuel Whittelsey at Wallingford, Connecticut, October 12, 1758. After remaining at Wallingford thirty years, Dr. Dana was installed the pastor of the first church at New Haven, April 29, 1789, as the successor of Chauncy Whittelsey. In the autumn of 1805, he was dismissed, after which he occasionally preached in the pulpits of his brethren in the vicinity. He died at New Haven, August 18, 1812, aged seventy-seven.—Dr. Dana published, anonymously, an Examination of Edwards' Inquiry on the Freedom of the Will, octavo, Boston, 1770; and, with his name, the Examination continued, New Haven, 1773; in all more than three hundred pages, in which he contended that men themselves are the only efficient causes of their own volitions; nor do they always determine according to the greatest apparent good; the affections do not follow the judgment; men sin against light, with the wiser choice, the greater good full in their view. Through the impetuosity of their passions, they determine against the greatest apparent good. This is the case with every sinner, who resolves to delay repentance to a future time. Self-determination is the characteristic of every moral agent. The absence of liberty he deemed inconsistent with moral agency; and by liberty he meant, not merely liberty in regard to the external action, but liberty of volition; an exemption from all circumstances and causes having a controlling influence over the will,—a self-determining power of man, as a real agent, in respect to his own volitions. On the whole, he regarded the scheme of Edwards as acquitting the creature of blame, and impeaching the truth and justice of the Creator.—He published also many sermons.—Allen.

DANA, (JOSEPH, D. D.) minister of Ipswich, Massachusetts, was born at Pomfret, Connecticut, 1742, and graduated at Yale college in 1760. Having early devoted himself to God, he studied theology, and was ordained as the minister of the south society in Ipswich, November 7, 1765. In 1825, on the sixtieth anniversary of his ordination, at the age of eighty-three, he preached a discourse, in which he stated, that all, who were heads of families at the time of his settlement, were deceased, excepting five; that he had followed about nine hundred of his parishioners to the grave; and had received into the church the small number of one hundred and twenty-one, being the average of two in a year. Of these, fifty were received in a revival from 1798, to 1801. He died November 16, 1827, aged eighty-five. Dr. Dana was a firm believer in the great doctrines of Calvinism; a faithful preacher; eminently a man of prayer; and deeply interested in all the events, which relate to the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He was a diligent student and laborious pastor. An unaffected humility marked his character, and his end was peace. He published several discourses.—Crowell's Funeral Sermon; Allen.

DANCERS; a sect which sprung up about 1373, in Flanders, and places about. It was their custom all of a sudden to fall a dancing, and holding each other's hands, to continue thereat, till being suffocated with the extraordinary violence, they fell down breathless together. During these intervals of vehement agitation, they pretended to be favored with wonderful visions. Like the Whippers, they roved from place to place, begging their victuals, holding their secret assemblies, and treating the priesthood and worship of the church with the utmost contempt. Thus we find, as Dr. Haweis observes, that the French Convulsionists and the Welch Jumpers have had predecessors of the same stamp. There is nothing new under the sun. Harveis and Mosheim's Church Hist. Cent. 14.—Hend. Buck.

DANCING. In the oriental dances, in which the women engage by themselves, the lady of highest rank in the company takes the lead, and is followed by her companions, who imitate her steps, and if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her who leads the dance, but always in exact time. This statement may enable us to form a correct idea of the dance, which the women of Israel performed under the direction of Miriam, on the banks of the Red sea. The prophetess, we are told, "took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and dances." She led the dance, while they imitated her steps, which were not conducted according to a set, well-known form, as in this country, but extemporaneously. The conjecture of Mr. Harmer is extremely probable, that David did not dance alone before the Lord, when he brought up the ark, but, as being the highest in rank, and more skillful than any of the people, he led the religious dance of the men.

A time to dance. Eccles. 3:4. On this passage an ingenious writer inquires, "1. What is the right time?—2. Is the text a command, permission, or declaration?—3. What kind of dancing does the text intend? To avoid mistake, I have consulted every passage in the Bible. The most important are Ex. 15:20. Judg. 11:24. 21:21. 1 Sam. 18:6. 2 Sam. 6:14—20. Ps. 149:3. 30:11. Ex. 22:19. Jer. 31:4. Matt. 11:17. 14:6. Luke 15:25. Job 21:7—11. From all which it appears,

1. That dancing was a religious act; both in true, and also in idol worship.

2. That it was practised exclusively on joyful occasions, such as national festivals or great victories.

3. That it was performed on such great occasions only by one of the sexes.

4. That it was performed usually in the day time—in the open air—in highways, fields and groves.

5. That men who perverted dancing from a sacred use to purposes of amusement, were deemed infamous.

6. That no instances of dancing are found upon record in the Bible, in which the two sexes united in the exercise, either as an act of worship or amusement.

Lastly. That there are no instances upon record in the Bible of social dancing for amusement, except that of the "vain fellows" void of shame, alluded to by Michal; of the irreligious families described by Job, which produced increased impiety and ended in destruction; and of Herodias, which terminated in the rash vow of Herod, and the murder of John the Baptist.—Watson; Chris. Obs.

DANFORTH, (SAMUEL,) minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, was born in England, 1626, and came to this country with his father in 1631. After he was graduated at Harvard college in 1643, he was a tutor and fellow. When Mr. Welde returned to England, he was invited to become the colleague of Mr. Eliot of Roxbury, and he was accordingly ordained, September 24, 1650. He died, November 19, 1674, aged forty-eight years. His sermons were elaborate, judicious and methodical; he wrote them twice over in a fair, large hand, and in each discourse usually quoted forty or fifty passages of Scripture. Notwithstanding this care and labor, he was so affectionate and pathetic, that he rarely finished the delivery of a sermon without weeping. In the forenoon he usually expounded the Old Testament, and in the afternoon discoursed on the body of divinity. Such was his peace in his last moments, that Mr. Eliot used to say, "My brother Danforth made the most glorious end that I ever saw." He published a number of almanacs, and an astronomical description of the comet which appeared in 1664, with a brief theological application. He contends, that a comet is a heavenly body, moving according to defined laws, and that its appearance is portentous. Mather's Magnalia, iv. 153—157.—Allen.

DANFORTH, (SAMUEL,) minister of Taunton, Massachusetts, the son of the preceding, was born December 15, 1666. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1683. He died November 14, 1727. He was one of the most learned and eminent ministers of his day. In the beginning of the year 1705, by means of his benevolent labors, a deep impression was made upon the minds of his people, and a most pleasing reformation occurred. The youth, who formerly assembled for amusement and folly, now met for the exalted purpose of improving in Christian knowledge and virtue, and of becoming fitted for the joys of the heavenly and eternal world, in the presence of Jesus, the Savior. Several letters of Mr. Danforth, giving an account of this reformation, are preserved in Mr. Prince's Christian History. He published a eulogy on Thomas Leonard, 1713, and the election sermon, 1714. He left behind him a manuscript Indian dictionary, a part of which is now in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society. It seems to have been formed from Eliot's Indian Bible, as there is a reference under every word to a passage of Scripture.—Hist. Col. iii. 173; ix. 176; Christian Hist. i. 108.—Allen.

DANIEL, was a descendant of the kings of Judah, and is said to have been born at Upper Bethoron, in the territory of Ephraim. He was carried away captive to Babylon when he was about eighteen or twenty years of age, in the year 606, before the Christian era. He was placed in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, and was afterwards raised to situations of great rank and power, both in the empire of Babylon and of Persia. He lived to the end of the captivity, but being then nearly ninety years old, it is most probable that he did not return to Judea. It is generally believed that he died at Susa, soon after his last vision, which is dated in the third year of the reign of Cyrus. Daniel seems to have been the only prophet who enjoyed a great share of worldly prosperity; but amidst the corruptions of a licentious court, he preserved his virtue and integrity inviolate, and no danger or temptation could divert him from the worship of the true God. The book of Daniel is a mixture of history and prophecy: in the first six chapters is recorded a variety of events which occurred in the reigns of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius; and, in particular, the second chapter contains Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream concerning the four great successive monarchies, and the everlasting kingdom of the Messiah, which dream God enabled Daniel to interpret. In the last six chapters we have a series of prophecies, revealed at different times, extending from the days of Daniel to the general resurrection. The Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman empires, are all particularly described under appropriate characters; and it is expressly declared that the last of them was to be divided into ten lesser kingdoms; the time at which Christ was to appear is precisely fixed; the rise and fall of Antichrist and the duration of his power, are exactly determined; and the future restoration of the Jews, the victory of Christ over all his enemies, and the universal prevalence of true religion, are distinctly foretold, as being to precede the consummation of that stupendous plan of God, which "was laid before the foundation of the world," and reaches to its dissolution. Part of this book is written in the Chaldaic language, namely, from the fourth verse of the second chapter to the end of the seventh chapter; these chapters relate chiefly to the affairs of Babylon, and it is probable that some passages were taken from the public registers. This book abounds with the most exalted sentiments of piety and devout gratitude; its style is clear, simple, and concise; and many of its prophecies are delivered in terms so plain and circumstantial, that some unbelievers have asserted, in opposition to the strongest evidence, that they were written after the events which they describe had taken place.

With respect to the genuineness and authenticity of the book of Daniel, there is abundance both of external and internal evidence; indeed all that can well be had or desired in a case of this nature: not only the testimony of the whole Jewish church and nation, who have constantly received this book as canonical, but of Josephus particularly, who recommends him as the greatest of the prophets; of the Jewish targums and talums, which frequently cite and appeal to his authority; of St. Paul and St. John, who have copied many of his prophecies; and of our Savior himself, who cites his words, and styles him, "Daniel the prophet." Nor is the internal less powerful and convincing than the external evidence; for the language, the style, the manner of writing, and all other internal marks and characters, are perfectly agreeable to that age; and finally he appears plainly and undeniably to have been a prophet by the exact accomplishment of his prophecies.—Watson.

DARIUS, was the name of several princes in history, some of whom are mentioned in Scripture.

1. Darius the Mede, spoken of in Daniel 5:31.9:1, 11:1, &c., was the son of Astyages, king of the Medes, and brother to Mandane, the mother of Cyrus, and to Amyit, the mother of Evil-merodach, and grandmother of Belshazzar. Darius the Mede, therefore, was uncle by the mother's side to Evil-merodach and Cyrus. The Septuagint, in Daniel 7: gives him the name of Artaxerxes; the thirteenth, or apocryphal chapter of Daniel, calls him Astyages; and Xenophon designates him by the name of Cyaxares. He succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon, his nephew's son, or his sister's grandson, in the year of the world 3148, according to Calmet, or in 3468, according to Usher. Daniel does not inform us of any previous war between them; but the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah supply this deficiency. Isaiah 13:14:45:46:47: Jer. 50:51.

2. DARIUS, the son of Hystaspes, has been supposed by some, on the authority of archbishop Usher and Calmet, to be the Ahasuerus of Scripture, and the husband of Esther. But Dr. Prideaux thinks, that Ahasuerus was Artaxerxes Longimanus. (See AHASUERUS.)

Darius recovered Babylon after a siege of twenty months. This city, which had been formerly the capital of the East, revolted from Persia, taking advantage of the revolutions that happened, first at the death of Cambyses, and afterwards on the massacre of the magi. The Babylonians employed four years in preparations, and when they thought that their city was furnished with provisions for a long time, they raised the standard of rebellion. Darius levied an army in great haste, and besieged Babylon. The Babylonians shut themselves up within their walls, whose height and thickness secured them from assault; and as they had nothing to fear but famine, they assembled all their women and children, and strangled them, each reserving only his most beloved wife, and one servant. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, 47:7—9. Some believe that the Jews were either expelled by the Babylonians, as being too much in the interest of Darius; or that, in obedience to the frequent admonitions of the prophets, they quitted that city when they saw the people determined to rebel, Isaiah 48:20; Jer. 50:8; 51:6—9; Zech. 11:6, 7. Darius lay twenty months before Babylon, without making any considerable progress; but, at length, Zopyrus, one of his generals, obtained possession of the city by stratagem. Darius ordered the hundred gates of brass to be taken away, according to the prediction of Jeremiah, 51:58, "Thus saith the Lord, The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burnt with fire, and the people shall labor in vain." This is related in Herodotus.

3. DARIUS CODOMANUS was of the royal family of Persia, but very remote from the crown. He was in a low condition, when Bagoas, the eunuch, who had procured the destruction of two kings, Ochus and Arses, placed him on the throne. His true name was Codomanus, and he did not take that of Darius till he was king. He was descended from Darius Nothus, whose son, Ostanus, was father to Arsames, that begat Codomanus. He was at first only a courier to the emperor Ochus. But one day when he was at this prince's army, one of their enemies challenged the bravest of the Persians. Codomanus offered himself for the combat, and overcame the challenger, and was made governor of Armenia. From this situation, Bagoas placed him on the throne of Persia. Alexander the Great invaded the Persian empire, and defeated Darius in three successive battles. After the third battle, Darius fled towards Media, in hopes of raising another army. Here Bessus, governor of Bactria, and Narbazanes, a grandee of Persia, seized him, loaded him with chains, forced him into a covered chariot, and fled, carrying him with them towards Bactria. After a precipitate march of many days, Alexander overtook the traitors, who seeing themselves pressed, endeavored to compel Darius to get upon horseback, and save himself with them; but he refusing, they stabbed him in several places, and left him expiring in his chariot. He was dead when Alexander arrived, who could not forbear weeping at so sad a spectacle. Alexander covered Darius with his own cloak, and sent him to Sysigambis his wife, that she might bury him in the tombs of the kings of Persia. Thus were verified the symbolic prophecies of Daniel, 8:—Watson.

DARKNESS; the absence of light. The most terrible darkness was that brought on Egypt as a plague; it was so thick as to be, as it were, palpable; so horrible, that no one durst stir out of his place; and so lasting, that it endured three days and three nights, Exod. 10:21, 22; Wisdom 17:2, 3. The darkness at our Savior's death began at the sixth hour, or noon, and ended at the third hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. Thus it lasted almost the whole time he was on the cross; compare Matt. 27:45, with John 19:14, and Mark 15:25. Origen, Maldonatus, Erasmus, Vatablins, and others, were of opinion that this darkness covered Judea only; which is sometimes called the whole earth; that is, the whole country. Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, and others, thought it extended over a hemisphere. Origen says it was caused by a thick mist, which precluded the sight of the sun. That it was preternatural is certain, for, the moon being at full, a natural eclipse of the sun was impossible.

Darkness is sometimes used metaphorically for death. "The land of darkness" is the grave, Job 10:22; Psalm 107:10. It is also used to denote misfortunes and calamities: "A day of darkness" is a day of affliction, Esther 11:8. "Let that day be darkness; let darkness stain it,"—let it be reckoned among the unfortunate days, Job 3:4, 5. The expressions, "I will cover the heavens with darkness;" "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood," &c., signify very great political calamities, involving the overthrow of kings, princes, and nobles, represented by the luminaries of heaven. This magnificent imagery is employed in allusion to the scenes of the last day. Ps. 102:25—7. Isaiah 51:6. Matt. 24:35. 2 Pet. 3:1—10. In a moral sense, darkness denotes unbelief, ignorance and vice; hence "the children of light," in opposition to "the children of darkness," are the righteous distinguished from the wicked. 1 Thess. 5:1—8.—Watson.

DATARY; an officer in the pope's court. He is always a prelate, and sometimes a cardinal, deputed by his holiness to receive such petitions as are presented to him, touching the provision of benefices. By his post the datary is empowered to grant, without acquainting his holiness therewith, all benefices that do not produce upwards of twenty-four ducats annually; but for such as amount to more, he is obliged to get the provisions signed by the pope, who admits him to audience every day. If there be several candidates for the same benefice; he has the liberty of bestowing it on which of them he thinks proper, provided he has the requisite qualifications. The datary has a yearly salary of two thousand crowns, exclusive of the perquisites, which he receives from those who apply to him for any benefice. This officer has a substitute, named the sub-datary, who is likewise a prelate, and has a yearly pension of a thousand crowns; but he is not allowed to confer any benefice, without acquainting the datary therewith. When a person has obtained the pope's consent for a benefice, the datary subscribes his petition with an annuit sanctissimus, i. e. "the most holy father consents to it." The pope's consent is subscribed in these words: Fiat ut petitur, i. e. "be it according to the petition." After the petition has passed the proper offices, and is registered, it is carried to the datary, who dates it, and writes these words: Datum Romæ apud, &c. "given at Rome in the pontifical palace," &c. Afterwards the pope's bull, granting the benefice, is despatched by the datary, and passes through the hands of more than a thousand persons, belonging to fifteen different offices, who have all their stated fees. The reader may from hence judge how expensive it is to procure the pope's bull for a benefice, and what large sums go into the office of the datary, especially when the provisions, issued from thence, are for bishoprics, and other rich benefices.—Hend. Buck.

DATE; the fruit of the palm tree. (See PALM.)

DATIVUS; a noble Roman senator, and a martyr of the fourth century, was arrested at Albitina in Africa in 304, under the bloody persecution of Dioclesian. He was tried at Carthage, and condemned as a Christian. Together with Saturninus his pastor, and several other Christians, he was scourged, his flesh torn with hooks, burned with hot irons, &c. but all these tortures failing to produce any change in their steadfast attachment to Christ, they were remanded to prison, and there starved to death. But they won the crown of life.—Foz.

DAUBENY, (CHARLES,) born in 1744, was educated at New college, Oxford; obtained a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, in 1781; was appointed archdeacon of Sarum in 1804; and died in 1827. Besides numerous sermons and charges, he is the author of A Guide to the Church, two vols.; Viadicæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ; Remarks on the Unitarian Method of interpreting the Scriptures; and of other works; and he contributed many theological articles to the Anti-Jacobin Review. At North Bradley, of which he was vicar, he built alms-houses for twelve poor persons, an asylum for four aged and blind individuals, and a school-room; and the church at Rode was erected partly at his expense.—Davenport.

DAUGHTER. This word, like other names of relation employed in Scripture, being a noun expressing similitude, no less than kindred, is used in reference to many subjects, which are not properly the offspring of that person, or that thing, of which they are said to be daughters. The following are senses in which the word daughter is used in Scripture:

(1.) Female offspring, by natural birth, Gen. 6: 1; 24: 23, and other places.—(2.) Granddaughter; so the servant of Abraham calls Rebekah "my master's brother's daughter," (Gen. 24: 48.) whereas she was daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor, as appears from verse 24; consequently granddaughter of Nahor, brother of Abraham, the master of the speaker.—(3.) Remote descendants, of the same family or tribe, but separated by many ages; "daughter of Heth," of his posterity; daughters of Canaan, of Moab, of Ammon; and Luke (1: 5,) says, Elisabeth was of the "daughters of Aaron," of his descendants, though many generations had intervened.—(4.) Daughter by nation. Dinah went out to see the young women of Shechem, called the "daughters of the land," Gen. 34: 1. See also Num. 25: 1. Deut. 23: 17.—(5.) Daughter, by reference to the human species; young women, of whatever nation. Gen. 30: 13. See Prov. 31: 29. Cant. 2: 2.—(6.) Daughter, by personification, of a people, or city, whence daughter of Jerusalem, of Zion; of Babylon; (Isa. 47: 1, 5,) of Edom; (Lam. 4: 21.) of Egypt, Jer. 46: 11, 14.—(7.) Daughter by law; (Ruth 3: 1.) and this is common in all nations, to call a son's wife daughter; but Boaz calls Ruth "daughter" by courtesy, as expressing kindness, affability, affection, from a senior to a junior in age, from a superior to an inferior by station, 3: 10, 11.—(8.) Daughter by adoption, as Esther was to Mordecai, (Esther 2: 7.) and as God promises his people by his grace, 2 Cor. 6: 18.—(9.) Daughter, in reference to disposition and conduct: as we have "sons of Belial," so we have "daughter of Belial," a woman of an unrestrainable conduct, uncontrollable; 1 Sam. 1: 16. (See also BELIAL, and SONS.)—Calmet.

DAVENANT, (JOHN, D. D.) bishop of Salisbury, was born in London, 1570, and educated at Cambridge where he took his degrees regularly. While there, Dr. Whitaker said, "that he would in time prove the honor of the university," a remark afterwards well fulfilled. A fellowship was offered him in 1594; but he did not accept it till after his father's death in 1597. Being thus settled in college, he soon rose to distinction, so that in 1609, he was elected Margaret professor of divinity. In 1611, he was chosen master of his college, and in 1618, was appointed by James I. one of the four divines whom he sent to the synod of Dort. During their stay in Holland, from November 3, to April 29, they were allowed ten pounds a day by the States, besides two hundred pounds, at their departure, and a gold medal to each, representing the sitting of the synod. Dr. Davenant returned to England in May, 1619, after having visited the most important places in the Netherlands. On the death of Dr. TOWNSON, his brother-in-law, he was advanced to the see of Salisbury. But in Lent, 1630—1, he incurred the displeasure of Charles I. and of the court, by a sermon on predestination, "all curious search into which," the king in his declaration prefixed to the thirty-nine articles in 1628, had strictly enjoined "to be laid aside." The bishop mildly vindicated his conduct before the privy council, and was dismissed, although he never recovered the favor of the court. He died of consumption in 1641. His death is said to have been hastened by his foresight of the troubles coming on the kingdom. Bishop Davenant was humble and hospitable, laborious and liberal. He was a man of great learning, and an eminent divine. He published a Latin Exposition of Colossians; Theological Prelections and Determinations; and a reply to S. Hoard on Reprobation.—Middleton.

DAVENPORT, (JOHN,) first minister of New Haven, and one of the founders of the colony of that name, was born in the city of Coventry in England in 1597, and educated at Oxford. Retiring to London, he became an eminent preacher among the Puritans, and at length minister of St. Stephen's church in Coleman street. As Mr. Davenport soon became a conscientious non-conformist, the persecutions, to which he was exposed, obliged him to resign his pastoral charge in Coleman street, and to retire into Holland at the close of the year 1633. A letter from Mr. Cotton, giving a favorable account of the colony of Massachusetts, induced Mr. Davenport to come to Boston, where he arrived, June 26, 1637, in company with Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hopkins. He was received with great respect, and in August was a prudent and useful member of the synod, which was occasioned by the errors of the day. He sailed with his company, March 30, 1638, for Quianipiack, or New Haven, to found a new colony. He preached under an oak, April 15th, the first sabbath after their arrival, and he was minister there near thirty years. In the government which was established, it was ordained, that none but members of the church should enjoy the privileges of freemen. This was a fatal error. He was, however, anxious to promote the purity of the church, and he therefore wrote against the result of the synod of 1662, which recommended a more general baptism of children, than had before that time been practised. He was scrupulously careful in admitting persons to church communion, it being a fixed principle with him, that no person should be received into the church, who did not exhibit satisfactory evidence, that he was truly penitent and believing. He did not think it possible to render the church perfectly pure, as men could not search into the heart; but he was persuaded, that there should be a discrimination.

After the death of Mr. Wilson, pastor of the first church in Boston, in 1667, Mr. Davenport was invited to succeed him. He was ordained their pastor, December 9, 1668, and James Allen at the same time teacher. But his labors in this place were of short continuance, for he died of an apoplexy, March 15, 1670, aged seventy-two. He was a distinguished scholar, an admirable preacher, and a man of exemplary piety and virtue. Such was his reputation, that he was invited with Mr. Cotton and Mr. Hooker to take a seat among the Westminster divines. Knowing the efficacy of prayer, he recommended with earnestness ejaculatory addresses to heaven. His intrepidity saved Whalley and Goffe, the judges of king Charles, who fled to New Haven in 1661. He concealed them in his own house, and when the pursuers were coming to New Haven, preached publicly from Isaiah 16: 3, 4, believing it to be a duty to afford them protection. His portrait is in the museum of Yale college. Mr. Davenport's publications were numerous. He also left behind him an exposition on the Canticles in a hundred sheets of small hand writing; but it was never published.—Wood's Ath. Oxon. ii. 460—462, 650; Mather's Mag. iii. 51—57; Trumbull's Conn. i. 89, 490—492; Hutchinson, i. 84, 226; Winthrop; Holmes; Stiles's Hist. Judges, 32, 69.—Allen.

DAVENPORT, (JAMES,) minister of Southold, Long island, was graduated at Yale college in 1732. He had been esteemed for some years a sound, pious, and faithful minister at Southold, when in the religious excitement of 1740 and 1741, he was borne away by a strange enthusiasm. He preached in New Haven and other towns, and encouraged the outcries and agitations, by which religion was disgraced. His voice he raised to the highest pitch, and gave it a tune, which was characteristic of the separate preachers. In his zeal he examined ministers as to the reality of their religion, and warned the people against unconverted ministers. In 1742, the assembly of Connecticut, deeming him under the influence of enthusiastic impulses, directed the governor and council to transport him out of the colony to the place whence he came. Without doubt, he was enthusiastic; but the assembly was equally bewildered, being arbitrary, and tyrannical. At last, through the influence of Mr. Wheelock and Mr. Williams, he was convinced of his error and published an ample confession and retraction in 1744. He died about the year 1755.—Trumbull, ii. 167, 189.—Allen.

DAVID, the celebrated king of Israel, was the youngest son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah, and was born 1055 years before Christ. Even an abstract of his history would be too long for this work. It may easily be collected from the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles. A few illustrative remarks only will be made in this place.

1. When David is called "the man after God's own heart," a phrase which profane persons have often perverted, his general character, and not every particular of it, is to be understood as approved by God; and especially his faithful and undeviating adherence to the true religion, from which he never deviated into any act of idolatry.

2. He was chosen to accomplish, to their full extent, the promises made to Abraham to give to his seed the whole country from the river of Egypt to the great river Euphrates. He had succeeded to a kingdom distracted with civil dissension, environed on every side by powerful and victorious enemies, without a capital, almost without an army, without any bond of union between the tribes. He left a compact and united state, stretching from the frontier of Egypt to the foot of Lebanon, from the Euphrates to the sea. He had crushed the power of the Philistines, subdued or curbed all the adjacent kingdoms: he had formed a lasting and important alliance with the great city of Tyre. He had organized an immense disposable force; for every month 24,000 men, furnished in rotation by the tribes, appeared in arms, and were trained as the standing militia of the country. At the head of his army were officers of consummate experience, and, what was more highly esteemed in the warfare of the time, extraordinary personal activity, strength, and valor. The Hebrew nation owed the long peace of Solomon, the son's reign, to the bravery and wisdom of the father.

3. As a king and conqueror, he was a type of Christ, and the country "from the river to the ends of the earth," was also the prophetic type of Christ's dominion over the whole earth. On a free election, he was anointed king over the house of Judah; and after about a seven years' contest, he was unanimously chosen king by all the tribes of Israel, "according to the word of the Lord by Samuel." As king of Israel, he administered justice and judgment to all his people, was a prince of courage and great military prudence and conduct; had frequent wars with the neighboring nations, to which he was generally forced by their invading his dominions, and plundering his subjects. Against them he never lost a battle; he never besieged a city without taking it; nor used any severities against those he conquered, beyond what the law of arms allowed, his own safety required, or the cruelties of his enemies rendered just, by way of retaliation; enriching his people by the spoils he took, and providing large stores of every thing necessary for the magnificent temple he intended to erect, in honor of the God of Israel.

4. His inspired psalms not only place him among the most eminent prophets, but have rendered him the leader of the devotions of good men, in all ages. The hymns of David excel no less in sublimity and tenderness of expression, than in loftiness and purity of religious sentiment. In comparison with them, the sacred poetry of all other nations sinks into mediocrity. They have embodied so exquisitely the universal language of religious emotion, that they have entered, with unquestioned propriety, into the ritual of the higher and more perfect religion of Christ. The songs which cheered the solitude of the desert caves of Engedi, or resounded from the voice of the Hebrew people as they wound along the glens or the hill-sides of Judea, have been repeated for ages in almost every part of the habitable world, in the remotest islands of the ocean, among the forests of America or the sands of Africa. How many human hearts have these inspired songs softened, purified, exalted! Of how many wretched beings have they been the secret consolation! On how many communities have they drawn down the blessings of Divine Providence, by bringing the affections into unison with their deep devotional fervor, and leading to a constant and explicit recognition of the government, rights, and mercies of God!—Watson.

DAVIDISTS, the adherents of David George, a native of Delft, who, in 1525, began to preach a new doctrine, publishing himself to be the true Messiah; and that he was sent of God to fill heaven, which was quite empty for want of people to deserve it. He is likewise said to have denied the existence of angels good and evil, and to have disbelieved the doctrine of a future judgment. He rejected marriage, with the Adamites; held with Manes, that the soul was not defiled by sin; and laughed at the self-denial so much recommended by Jesus Christ. Such were his principal errors. He made his escape from Delft, and retired first into Friesland, and then to Basil, where he changed his name, assuming that of John Bruck, and died in 1556. He left some disciples behind him, to whom he promised that he would rise again at the end of three years. Nor was he altogether a false prophet herein; for the magistrates of that city being informed, at the three years' end, of what he had taught, ordered him to be dug up and burnt, together with his writings, by the common hangman.—Hend. Buck.

DAVIDSON, (LUCRETIA MARIA,) a remarkable instance of precocious genius and piety, was born at Plattsburg, on lake Champlain, September 27, 1808, being the second daughter of Dr. Oliver Davidson and Margaret his wife. Her parents being in straitened circumstances, much of her time was devoted to the cares of home; yet she read much, and wrote poetry at a very early age. She had a burning thirst for knowledge. In October, 1824, a gentleman, on a visit to Plattsburg, saw some of her verses, and was made acquainted with her character and circumstances. He determined to give her the best education. On knowing his purpose, her joy was almost greater than she could bear. She was placed in Mrs. Willard's school at Troy; but her incessant application was perilous to her health. After returning home and recovering from illness, she was sent to Miss Gilbert's school at Albany. But soon she was again very ill. On her return, the hectic flush of her cheek indicated her approaching fate. The last name she pronounced, was that of her patron. She died August 27, 1825, aged nearly seventeen. Her person was singularly beautiful. She had a high, open forehead, a soft, black eye, perfect symmetry of features, a fair complexion, and luxuriant dark hair. The prevailing expression of her face was melancholy.

In her fifteenth year she wrote the following verses

"TO A STAR.

"How calmly, brightly, dost thou shine,
Like the pure lamp in Virtue's shrine!
Sure, the fair world, which thou mayest boast,
Was never ransomed, never lost.
There, beings, pure as heaven's own air,
Their hopes, their joys together share;
While hovering angels touch the string,
And seraphs spread the sheltering wing;
There, cloudless days and brilliant nights,
Illumed by heaven's refulgent lights,
There, seasons, years, unnoiced roll,
And unregretted by the soul.
'Thou little, sparkling Star of eve—
Thou gem upon an azure heaven!
How swiftly wilt I soar to thee,
When this imprisoned soul is free!"

Her poetical writings, besides many which were burnt, amount to two hundred seventy-eight pieces, among which were five poems of several cantos each. She also wrote some romances, and a tragedy. A biographical sketch, with a collection of her poems, was published by Mr. Samuel F. B. Morse, in 1829, with the title of "Amir Khan, and other Poems: the remains of L. M. Davidson." In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton, Kirke White, and John Urquhart, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement. By the early death of a person of such growing power and unequalled promise, we may well be taught the vanity of earthly hopes, and be led to estimate more highly and to seek more earnestly a lasting dwelling place in the world of unclouded light, and perfect holiness, and purest joy. She awaited the event with a reliance on the divine promises, hoping for salvation through the Lord Jesus Christ.—Allen.

DAVIES, (SAMUEL, D. D.,) president of Princeton college in New Jersey, born November 3, 1724. He was an only son. His mother, an eminent Christian, had earnestly besought him of heaven, and believing him to be given in answer to prayer, she named him Samuel. This excellent woman took upon herself the task of teaching her son to read, as there was no school in the neighborhood; and her efforts were rewarded by the uncommon proficiency of her pupil. At the age of ten he was sent to a school at some distance from home, and continued in it two years. His mind was at this period very little impressed by religious truth, though he was not inattentive to secret prayer, especially in the evening; but it was not long before that God, to whom he had been dedicated, and who designed him for eminent service in the gospel of his Son, was pleased to enlighten and renew him. Having tasted the joys and made a profession of religion at the age of fifteen, he became equally desirous of imparting to his fellow sinners the knowledge of the truth. With this object before him, he engaged with new ardor in literary and theological pursuits, under Samuel Blair. Every obstacle was surmounted; and after the previous trials, which he passed with distinguished approbation, he was licensed to preach the gospel at the age of twenty-two. He was also ordained February 19, 1747, that he might be qualified to perform pastoral duties.

He now applied himself to unfold and enforce those precious truths, whose power he had experienced on his own heart. His fervent zeal and undissembled piety, his popular talents and engaging methods of address, soon excited general admiration. He went to Hanover in April, 1747, and soon obtained of the general court a license to officiate in four meeting-houses. After preaching assiduously for some time, and not without effect, he returned from Virginia, though earnestly invited to continue his labors. A call for him to settle at Hanover was immediately sent to the presbytery; but he was about this time seized by complaints, which appeared consumptive, and which brought him to the borders of the grave. In this enfeebled state, he determined to spend the remainder of his life in unremitting endeavors to advance the interests of religion. Being among a people, who were destitute of a minister, his indisposition did not repress his exertions. He still preached in the day, while by night his hectic was so severe, as sometimes to render him delirious. In the spring of 1748, a messenger from Hanover visited him, and he thought it his duty to accept the invitation of the people in that place. He hoped, that he might live to organize the congregation. His health, however, gradually improved. In October, 1748, three more meeting-houses were licensed, and among his seven assemblies, which were in different counties, Hanover, Henrico, Caroline, Louisa, and Goochland, some of them forty miles distant from each other, he divided his labors. His home was in Hanover, about twelve miles from Richmond. His preaching encountered all the obstacles, which could arise from blindness, prejudice, and bigotry, from profaneness and immorality. He and those, who attended upon his preaching, were denominated new lights by the more zealous Episcopalians. But by his patience and perseverance, his magnanimity and piety, in conjunction with his evangelical and powerful ministry, he triumphed over opposition. Contempt and aversion were gradually turned into reverence. Many were attracted by curiosity to hear a man of such distinguished talents, and he proclaimed to them the most solemn and impressive truths with an energy, which they could not resist. It pleased God to accompany these exertions with the efficacy of his Spirit. In about three years, Mr. Davies beheld three hundred communicants in his congregation, whom he considered as real Christians. He had also in this period baptized about forty adult negroes, who made such a profession of saving faith, as he judged credible. In 1753, the synod of New York, by request of the trustees of New Jersey college, chose him to accompany Gilbert Tennent to Great Britain to solicit benefactions for the college. This service he cheerfully undertook, and he executed it with singular spirit and success. He arrived in London, December 25. The liberal benefactions, obtained from the patrons of religion and learning, placed the college in a respectable condition. After his return to America, he entered anew in 1754, or early in 1755, on his beloved task of preaching the gospel in Hanover. Here he continued till 1759, when he was chosen president of the college, as successor of Mr. Edwards. He hesitated in his acceptance of the appointment, for his people were endeared to him, and he loved to be occupied in the various duties of the ministerial office. But repeated applications and the unanimous opinion of the synod of New York and Philadelphia at length determined him. He was dismissed, May 13, and entered upon his new office, July 6, 1759. Here the vigor and versatility of his genius were strikingly displayed. The ample opportunities and demands, which he found for the exercise of his talents, gave a new spring to his diligence; and while his active labors were multiplied and arduous, his studies were intense. At the close of January, 1761, he was bled for a bad cold, and the next day transcribed for the press his sermon on the death of George II. The day following he preached twice in the chapel. His arm became inflamed, and a violent fever succeeded, to which he fell a victim in ten days. He died, February 4, 1761, aged 36. His venerable mother, Martha Davies, survived him. When he was laid in the coffin, she gazed at him a few minutes and said, "There is the son of my prayers and my hopes—my only son—my only earthly support. But there is the will of God, and I am satisfied."

The Father of spirits had endowed Mr. Davies with the richest intellectual gifts; with a vigorous understanding, a glowing imagination, a fertile invention, united with a correct judgment, and a retentive memory. He was bold and enterprising, and destined to excel in whatever he undertook. Yet was he divested of the pride of talents and of science, and, being moulded into the temper of the gospel, he consecrated all his powers to the promotion of religion. "O, my dear brother," says he in a letter to his friend Dr. Gibbons, "could we spend our lives in painful, disinterested, indefatigable service for God and the world, how serene and bright would it render the swift approaching eve of life! I am laboring to do a little to save my country, and, which is of much more consequence, to save souls from death, from that tremendous kind of death, which a soul can die. I have but little success of late; but, blessed be God, it surpasses my expectation, and much more my desert." His religion was purely evangelical. It brought him to the foot of the cross to receive salvation as a free gift. It rendered him humble and dissatisfied with himself amidst his highest attainments. As a parent, he felt all the solicitude, which nature and grace could inspire. "There is nothing," he writes, "that can wound a parent's heart so deeply, as the thought, that he should bring up children to dishonor his God here, and be miserable hereafter. I beg your prayers for mine, and you may expect a return in the same kind.—We have now three sons and two daughters. My dear little creature sob and drop a tear now and then under my instructions; but I am not so happy as to see them under deep and lasting impressions of religion; and this is the greatest grief they afford me." As president of the college, he possessed an admirable mode of government and instruction. He watched over his pupils with the tender solicitude of a father, and secured equally their reverence and love. He seized every opportunity to inculcate on them the worth of their souls, and the pressing necessity of securing immediately the blessings of salvation.

Dr. Davies was a model of the most striking oratory. As his personal appearance was august and venerable, yet benevolent and mild, he could address his auditory either with the most commanding authority, or with the most melting tenderness. When he spoke, he seemed to have the glories and terrors of the unseen world in his eye. He seldom preached without producing some visible emotions in great numbers present, and without making an impression on one or more, which was never effaced. His printed sermons, which exhibit his sentiments, abound with striking thoughts, with the beauties and elegances of expression, and with the richest imagery. They have been collected in three vols. octavo. See his Life, Preface to his Sermons, and Memoir of Davies by Dr. Rice.—Allen.

DAVY, (SIR HUMPHREY,) the most eminent of chemists, was born at Penzance, in Cornwall, December 17, 1778. In his fifteenth year, he became a pupil of Mr. Barlase of Penzance, to prepare for graduating as a physician at Edinburgh. By the time that he was eighteen, he acquired the rudiments of botany, anatomy, and physiology, the minor branches of mathematics, metaphysics, natural philosophy and chemistry: but it was to chemistry that his powers were principally directed. He now became acquainted with Mr. Davies Gilbert and Mr. Gregory Watt, and was by them introduced to Dr. Beddoes, who prevailed on him to suspend his design of going to Edinburgh, and to accept the superintendence of the Pneumatic Institution at Bristol. It was while he was at Bristol that he made his experiments on nitrous oxide, which he published under the title of Researches Chemical and Philosophical. The fame which he thus acquired led to his being elected, in 1800, professor of chemistry at the Royal Institution. As a lecturer, his popularity was unbounded. In 1802, he was chosen to fill the professorship to the Board of Agriculture; and the lectures which he delivered in this capacity were subsequently embodied in his Elements of Agricultural Chemistry. Having at his command all the "appliances and means" furnished by the powerful apparatus of the Royal Institution, Davy began and pursued that course of scientific investigation which has immortalized his name. The discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalis and earths, the creation of the science of electro-chemistry, the invention of the safety lamp, and of the mode of preserving the copper sheathing of ships, form only a part of his labors. In 1818, he was created a baronet, and in 1820, was elected president of the Royal Society. The presidency he resigned in 1827, in consequence of the declining state of his health obliging him to travel. Unfortunately his constitution was too far broken to be restored by a milder climate, and he died at Geneva, May 30, 1829. Besides the works already mentioned, Davy is the author of numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions; and of Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing; and Consolations in Travel. They were his last productions.

The estimation in which religion was held by this distinguished philosopher may be seen in the following extract from Salmonia. "I envy," says Sir Humphrey, "no quality of the mind or intellect in others,—not genius, power, wit, or fancy,—but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing; for it makes life a discipline of goodness—creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish, and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay calls up beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture and of shame the ladder of ascent to paradise; and, far above all combinations of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions of palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blessed; the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and the sceptic view only gloom, decay, and annihilation." His last work, Consolations in Travel, still more fully develops this religious tendency of his mind. Memoir of Sir H. Davy.—Davenport.

DAY. The day is distinguished into natural, astronomical, civil, and artificial; and there is another distinction which may be termed prophetic; the prophets being the only persons who call years days; of which there is an example in the explanation given of Daniel's seventy weeks. The natural day, is one revolution of the sun. The astronomical day, is one revolution of the equator, added to that portion of it through which the sun has passed in one natural day. The civil day is that, the beginning and end of which are determined by the custom of any nation. The Hebrews began their day in the evening; (Lev. 23: 32.) the Babylonians from sun-rising. The artificial day is the time of the sun's continuance above the horizon, which is unequal according to different seasons, on account of the obliquity of the sphere. The sacred writers generally divide the day and night into twelve unequal hours. The sixth hour is always noon throughout the year; and the twelfth hour is the last hour of the day. But in summer, the twelfth hour, as all the others were, was longer than in winter. (See HOURS.)

TO-DAY, does not only signify the particular day on which we are speaking, but any definite time; as we say, the people of the present day, or of that day, or time.—Calmet.

DEACON; (from the Greek, diakonos), a servant, a minister.

1. In the New Testament the word is used for any one that ministers in the service of God: bishops or presbyters are also styled deacons; but more particularly and generally it is understood of the secondary order of ministering servants in the church. 1 Cor. 3: 5. Col. 1: 23, 25. Phil. 1: 1. 1 Tim. 3.

The primitive deacons took care of the secular affairs of the church, received and disbursed monies, kept the church's accounts, and provided every thing necessary for its temporal good. Thus, while the bishop attended to the souls, the deacons attended to the bodies of the people; the pastor to the spiritual, and the deacons the temporal interests of the church. Acts 6.

2. In ecclesiastical polity, the lowest of the different orders of the clergy. In the Roman Catholic church he served at the altar, in the celebration of what are called the holy mysteries. He is also allowed to baptize and preach, with the permission of the bishop. Formerly deacons were allowed to marry, but this was prohibited to them very early; and at present the pope dispenses with this prohibition only for very important reasons. In such cases they re-enter the condition of laymen. There are eighteen cardinal-deacons in Rome, who have the charge of the temporal interests and the revenues of the church. A person, to be consecrated deacon, must be twenty-three years of age. In the English church, deacons are also ecclesiastics, who can perform all the offices of a priest, except the consecration of the sacramental elements, and the pronouncing of the absolution. In German Protestant churches, the assistant ministers are generally called deacons. If there be two assistants, the first of them is called arch-deacon. In the Presbyterian churches, the deacon's office is generally merged in that of ruling elder; but in some it is distinct, and simply embraces the distribution of alms. Among Congregationalists, the deacons, besides attending to the temporal concerns of the church, assist the minister with their advice, take the lead at prayer-meetings when he is absent, and preach occasionally to smaller congregations in the contiguous villages.—Buck.

DEACONESS; a female deacon. It is generally allowed, that in the primitive church there were deaconesses, i. e. pious women, whose particular business it was to assist in the entertainment and care of the itinerant preachers, visit the sick and imprisoned, instruct female catechumens, and assist at their baptism; then more particularly necessary, from the peculiar customs of those countries, the persecuted state of the church, and the speedier spreading of the gospel. Such a one, it is reasonable to think, Phebe was, (Rom. 16: 1), who is expressly called diakonos, a deaconess or stated servant, as Doddridge renders it.

THE DEAD SEA, JERUSHO AND THE MOUTH OF THE JORDAN.

They were usually widows, and, to prevent scandal, generally in years, 1 Tim. 5: 9. See also Spanheim. Hist. Christ. Secul. 1. p. 554. The apostolic constitutions, as they are called, mention the ordination of a deaconess, and the form of prayer used on that occasion, lib. 8. ch. 19, 20. Pliny also, in his celebrated epistle to Trajan (96,) is thought to refer to them; when speaking of two female Christians whom he put to the torture, he says, quæ ministræ dicebantur, i. e. "who were called deaconesses." But as the primitive Christians seem to have been led to this practice from the peculiarity of their circumstances, and the Scripture is entirely silent as to any appointment to this supposed office, or any rules about it, it is very justly laid aside, at least as an office.—Hend. Buck.

DEAD. (See EMBALMING; BURIAL; MOURNING.) Let the dead bury their dead; let men dead in sin bury those naturally dead; or let the dead lie unburied, rather than the preaching of the gospel be hindered. Dead faith is that persuasion of divine truth, which flows not from spiritual life, and is not productive of good works. James 2: 17—20. Dead works are those that flow not from a principle of true holiness, but from corrupt nature, which is in a state of moral death. Heb. 9: 14. To be dead to the law, as a covenant, is to be delivered from the obligations of it, and from a reigning inclination to be under it; (Rom. 7: 4.) and it is dead to us, when it, through Christ, can exercise no condemning power over our conscience. Gal. 2: 19. Sin is dead relatively, when it lies undiscovered and unregarded in the soul, (Rom. 7: 8;) it is dead really, when it is mortified and slain by the word, spirit, and blood of Christ. Rom. 6: 6. To die to sin, or be dead to it, is to be freed from the dominion of it, and the curse due to it, by the blood of Christ, and by his grace drawn from the love and service of it. Rom. 6: 7. The saints are dead both to the law and to sin. Col. 3: 3.—Brown.

DEAD SEA. This was anciently called the Sea of the Plain, (Deut. 3: 17; 4: 49,) from its situation in the great hollow or plain of the Jordan; the Salt Sea, (Deut. 3: 17; Joshua 15: 5,) from the extreme saltness of its waters; and the East Sea, (Ezek. 47: 18; Joel 2: 20,) from its situation relative to Judea, and in contradistinction to the West Sea, or Mediterranean. It is likewise called by Josephus, and by the Greek and Latin writers generally, Lacus Asphaltites; from the bitumen found in it; and the Dead Sea, its more frequent modern appellation, from a tradition, commonly though erroneously received, that no living creature could exist in its saline and sulphureous waters. It is at present known in Syria by the names of Almotanaah and Bahar Lath; and occupies what may be considered as the southern extremity of the vale of Jordan; forming, in that direction, the western boundary to the Holy Land. The Dead sea is about seventy miles in length, and twenty in breadth at its broadest part; having, like the Caspian, no visible communication with the ocean. Its depth seems to be altogether unknown; nor does it appear that a boat has ever navigated its surface. Towards its southern extremity, however, in a contracted part of the lake, is a ford, about six miles over, made use of by the Arabs: in the middle of which they report the water to be warm; indicating the presence of warm springs beneath. In general, towards the shore, it is shallow; and rises and falls with the seasons, and the quantity of water carried into it by seven streams, which fall into this their common receptacle, the chief of which is the Jordan.

The water now covering these ruins occupies what was formerly the vale of Siddim; a rich and fruitful valley, in which stood the five cities, called the cities of the plain, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela or Zoar: the four first of which were destroyed, while the latter, being "a little city," was preserved at the intercession of Lot; to which he fled for refuge from the impending catastrophe, and where he remained in safety during its accomplishment.

With regard to the agents employed in this catastrophe, there might seem reason to suppose that volcanic phenomena had some share in producing it; but Chateaubriand's remark is deserving of attention. "I cannot," he says, "coincide in opinion with those who suppose the Dead sea to be the crater of a volcano. I have seen Vesuvius, Solfatara, Monte Nuovo in the lake of Fusino, the peak of the Azores, the Marnalif opposite to Carthage, the extinguished volcanoes of Auvergne; and remarked in all of them the same characters; that is to say, mountains excavated in the form of a tunnel, lava, and ashes, which exhibited incontestable proofs of the agency of fire." After noticing the very different shape and position of the Dead sea, he adds: "bitumen, warm springs, and phosphoric stones are found, it is true, in the mountains of Arabia; but then, the presence of hot springs, sulphur, and asphaltos is not sufficient to attest the anterior existence of a volcano." The learned Frenchman inclines to adopt the idea of professors Michaëlis and Büsching, that Sodom and Gomorrah were built upon a mine of bitumen; that lightning kindled the combustible mass, and that the cities sank in the subterraneous conflagration. M. Malte Brun ingeniously suggests, that the cities might themselves have been built of bituminous stones, and thus have been set in flames by the fire of heaven. Captains Irby and Mangles collected on the southern coast, lumps of nitre and fine sulphur, from the size of a nutmeg up to that of a small hen's egg, which, it was evident from their situation, had been brought down by the rain: "their great deposit must be sought for," they say, "in the cliff." These cliffs then were probably swept by the lightnings, and their flaming masses poured in a deluge of fire upon the plain.—Watson.

DEAL; to act, to behave. Jesus deals plainly in the work of our redemption, always employing the most proper means to gain the most noble end. Isa. 52: 13. 2. To distribute by parts, (Isa. 58: 7. Rom. 12: 3;) and a deal signifies a part. Exod. 29: 40. Num. 15: 4—9. God deals bountifully and in mercy, when he graciously bestows his favors on men worthless and miserable. Ps. 116: 17. 119: 17, 124; and 142: 7. He deals bitterly and in fury, when he sorely afflicts and punishes men. Ruth 1: 21. Ezek. 8: 18. 16: 59. 22: 24.—Brown.

DEAR; precious, eminently beloved. Jer. 31: 20. Col. 1: 13. Dearly beloved; loved in the most tender manner, and highest degree. Rom. 12: 19. The Jewish nation were the dearly beloved of God's soul. He had taken great delight to do them good, and brought them into covenant with him, as his peculiar people. Jer. 12: 7.—Brown.

DEATH, is generally defined to be the separation of the soul from the body. It is styled in scripture language, a departure out of this world to another, (2 Tim. 4: 7;) a dissolving of the earthly house of this tabernacle, (2 Cor. 5: 1;) a going the way of all the earth, (Jos. 23: 14;) a returning to the dust, (Ecc. 13: 7;) a sleep, (John 11: 11. Death may be considered as the effect of sin, (Rom. 5: 12;) yet, as our existence is from God, no man has a right to take away his own life, or the life of another, Gen. 9: 6. Satan is said to have the power of death, (Heb. 2: 14;) not that he can at his pleasure inflict death on mankind, but as he was the instrument of first bringing death into the world, (John 8: 44;) and as he may be the executioner of God's wrath on impenitent sinners, when God permits him. Death is but once, (Heb. 9: 27;) certain, (Job 14: 1, 2;) powerful and terrific, called the king of terrors, (Job 18: 14;) uncertain as to the time, (Prov. 28: 1;) universal, (Gen. 5: 5;) necessary, that God's justice may be displayed, and his mercy manifested; desirable to the righteous, Luke 2: 28—30. The fear of death is a source of uneasiness to the generality, and to a guilty conscience it may indeed be terrible; but to a good man it should be obviated by the consideration that death is the termination of every trouble; that it puts him beyond the reach of sin and temptation; that God has promised to be with the righteous, even to the end, (Heb. 13: 5;) that Jesus Christ has taken away the sting, (1 Cor. 15: 54;) and that it introduces him to a state of endless felicity, 2 Cor. 5: 8.

Preparation for death. This does not consist in bare morality; in an external reformation from gross sins; in attention to a round of duties in our own strength; in acts of charity; in a zealous profession; in possessing eminent gifts;—but in reconciliation to God; repentance of sin; faith in Christ; obedience to his word; and all the effect of regeneration by the Spirit. 3 John 3: 6. 1 Cor. 11: 3. Tit. 5. Bates's four last Things; Hopkins, Declincourt, Sherlock, and Fellows, on Death; Bp. Porteus's Poem on Death; Saurin's Sermons on the Fear of Death; Watts's World to Come; Dwight's Theology, ser. clxiii.

Spiritual death is that awful state of ignorance, insensibility, and disobedience, which mankind are in by nature, and which excludes them from the favor and enjoyment of God. Luke 1:79. (See DEPRIVITY; SIN.)

BROTHERS OF DEATH, a denomination usually given to the religious of the order of St. Paul, the first hermit. They are called Brothers of Death, on account of the figure of a death's head which they were always to have with them, in order to keep perpetually before them the thoughts of death. The order was probably suppressed by pope Urban VIII.—Hend. Buck.

DEBATE; to dispute. A man ought to debate his cause with his neighbor; he ought privately and meekly to reason on the point of difference between them. Prov. 25:9. God debates in measure with his people, when he reproves and corrects them, as they are able to bear it. Isa. 27:8. DEBATE, signifies contention, especially in words. Rom. 1:29.—Brown.

DEBIR, the name of a city, probably signifying, "the oracle," or rather that separated part of a temple, called the azytum; or the most retired or secret part, from which the oracle was understood to issue. In Joshua 10:39, this city is called Debira, which name appears to be that of Debir with an emphasis, THE ORACLE; and as it should seem that is called also Kirjath-sepher, "the city of the book," or learning; and Kirjath-sena, the "city of purity," from the Chaldee and Arabic roots to cleanse, Mr. Taylor thinks we may safely conclude that it was a priestly university of the ancient heathen inhabitants; to which the ideas of holiness, learning, and oracular information were attached; together with that of retirement. This ancient city was near Hebron, in the south of Judah, and its first inhabitants were giants of the race of Anak. Joshua took it, and slew its king, Josh. 10:39. 12:13. It fell by lot to Caleb; and Othniel first entering the place, Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah, 15:16. It subsequently belonged to the Levites, 21:15. 1 Chron. 6:58.

There were two other cities of this name; one belonging to Gad, beyond Jordan, (Josh. 13:26.) the other to Benjamin, though originally to Judah, Josh. 15:7.—Calmet.

DEBORAH, a prophetess, wife of Lapidoth, judged the Israelites, and dwelt under a palm-tree between Ramah and Bethel, Judges 4:4, 5. She sent for Barak, directed him to attack Sisera, and, in the name of God, promised him victory; but Barak refusing to go, unless she went with him, she told him, that the honor of this expedition would be given to a woman, and not to him. After the victory, Deborah and Barak sung a fine thanksgiving song, the composition probably of Deborah alone, which is preserved, Judges 5.—Watson.

DEBTS. In nothing, perhaps, do the Israelitish laws deviate so far from our own, as in regard to matters of debt. Imprisonment was unknown amongst the Hebrews, who were equally free from those long and expensive modes of procedure with which we are acquainted, for the recovery of debts. Their laws in this respect were simple, but efficient. Where pledges were lodged with a creditor for the payment of a debt, which was not discharged, the creditor was allowed to appropriate the pledge to his own benefit, without any interposition of a magistrate, and to keep it as rightfully as if it had been bought with the sum which had been lent for it. But, besides the pledge, every Israelite had various pieces of property, on which execution for debt might readily be made; as, (1.) His hereditary land, the produce of which might be attached till the year of jubilee. (2.) His houses, which, with the sole exception of those of the Levites, might be sold in perpetuity, Lev. 25:29, 30. (3.) His cattle, household furniture, and ornaments, appear also liable to be taken in execution. See Job 24:3. Prov. 22:27. From Deut. 15:1—11, we see that no debt could be exacted from a poor man in the seventh year; because, the land lying fallow, he had no income whence to pay it. (4.) The person of the debtor, who might be sold, along with his wife and children, if he had any. See Leviticus 25:39. Job 24:9. 2 Kings 4:1; Isaiah 50:1. Nehem. 5. We have no intimation, in the writings of Moses, that suretiship was practised among the Hebrews in cases of debt. In the Proverbs of Solomon, however, there are many admonitions respecting it. Where this warranty was given, the surety was treated with the same severity as if he had been the actual debtor; and if he could not pay, his very bed might be taken from under him, Prov. 22:27. There is a reference to the custom observed in contracting this obligation in Prov. 17:18, "A man void of understanding striketh hands," &c.; and also in Prov. 22:26, "Be not thou one of them that strike hands," &c. It is to be observed that the hand was given, not to the creditor, but to the debtor, in the creditor's presence. By this act the surety intimated that he became in a legal sense one with the debtor, and rendered himself liable to pay the debt.

2. We have above noticed the practice of lending on pledge; but as this was liable to considerable abuse, the following judicial regulations were adopted: (1.) The creditor was not allowed to enter the house of the debtor to fetch the pledge, but was obliged to stand without the door, and wait till it was brought to him, Deut. 24:10, 11. This law was wisely designed to restrain avaricious and unprincipled persons from taking advantage of their poor brethren in choosing their own pledges. (2.) The upper garment, which served by night for a blanket, (Exod. 22:25, 26. Deut. 24:12, 13,) and mills and mill-stones, if taken in pledge, were to be restored to the owner before sunset. The reason of this law was, that these articles were indispensable to the comfortable subsistence of the poor; and, for the same reason, it is likely that it extended to all necessary utensils. Such a restoration was no loss to the creditor; for he had it in his power at last, by the aid of summary justice, to lay hold of the whole property of the debtor; and, if he had none of his person: and in the event of non-payment, as before stated, to take him for a bond slave.—Watson.

DECALOGUE; the ten commandments given by God to Moses.

The ten commandments were engraved by God on two tables of stone. The Jews, by way of eminence, called these commandments the ten words, from whence they had afterwards the name of decalogue; but they joined the first and second into one, and divided the last into two. They understand that against stealing to relate to the stealing of men, or kidnapping; alleging that the stealing one another's goods or property is forbidden in the last commandment. The church of Rome has struck the second commandment quite out of the decalogue, and to make their number complete, has split the tenth into two. The reason is obvious.—Hend. Buck.

DECAPOLIS; (from the Greek deka, ten, and polis, a city,) a country in Palestine, which contained ten principal cities, on both sides of Jordan, Matt. 4:25. Mark 5:20. 7:31. According to Pliny, they were, 1. Scythopolis; 2. Philadelphia; 3. Raphance; 4. Gadara; 5. Hippos; 6. Dios; 7. Peila; 8. Gerasa; 9. Canatha; 10. Damascus. Josephus inserts Otopos, instead of Canatha. Though within the limits of Israel, the Decapolis was probably inhabited by foreigners; and hence it retained a foreign appellation. This may also contribute to account for the numerous herds of swine kept in the district, (Matt. 8:30.) a practice which was forbidden by the Mosaic law.—Calmet.

DECEIT, consists in passing any thing upon a person for what it is not, as when falsehood is made to pass for truth. (See HYPOCRISY.)—Hend. Buck.

DECEITFUL. Our hearts and their lusts are deceitful above all things; they in unnumbered ways beguile multitudes out of their present and eternal happiness for mere trifles, and render them persuaded of the innocence or goodness of things the most abominable and wicked; fill them with views of God, of Christ, of time, and eternity, of themselves, the most contrary to truth. Jer. 17:9. Heb. 3:13. Eph. 4:22. Men handle the word of God deceitfully, when they wrest it to please the corrupt humors of themselves or others; when they mingle it with their own inventions, and use it to promote or protract passion, pride, covetousness, &c. 2 Cor. 4:2. and 2:17.

The Lord deceives false prophets, when he gives them up to the delusions of their own hearts, and frustrates their expectations and predictions. Ezek. 14:7. Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived: thou hast, contrary to my inclinations, persuaded me to undertake this office of prophesying, and hast disappointed me of the success and comfort I expected in it. Jer. 20:7. Heretics deceive and are deceived; they are persuaded of the goodness or innocence of error and wickedness, and endeavor to persuade others of it. 2 Tim. 3: 13.—Brown.

DECEPTION, (SELF.) See SELF-DECEPTION.

DECLAMATION; a speech made in public in the tone and manner of an oration, uniting the expression of action to the propriety of pronunciation, in order to give the sentiment its full impression on the mind. It is used also in a derogatory sense; as when it is said, such a speech was mere declamation, it implies that it was deficient in point of reasoning, or had more sound than sense.—Hend. Buck.

DECLAMATION OF THE PULPIT. The dignity and sanctity of the place, and the importance of the subject, require the preacher to exert the utmost powers of his voice, to produce a pronunciation that is perfectly distinct and harmonious, and that he observe a deportment and action which is expressive and graceful. The preacher should not roar like a common crier, and rend the air with a voice like thunder; for such kind of declamation is not only without meaning and without persuasion, but highly incongruous with the meek and gentle spirit of the gospel. He should likewise take particular care to avoid a monotony; his voice should rise from the beginning, as it were, by degrees, and its greatest strength should be exerted in the application. Each inflection of the voice should be adapted to the phrase and to the meaning of the words; and each remarkable expression should have its peculiar inflexion. The dogmatic requires a plain, uniform tone of voice only, and the menaces of God's word demand a greater force than its promises and rewards; but the latter should not be pronounced in the soft tone of a flute, nor the former with the loud sound of a trumpet. The voice should still retain its natural tone in all its various inflexions. Happy is that preacher who has a voice that is at once strong, flexible, and harmonious. An air of complacency and benevolence, as well as devotion, should be constantly visible in the countenance of the preacher; but every appearance of affectation must be carefully avoided; for nothing is so disgusting to an audience as even the semblance of dissimulation. Eyes constantly rolling, turned towards heaven, and streaming with tears, rather denote a hypocrite than a man possessed of the real spirit of religion, and who feels the true import of what he preaches. An air of affected devotion infallibly destroys the efficacy of all that the preacher can say, however just and important it may be. On the other hand, he must avoid every appearance of mirth or raillery, or of that cold, unfeeling manner, which is so apt to freeze the heart of his hearers. The body should in general be erect, and in a natural and easy attitude. The perpetual movement or contortion of the body has a ridiculous effect in the pulpit, and makes the figure of a preacher and a harlequin too similar; on the other hand, he ought not to remain constantly upright and motionless, like a speaking statue. The motions of the hands give a strong expression to a discourse; but they should be decent, grave, noble, and expressive. The preacher who is incessantly in action, who is perpetually clapping his hands, or who menaces with a clenched fist, or counts his arguments on his fingers, will only excite mirth among his auditory. In a word, declamation is an art that the sacred orator should study with assiduity. The design of a sermon is to convince, to affect, and to persuade. The voice, the countenance, and the action, which are to produce the triple effect, are therefore objects to which the preacher should particularly apply himself. (See ELOQUENCE; SERMON.)—Hend. Buck.

DE COURCY, (RICHARD, B. A.) was a native of Ireland, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin; but his acquaintance with several eminent clergymen brought him to England. In 1770, he accepted a curacy in Shrewsbury, the rectorship of which belonged to the Rev. Mr. Sillingfleet. In January, 1774, he was presented, by the lord chancellor, to the vicarage of St. Alkmund's, which occasioned a considerable stir in the parish; the theological sentiments and style of preaching of Mr. De Courcy being of a puritanical, or, as some would term it, an evangelical cast; and this circumstance gave rise to a satirical poem, entitled "St. Alkmund's Ghost" by one of his parishioners. He had not been long inducted to his vicarage before he attacked the Anti-pedobaptists, on their discriminating tenet, and thereby involved himself in a controversy which ramified and expanded on every side, and furnished a sufficient employment for his pen for several years. At length a little satirical poem, in Hudibrastic verse, entitled "The Salopian Zealot; or, the Good Vicar in a bad Mood," written by Mr. Benjamin Francis, of Horsley, in Gloucestershire, though totally free from scurrility, yet, seasoned as it was with no ordinary portion of caustic, administered a powerful quietus to the vicar, and put an end to the controversy. His other productions, from the press, were, "Jehu's Looking-glass; or, True and False Zeal," "Nathan's Message to David," a sermon; "Two Fast Sermons, on the Profanation of the Sabbath," 1778; "Seduction," a poem, 1782; "The Seducer convicted on his own Evidence," 1783; "Christ Crucified, the distinguishing Topic of the Gospel," two volumes, foolscap octavo, 1791 (afterwards reprinted in one volume, octavo); and, soon after his decease, there appeared, in one volume, octavo, "Sermons by the late Rev. Richard De Courcy; to which are prefixed, An Essay on the Nature, &c. of Pure and Undeified Religion, and a Preface," &c. As a preacher, he greatly excelled, and was deservedly popular. His language was highly polished; his elocution peculiarly graceful; his manner dignified; and his addresses furnish some of the most finished specimens of pulpit eloquence that are any where to be found. He died at the age of sixty, and was interred, November 9, 1803, at Shawbury, having been thirty years minister of the gospel in Shrewsbury.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

DECREES OF GOD; a phrase rather unfortunately used in theological writings, to express the comprehensive and glorious designs of divine wisdom in the creation and government of the universe. They are defined to be his settled purposes, whereby he fore-ordains to perform, permit, or suffer, whatsoever comes to pass. Dan. 4: 24. Acts 15: 18. Eph. 1: 11. This doctrine has been the subject of one of the most perplexing controversies that has occurred among mankind, owing chiefly to misapprehension of its real nature and consequences. It is not, as some seem to think, a novel doctrine. The opinion, that whatever occurs in the world at large, or in the lot of private individuals, is the result of a previous and unalterable arrangement by that Supreme Power which presides over nature, has always been held, not only by many of the vulgar, but by the vast majority of cultivated and philosophic minds. Traces of it in a crude form are found in the philosophy of all nations, who have attained any just notions of the Deity. It is, in fact, but a fuller development of the admitted doctrine of divine providence. The ancient stoics, Zeno and Chrysippus, whom the Jewish Essenes seem to have followed, asserted the existence of a Deity, who, acting wisely, but, as they supposed, necessarily, contrived the general system of the world; from which, by a series of causes, whatever is now done in it unavoidably results. Mahomet introduced into his Koran the doctrine of an absolute predestination of the course of human affairs. He represented life and death, prosperity and adversity, and every event that befalls a man in this world, as the unavoidable result of a previous determination of the one God who rules over all. Augustine, and the whole of the earliest reformers, but especially Calvin, favored this doctrine in a better digested form; embracing, not excluding, human responsibility and the use of means. In this form it was generally asserted, and publicly owned, in most of the confessions of faith of the reformed churches, and particularly in the church of England; and to this we may add, that it was maintained by a great number of divines in the last two centuries.

As to the nature of these decrees, it must be observed that they are real designs; not indeed the result of deliberation, or the Almighty's debating matters within himself, reasoning in his own mind about the expediency or inexpediency of things, as creatures do; nor are they merely contingent and fluctuating ideas of things future, but settled determinations founded on his comprehensive views, and sovereign pleasure. Is. 40: 14. They are to be considered as eternal: this is evident; for if God be eternal, consequently his purposes must be of equal duration with himself; to suppose otherwise, would be to suppose that there was a time when he was undetermined and mutable; whereas no new determinations or after-thoughts can arise in his mind. Job 23: 13, 14.—2. They are free, without any compulsion, and not excited by any motive out of himself. Rom. 9: 15.—3. They are infinitely wise, displaying his glory, and promoting the general good. Rom. 11: 33.—4. They are immutable, for this is the result of his being infinitely perfect; for if there were the least change in God's understanding, it would be an instance of imperfection. Mal. 3: 6.—5. They are extensive or universal, relating to all creatures and things in heaven, earth, and hell, Eph. 1: 11. Prov. 16: 4.—6. They are secret, or at least only so far known as God is pleased to discover them. It is therefore presumption for any to attempt to enter into or judge of his secret purpose, or to decide upon what he has not revealed. Deut. 29: 29. Nor is an unknown or supposed decree of God at any time to be the rule of our conduct. His revealed will alone must be considered as the rule by which we are to judge of the event of things, as well as of our conduct at large. Rom. 11: 34.—7. Lastly, they are effectual; for whether they relate to things simply suffered, or things executed by himself, as he is infinitely wise to plan, so he is infinitely powerful to perform: his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Is. 46: 10.

A living divine has laid down the following principles on this profound subject of human thought.

1. God had a design in the production of the universe. For where there is no design in action, there is no wisdom in the agent; which, to deny to God, were no better than blasphemy or atheism.

2. That all things which he has produced, with all their qualities, circumstances and connexions, are individual parts of one great whole, one magnificent system.

3. That he had from the first a full view of all the particulars comprehended in this immense system, and arranged them in infinite wisdom to bring out of their combined and complicated action the best result.

4. That the plan of infinite wisdom comprehends moral and responsible agents, and makes ample provision for their free agency with all its eternal consequences.

5. That the divine plan, of course, comprehends to a certain extent the sufferance of sin, or the transgression of the divine laws by free moral agents, not as unavoidable, but incidental.

6. That if God, consistently with his glorious perfections, can comprehend in his plan the sufferance of sin, as we know to be the fact, he can also determine to limit, control, and punish it; and to overrule the final result of every sinful action, in a way worthy of his character as the Maker and Ruler of all.

7. That the sufferance of sin, under such a control of infinite wisdom, does not and cannot imply, either that God is its author, or that sin is the object of his approbation, or that it is the necessary means of the greatest good, or that those who commit it are not worthy of punishment such as God has threatened in his word.

8. That if we fully understand the subject, we can as easily trace the harmony between free moral agency and the immutability of the divine decrees, as between any other moral cause and its legitimate effect; and all attempts to prove them at variance are equally condemned by the Scriptures, by sound philosophy, and by human consciousness.

This doctrine should teach us—1. Admiration. "He is the rock, his work is perfect, for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right is he." Deut. 32: 4.—2. Reverence. "Who would not fear thee, O King of nations? for to thee doth it appertain." Jer. 10: 7.—3. Humility. "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Rom. 11: 33.—4. Submission. "For he doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" Dan. 4: 35.—7. Desire for heaven. "What I do, thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." John 13: 7. (See NECESSITY; PREDESTINATION.)—Dwight's Theology; Hend. Buck.

DECREES OF COUNCILS, are the laws made by them to regulate the doctrine and policy of the church. Thus the acts of the Christian council at Jerusalem are called. Acts 16: 4.—Hend. Buck.

DECRETAL; a letter of a pope, determining some point of question in the ecclesiastical law. The decretals compose the second part of the canon law. The first genuine one, acknowledged by all the learned as such, is a letter of pope Siricinus, written in the year 385, to Himerus, bishop of Tarragona, in Spain, concerning some disorders which had crept into the churches of Spain. The oldest collection of decretals was made by Isidore, of Seville, (who died 636,) and is yet extant in manuscript. Gratian published a collection of decretals, containing all the ordinances made by the popes till the year 1150. Gregory IX. in 1227, following the example of Theodosius and Justinian, formed a constitution of his own, collecting into one body all the decisions and all the causes which served to advance the papal power; which collection of decretals was called the Pentateuch, because it contained five books.—Hend. Buck.

DEDAN, or DADAN; the son of Raamah, mentioned Gen. 10: 7. Josephus, adverting to this text, instead of Dedan, reads Judah; and says, that this Judah was the father of certain Jews inhabiting the western part of Ethiopia. It is not fully agreed among the learned, whether Dedan and Dedanim, names often mentioned by the prophets, (see Isa. 21: 13. Jer. 25: 23. and 49: 8. Ez. 25: 13. 27: 15, 20. and 38: 13.) are the same with Dedanim, a person spoken of, Gen. 10: 4, among the descendants of Japheth; or whether he is the same with Dedan, mentioned, ver. 7, among the descendants of Ham; or whether he is not rather a descendant of Dedan, the son of Jokshan, and grandson of Abraham by Keturah. Gen. 25: 3. Ezekiel speaks of the Dedanites as trading with the Tyrians in ivory, ebony, and fine cloths for chariots; and as he classes them with the people of Sheba, Eden, Ashur, and Chilmad, it is concluded that they must have dwelt in Mesopotamia, or Syria, and it is said there exists at this day a city which goes by the name of Dedan, situated in Arabia Felix, on the west of the Persian gulf.—Jones.

DEDICATION; a religious ceremony, whereby any person or thing is solemnly consecrated, or set apart to the service of God and the purposes of religion.

The use of dedications is very ancient, both among the worshippers of the true God, and among the heathens. In the Scriptures, we meet with dedications of the tabernacle, altars, &c. Under Christianity, dedication is only applied to a church, and is properly the consecration thereof to the worship of God. (See CONSECRATION.)—Hend. Buck.

DEER. (See HART, and HIND.)

DEERING, (EDWARD, B. D.) an English divine of the sixteenth century, was a fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge, and a very famous preacher. The volume of his published works is full of divine learning and consolation. Though he sought not preferment, he was appointed a preacher at St. Paul's in London; and he filled that appointment with a series of faithful labors in the work of the gospel. But in his last sickness he humbly lamented his inefficiency. "The good Lord pardon my great negligence, that while I had time, I used not the precious gift more for the advancement of his glory, as I might have done. Yet I bless God that I have not abused the gift on ambition and vain studies." "Blessed are they, who, while they have tongues, use them to God's glory." "If I were the most excellent of all creatures in the world, equal in righteousness to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, yet would I confess myself to be a sinner, and that I expected salvation only in the righteousness of Jesus Christ; for we all stand in need of the grace of God. As for my death, I bless God, I find and feel so much comfort and joy in my soul, that if I were put to my choice whether to live or die, I would a thousand times rather choose death than life, if it may stand with the holy will of God." This excellent man died in 1576.—Middleton.

DEFENCE. (See SELF-DEFENCE.)

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, (Fidei Defensor;) a peculiar title belonging to the king of England; as Catholicus to the king of Spain; Christianissimus, to the king of France; and Apostolicus to the king of Hungary, &c. These titles were given by the popes of Rome. That of Fides Defensor was conferred by Leo X. on king Henry VIII. for writing against Martin Luther; and the bull for it bears date quinto idus, October, 1521. It was afterwards confirmed by Clement VII. But the pope, on Henry's suppressing the houses of religion, at the time of the reformation, not only deprived him of his title, but deposed him of his crown also; though, in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, his title, &c. was confirmed by parliament, and has continued to be used by all his successors. Chamberlayne says, the title belonged to the kings of England before that time, and for proof hereof appeals to several charters granted to the university of Oxford: so that pope Leo's bull was only a renovation of an ancient right.—Hend. Buck.

DEFILEMENT. Under the law, many were those blemishes of person and conduct, which were considered as defilements: some were voluntary, others involuntary; some were inevitable, and the effect of nature itself; others arose from personal transgression. Under the gospel, defilements are those of the heart, of the mind, the temper, and conduct. The ceremonial uncleannesses of the law are superseded as religious rites; though many of them claim attention as usages of health, decency, and civility.—Watson.

DEGENERATE; grown worse than it was originally. The Jews were turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine, when, leaving the example of their pious ancestors, they gradually became almost as wicked as heathens. Jer. 2: 21. If mankind universally were not degenerate, they would not need regeneration.—Brown.

DEGRADATION, (ECCLESIASTICAL,) is the deprivation of a priest of his dignity. We have an instance of it in the eighth century, at Constantinople, in the person of the patriarch Constantine, who was made to go out of the church backwards, stripped of his pallium, and anathematized. In England, Cranmer was degraded by order of the bloody queen Mary. They dressed him in episcopal robes, made only of canvass; put the mitre on his head, and the pastoral staff in his hand, and in this attire showed him to the people, and then stripped him piece by piece.—H. Buck.

DEGREES, (PSALMS OF) the name or title prefixed in our translation to fifteen of the psalms; that is, from the hundred and twentieth, to the hundred and thirty-fourth inclusive. Various are the explanations that have been given of this title, by the learned. Junius and Tremellius translate the Hebrew word, "a song of excellencies," or an excellent song, in reference to the subject; as eminent persons are called "men of high degree." 1 Chron. 17: 17: Some call them "Psalms of elevation" because, say they, they were sung with an exalted voice. But the most probable opinion is, and indeed it corresponds with the literal translation of the Hebrew, namely, that instead of "Psalms of degrees," the words should be translated "Odes of ascensions," that is, odes which were sung when the Israelites came up to worship in Jerusalem at the annual festivals, or, perhaps, from their state of captivity at Babylon. Their return home on this latter occasion is certainly called "the ascension, or coming up from Babylon." Ezra 7: 9. And the old Syriac translator, who explains the subject of the Psalms by apposite titles, refers to this circumstance almost all the psalms that bear this inscription; some of them perhaps on insufficient grounds, but many of them certainly have a manifest relation to it. Theodoret indiscriminately explains them all as relating to the Babylonish captivity, and thus illustrates the title: "Odes of the ascensions;" Theodoret calls them "Songs of the ascension;" and Symmachus, "Odes or songs on the returns." (See Lenth's Hebrew Poetry, Lect. 25, note 15.)—Jones.

DEHAVITES; the people of Ava; perhaps inhabitants of that part of Assyria which was watered by the river Diaba. See Ezra 4: 9. 2 Kings 17: 24.—Calmet.

DEISTS. This term appears to have had an honorable origin, being of the same import as Theists, designating those who believe in the existence of a supreme intelligent cause, in opposition to the Epicureans, and other atheistical philosophers. The name, in modern times, is said to have been first assumed about the middle of the sixteenth century, by some persons on the continent, in order to avoid the imputation of atheism. Peter Viret, a divine of that century, mentions it as a new name assumed by those who rejected Christianity. Lord Edward Herbert, baron of Cherbury, in the seventeenth century, has been regarded as the first deistical writer who reduced deism to a system; affirming the sufficiency of reason and natural religion, and rejecting divine revelation as unnecessary and superfluous. His system, however, embraced these five articles:—1. The being of God. 2. That he is to be worshipped. 3. That piety and moral virtue are the chief parts of worship. 4. That God will pardon our faults on repentance. And, 5. That there is a future state of rewards and punishment.

Some have divided all deists into two classes—those who admit a future state, and those who deny it. But Dr. S. Clarke, taking the term in the most extensive sense, arranges them under four classes:—1. Those who admit a Supreme Being, but deny that he concerns himself with the conduct or affairs of men; maintaining, with Lucretius, that God

"Nor smiles at good, nor frowns at wicked, deeds."

2. Those who admit not only the being but the providence of God, with respect to the natural world; but who allow no difference between moral good and evil, nor that God takes any notice of our moral conduct. 3. Such as believe in the natural attributes of God, and his all-governing providence; yet deny the immortality of the soul, or any future state. 4. Such as admit the existence of God, his providence, and the obligations of natural religion; but so far only as these things are discoverable by the light of nature, without any divine revelation. Some of the deists have attempted to overthrow the Christian dispensation, by opposing to it what they call the absolute perfection of natural religion. Others, as Blount, Collins, and Morgan, have endeavored to gain the same purpose, by attacking particular parts of the Christian scheme, by explaining away the literal sense and meaning of certain passages, or by placing one portion of the sacred canon in opposition to the other. A third class, wherein we meet with the names of Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, advancing farther in their progress, expunge from their creed the doctrine of future existence, deny or controvert all the moral perfections of the Deity, and wholly reject the Scriptures.

The deists of the present day are distinguished by their zealous efforts to diffuse the principles of infidelity among the common people. Hume, Bolingbroke, and Gibbon, addressed themselves solely to the more polished classes of the community; but of late, the writings of Paine, Palmer, Carline, Owen, Jennings, Kneeland, and others, have diffused infidelity among the lower orders of society, and clothed it in the dress of vulgar ridicule, the more effectually to destroy in the common people all reverence for sacred things. Among the disciples of this school, deism has led to the most disgusting atheism. Thus "evil men and seducers wax worse and worse."

"But," as one observes, "the friends of Christianity have no reason to regret the free and unreserved discussion which their religion has undergone. Objections have been stated and urged in their full force, and as fully answered: arguments and railery have been repelled; and the controversy between Christians and deists has called forth a great number of excellent writers, who have illustrated both the doctrines and evidences of Christianity in a manner that will ever reflect honor on their names, and be of lasting service to the cause of genuine religion, and the best interests of mankind." DEITY OF CHRIST. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

DELANY, (PATRICK,) an Irish clergyman of some eminence, was born in the year 1686. At Trinity college he was distinguished for his industry, good conduct, and learning; obtained the usual degrees, and became a senior or fellow of that college. To his duties as a minister of the gospel he paid the greatest attention, and devoted the energies of his mind to the improvement of the pupils committed to his care. In 1727, lord Carteret raised him to the chancellorship of Christ church. In 1732, he distinguished himself by the publication of the first volume of a work, entitled "Revelation examined with candor." In 1734, he published the second volume, which was as rapidly and generally perused as any theological work of the day. The work passed through several editions, and is still held in deserved estimation. In 1738, he was engaged in writing an ingenious pamphlet—"Reflections on Polygamy, and the encouragement given to that Practice in the Scriptures of the Old Testament." In 1739, he was engaged in composing "An historical Account of the Life and Reign of David;" the first volume of which was published in 1740, and the second and third in 1742. In that work he refuted the observations of Bayle; vindicated, in some measure, the character of David, and demonstrated that, whilst to his crimes all men were alive, to his virtues they were not sufficiently attentive. In 1763, he presented the world with the third volume of "Revelation examined with candor;" and which certainly equalled the former volumes. The publication of several volumes of valuable discourses closed the literary labors of this eminent man; and in May, 1768, he expired at Bath, aged eighty-three. To the last moments of his life, his faculties were sound, his energies comparatively unimpaired, and his usefulness considerable:—he served mankind in his day and generation;—he was charitable, generous, devout, and amiable. His sentiments on many doctrines of Christianity were certainly peculiar; but then his mind was original, well informed, and capacious. He unquestionably must rank among the number of those for whom posterity should be grateful that he ever lived.—See Life and Works of Delany.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

DELLAH; a woman who dwelt in the valley of Sorek, belonging to Dan, near the land of the Philistines. Samson abandoned himself to her, and, as some think, married her, Judg. 16: 4. The princes of the Philistines by bribes prevailed on her to betray Samson: he eluded her first demands; but at length she succeeded, and reduced his strength to weakness, by cutting off his hair. (See SAMSON.)—Calmet.

DELÓS; one of the Cyclades, a number of islands in the Ægean sea. It was much celebrated, and held in the highest veneration, for its famous temple and oracle of Apollo, 1 Mac. 15: 23.—Calmet.

DELUGE; the flood which overflowed and destroyed the earth. This dook makes one of the most considerable epochs in chronology. Its history is given by Moses, Genesis, ch. 6, and 7. Its time is fixed by the best chronologists to the year from the creation 1656, answering to the year before Christ 2293. From this flood, the state of the world is divided into diluvian and antediluvian.

Men who have not paid that regard to sacred history it deserves, have cavilled at the account given of a universal deluge. Their objections principally turn upon three points:—1. The want of any direct history of that event by the profane writers of antiquity.—2. The apparent impossibility of accounting for the quantity of water necessary to overflow the whole earth to such a depth as it is said to have been.—And, 3. There appearing no necessity for a universal deluge, as the same end might have been accomplished by a partial one.

To the above arguments we oppose the plain declarations of Scripture. God declared to Noah that he was resolved to destroy every thing that had breath under heaven, or had life on the earth, by a flood of waters: such was the threatening, such was the execution. The waters, Moses assures us, covered the whole earth, buried all the mountains; every thing perished therein that had life, excepting Noah and those with him in the ark. Can a universal deluge be more clearly expressed? If the deluge had only been partial, there had been no necessity to spend a hundred years in the building of an ark, and shutting up all sorts of animals therein, in order to restock the world: they had been easily and readily brought from those parts of the world not overflowed, into those that were; at least, all the birds never would have been destroyed, as Moses says they were, so long as they had wings to bear them to those parts where the flood did not reach. If the waters had only overflowed the neighborhood of the Euphrates and the Tigris, they could not be fifteen cubits above the highest mountains; there was no rising that height, but they must spread themselves, by the laws of gravity, over the rest of the earth; unless, perhaps, they had been retained there by a miracle; in that case, Moses, no doubt, would have related the miracle, as he did that of the waters of the Red sea, &c. It may also be observed, that in the regions far remote from the Euphrates and Tigris, viz. Italy, France, Switzerland, Germany, England, the United States, &c. there are frequently found in places many scores of leagues from the sea, and even in the tops of high mountains, whole trees sunk deep under ground, as also teeth and bones of animals, fishes entire, sea shells, ears of corn, &c. petrified; which the best naturalists are agreed could never have come there but by the deluge. That the Greeks and western nations had some knowledge of the flood, has never been denied; and the Africans, Chinese, and Americans have traditions of the deluge. The ingenious Mr. Bryant, in his Mythology, has pretty clearly proved that the deluge, so far from being unknown to the heathen world at large, is in reality conspicuous throughout every one of their acts of religious worship. In India, also, Sir William Jones has discovered, that in the oldest mythological books of that country, there is such an account of the deluge as corresponds sufficiently with that of Moses. (See ARK OF NOAH.)

Various have been the conjectures of learned men as to the natural causes of the deluge. Some have supposed that a quantity of water was created on purpose, and at a proper time annihilated by Divine power. Dr. Burnet supposes the primitive earth to have been no more than a crust investing the water contained in the ocean; and in the central abyss which he and others suppose to exist in the bowels of the earth at the time of the flood, this outward crust broke in a thousand pieces, and sunk down among the water, which thus spouted up in vast cataracts and overflowed the whole surface. Others, supposing a sufficient fund of water in the sea or abyss, think that the shifting of the earth's centre of gravity drew after it the water out of the channel, and overwhelmed the several parts of the earth successively. Others ascribe it to the shock of a comet; and Mr. King supposes it to arise from subterraneous fires bursting forth with great violence under the sea. But are not most, if not all these hypotheses quite arbitrary, and without foundation, from the words of Moses? It is, perhaps, in vain to attempt accounting for this event by natural causes, it being altogether miraculous and supernatural, as a punishment to men for the corruption then in the world. Let us be satisfied with the sources which Moses gives us, namely, the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven opened; that is, the waters rushed out from the hidden abyss of the bowels of the earth, and the clouds poured down their rain incessantly. Let it suffice us to know, that all the elements are under God's power; that he can do with them as he pleases, and frequently in ways we are ignorant of, in order to accomplish his own purposes.

The objections once made to the fact of a general deluge have, indeed, been greatly weakened by the progress of philosophical knowledge; and may be regarded as nearly given up, like the former notion of the high antiquity of the race of men, founded on the Chinese and Egyptian chronologies and pretended histories. Philosophy has even at last found out that there is sufficient water in the ocean, if called forth, to overflow the highest mountains to the height given by Moses,—a conclusion which it once stoutly denied. Keill formerly computed that twenty-eight oceans would be necessary for that purpose; but we are now informed "that a farther progress in mathematical and physical knowledge has shown the different seas and oceans to contain, at least, forty-eight times more water than they were then supposed to do; and that the mere raising of the temperature of the whole body of the ocean to a degree no greater than marine animals live in, in the shallow seas between the tropics, would so expand it as more than to produce the height above the mountains stated in the Mosaic account." As to the deluge of Noah, therefore, infidelity has almost entirely lost the aid of philosophy in framing objections to the Scriptures.

The principal writers on this subject have been Woodward, Cockburn, Bryant, Burnet, Whiston, Stillingfleet, King, Calcott, Tytler, and Gisborne in his Natural Theology. (See also Silliman's Journal of Science.)—Hend. Buck; Watson.

DELUSIONS; errors and influences of Satan, calculated to deceive men. God chooses men's delusions, and sends them strong delusions, when in his righteous judgment and infinite wisdom, he permits Satan, their own lusts, and false teachers effectually to seduce them; and gives them up to the very errors and abominations which they relish. Isa. 66: 4. 2 Thess. 2: 11.—Brown.

DEMÁS; a Thessalonian mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. 4: 10.) who was at first a most zealous disciple of the apostle, and very serviceable to him at Rome during his imprisonment, but afterwards (about A. D. 65,) forsook his to follow a more secular life.—Calmet.

DEMETRIUS, a goldsmith of Ephesus, who made niches, or little chapels, or portable models of the famous temple, for Diana of Ephesus, which he sold to foreigners, Acts 19: 24.—Calmet.

DEMETRIUS, mentioned by John as an eminent Christian, (3 John 12.) is by some believed to be the Demetrius of the former article, who had renounced heathenism to embrace Christianity. But this wants proof.—Calmet.

DEMONS; (Greek, daimōn and daimonion) a name given in the New Testament to fallen angels, or, morally evil and impure spirits, and in some instances, (such as Acts 17: 18. 1 Cor. 10: 20, 21. 1 Tim. 4: 1. Rev. 9: 20, to heathen gods, human spirits whom the heathen deified and worshipped, and the canonized saints of corrupt churches. According to the heathen philosophers, demons held a middle rank between the celestial gods and men upon earth, and carried on all intercourse between them; conveying the addresses of men to the gods, and the divine benefits to men. They also believed that some of them were employed in executing the vengeance of the gods on the impious. Agreeably to this view, they divided their demons into two kinds: agathodaimōn, eu-daimōn, a good demon, or tutelary genius, whom they assigned to every one at his birth, to watch over his character, fortunes, &c; and kakodaimōn, a malignant demon, who thwarts, vexes, and injures any one.—Hend. Buck.

DEMONIAC; one possessed or affected by a demon or demons. The subject of demoniacal possession, since the time of Jos. Mede, has given rise to much discussion. One class of writers have supposed that the demoniacs were merely madmen; others, that the bodies of human beings were actually possessed, controlled, governed, and inhabited by wicked and impure spirits. Among the supporters of the former opinion are Heinsius, Mede, Sykes, Mead, Farmer, Lardner, and, almost without exception, modern Socinian and Rationalist writers. On the other side of the question may be placed the uniform interpretation of the passages in the New Testament in which the subject is spoken of, in their literal sense by the ancient church, the best commentators, and those generally bearing the name of orthodox in every age and among all sects coming under this denomination.

The following is a brief summary of the respective arguments on both sides, beginning with those which have been advanced against actual possession. 1. The word demon properly signifies the soul of a dead person, which, it cannot be supposed, is referred to where speeches and actions are imputed to the imaginary demoniac. In reply to this, it has been deemed sufficient to maintain that the word does not uniformly denote the spirits of the departed.—2. Among the heathens, lunacy and epilepsy were ascribed to the operation of certain demons, who were therefore called larvati and ceriti. To this it has been answered, that it is not impossible but that the heathens were right; but that, at all events, their opinion, whether right or wrong, is no proof that the Jews were in error; for the demoniacs of Scripture are represented as differing from insane and epileptic persons. Compare Matt. 4: 24, where the daimonizomenous are opposed to the scētizomenous, the paralitikous, and the poikanis nosois, kai basanois sunechomenous. And in chap. 10: 1. the power to cast out demons is expressly distinguished from the power of healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease. See also Luke 4: 33—36: compare especially ver. 41. with ver. 40, where the contrast is most striking.—3. It is argued that the Jews had the same idea of these diseases, and the instance of Saul's madness, and Matt. 17: 14, 15. John 7: 20. 8: 48, 52. 10: 20, are adduced to prove the assertion. These passages certainly prove that lunatics, epileptics, and demoniacs are sometimes synonymous terms; but this admission will only go to show that they were occasionally identified; while the argument deduced from the contrast between lunatics and demoniacs in the passages quoted above, will not be destroyed.—4. Christ is said to have adopted the common language of the people, which it was not necessary to change. He was not sent to correct the mistakes which existed in the popular philosophy of the day in which he lived. This argument takes for granted the very point to be proved. But is such an accommodation as it supposes, for a moment to be reconciled with the character of such a teacher as Jesus? If the demons were simply natural diseases, was it not of the highest importance for him to have undeceived his contemporaries on these points, and to have corrected the false and pernicious philosophy of the age? Were we to follow out this principle of accommodation, we might explain away most of our Lord's doctrines, and regard them as mere Jewish notions, which indeed has been done by the Socinians and by the Rationalists of Germany.—5. No reason can be given why there should be demoniacal possessions in our Lord's time, and not at present, when we have no grounds to suppose that any instances of this nature any where occur. In reply to this objection, it may be observed, that these possessions were then permitted in order to give to the devil's hostility to man an ocular demonstration; to place in a clear light the power and benevolence of the Lord Jesus in defeating the baneful purposes of this ancient enemy of the human race, and to confute the error so prevalent among the Sadducees, who affirmed that there was neither angel nor spirit.

In addition to the arguments just produced in refutation of the anti-demonianists, the following positions may be laid down in support of real possession:—

1. The doctrine of demoniacal possessions is consistent with the whole tenor of Scripture. Evil is there represented as having been introduced by a being of this description, who in some wonderful manner influenced the immaterial principle in man. The continuance of evil in the world is frequently imputed to the continued agency of the same being. His delight is in every possible way to harass and injure mankind, both as to mind and outward estate. (See Job passim.)

2. The doctrine is consistent with the dictates of reason. If one man may cause evil to another, a thing which is done in thousands of instances every day, is it not possible that evils of a different kind might be produced by means of other beings, while the moral government of God remained unimpeached?

3. The supposition that the demoniacs spoken of in Scripture were lunatics, is fraught with numerous and insuperable difficulties. The facts recorded of them demonstrate that they were not merely such. Insane persons either reason rightly on wrong grounds, or wrongly on right grounds, or blend right and wrong together. But these demoniacs reasoned rightly on right grounds. They uttered propositions undeniably true, and such as were always perfectly adapted to the occasions. They excelled, in the accuracy of their knowledge, the disciples themselves; at least we never find any of these applying to our Lord the epithet of "the Holy One of God." They were alike consistent in their knowledge and their language. Their bodies were agitated and convulsed. The powers of their minds were controlled in such manner, that their actions were unreasonable: yet they addressed our Lord in a consistent and rational, though in an appalling and mysterious, manner. Our Lord answered them, not by appealing to the individuals whose actions had been so irrational, but to something distinct from them, which he requires and commands to leave them: that is, to evil spirits, whose mode of continuing evil in such instances had been so fearfully displayed. These evil spirits answer him by an intimate knowledge of his person and character, which was hidden from the wise and prudent of the nation. Before him, as their future judge, they believed and trembled, saying, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?"

It is an admirable observation of Jortin on the point, that where any circumstances are added concerning the demoniacs, they are generally such as show that there was something preternatural in the case; for these afflicted persons unanimously joined in doing homage to Christ and his apostles: they all knew him, and unite in confessing his divinity. If, on the contrary, they had been lunatics, some would have worshipped, and some would have reviled him, according to the various ways in which the disease had affected their minds.

4. The other facts recorded of the demoniacs are such as renders it impossible, on any fair principles of interpretation, to conclude that they were merely insane. The principal of these is that most extraordinary event of the possession of the herd of swine, by the same demons which had formerly shown their malignity in the human form. This extraordinary event cannot be accounted for except upon the commonly received literal interpretation of the evangelic narrative in which it is recorded. Nothing can be more absurd and trifling than the attempts that have been made to explain it on other grounds.

Whatever difficulties may seem to attach to the common, simple, and ancient interpretation of the different cases of possession, it must be regarded as most probably correct, for this very satisfactory reason, that the difficulties of the new interpretation are always greater. On one side we have the wonderful doctrine, that it pleased the Almighty to permit invisible and evil beings to possess themselves, in some incomprehensible manner, of the bodies and souls of men. On the other, we have Christ the revealer of truth, establishing falsehood, sanctioning error, or encouraging deception. We have the evangelists inconsistent with themselves, and a narrative, which is acknowledged to be inspired, and to be intended for the unlearned—unintelligible and false. Between such difficulties, I prefer the former; and if I cannot comprehend how such things could be, I submit to the infinite wisdom and power of the Supreme, and surrender my reason to the guidance of divine revelation. The difference between Christianity and philosophy, or the mode of speculating which assumes that title, may be said to consist in this: In matters of philosophy, the vulgar may be in error, and the speculatists may be right; but in Christianity, the popular opinion is generally right. The philosopher who would fashion the statements of Scripture according to his own notions of truth and falsehood, is sure to conclude with error.—See also the admirable treatise of Canonius on the Existence and Agency of Evil Spirits.—Hend. Buck.

DENARIUS; a Roman coin, worth four sesterces, generally valued at twelve and a half cents of our currency. In the New Testament, it is taken for a piece of money, in general; or a shekel, which was the common coin among the Hebrews, before they were subjected to the Romans, Matt. 22: 19. Mark 12: 15. Luke 20: 24.—Calmet.

DENISA; a Christian female of Lampsacus in Asia Minor, who suffered martyrdom in the third century. Nicomachus, a professed Christian, having been put on the rack, after suffering extremely, renounced his profession, and almost immediately expired in great agony. Denisa, who was then about sixteen years of age, was present, and on witnessing this affecting spectacle, exclaimed, "O unhappy wretch! why would you buy a moment's ease, at the expense of a miserable eternity?" Optimus, the pagan proconsul, hearing this, inquired if she was a Christian. She replied in the affirmative, and though commanded to sacrifice to idols, absolutely refused. She was given up as a punishment by the proconsul, to two libertines, who, through a kind providence, being unable to effect their diabolical purposes, and imploring her forgiveness, Optimus ordered her to be beheaded.—Fox.

DENOMINATIONS, (THE THREE;) the designation given to an association of dissenting ministers residing in and about London, belonging to the Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist denominations, and usually described as "The General Body of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of London and Westminster."

This body was organized in 1727. At that period, the members of the body were so far united in religious sentiment, that they could join together in acts of Christian worship; but the existence and spread of Socinianism in the Presbyterian and General Baptist boards has, for a long time, compelled them to confine their proceedings to matters connected with the political rights and circumstances of Dissenters, and other topics of national interest, in reference to which they wish to express their opinion.

The general body probably includes one hundred and fifty members, about one half of which are of the Independent or Congregational board. The Socinians form a very small minority of the whole body. (See DEPUTIES.)—Hend. Buck.

DENY. God cannot deny himself; he cannot possibly act or speak unlike his own nature, or unlike the gracious character he has assumed, the promises he has made, or the threatenings he has denounced, 2 Tim. 2: 13. Men deny God, or Christ, or his name, when in their profession or practice, they disown his being the true God, Savior, portion, ruler, and last end of their souls. Job 31: 28. Acts 3: 13, 14. They deny the faith when they embrace error, indulge themselves in a slothful and wicked practice, and so manifest their unbelief of, and opposition to, the truths of Scripture. Rev. 2: 13. 1 Tim. 5: 8. Men deny themselves when they refuse to depend on their own righteousness as the ground of their happiness; or to be led by their own wisdom, or ruled by their own will and affections; or to attempt performance of good works in their own strength; but receive Jesus Christ as the free gift of God for their all and in all, and undervalue their own ease, profit, or pleasure, for the sake of Christ. Matt. 16: 24. (See SELF-DENIAL.)—Brown.

DEPART. God departs from men when he ceases to bestow his favors, hides the smiles of his countenance, and pours out his wrath on them, (Hos. 9: 12,) or when he ceases to afflict. Job 7: 19. Men depart from God when they follow sinful lust instead of holiness, and seek created enjoyment for their portion, instead of his fulness, (Jer. 32: 40,) and especially when they break their vows to him, and cease from serving him, as ever they did. Hos. 1: 2. Men depart from evil, or from hell, when they cease the love and practice of sin, and so from walking in the way to hell. Prov. 15: 24, and 16: 6.—Brown.

DEPRAVITY; corruption, a change from perfection to imperfection. (See FALL; SIN.)—Hend. Buck.

DEPRIVITY, (HUMAN.) This is a painful, but interesting and momentous subject. Perhaps there is no one truth in the Scriptures more strictly fundamental. The whole scheme of Christianity presupposes and recognises its existence, and all its provisions of grace and truth are adapted to its relief. It may be considered therefore as the basis of the evangelical system; inasmuch that the practical conviction of its truth is the first step towards the reception of the mercy of the gospel. The Son of man came to save that which was lost. "I never knew a person," says Andrew Fuller, "verge towards the Arminian, the Arian, the Socinian, or the Antinomian schemes, without first entertaining diminutive notions of human depravity or blameworthiness."

Human depravity essentially consists in a state of mind, the opposite of that which is required by the divine law. The sum of the divine law being love, the essence of depravity consists in the want of love to God and our neighbor; or, in other words, the preference of some other object or objects, to the exclusion of those required in the divine law. Where this preference prevails, the creature usurps the place of the Creator, and all the moral powers of the soul are disorganized, perverted, and corrupted. Yet this, however awful, is the natural condition of the whole human race. For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. Rom. 3: 23. By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Rom. 5: 12. THE SCRIPTURE HATH CONCLUDED ALL UNDER SIN; THAT THE PROMISE BY FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST MIGHT BE GIVEN TO THEM THAT BELIEVE. Gal. 3: 10, 22. So decisive indeed, is the language of divine revelation on this point, that St. John does not hesitate to affirm, If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us. 1 John 1: 10.

That the depravity of man is universal, may be further confirmed and brought home to every man's conscience, by the following considerations. In all nations it has been recognised by their forms of religion, coerced as far as possible by laws, recorded by biography and history, investigated by philosophy, acted in the drama, depicted by poets, and acknowledged and reproved by moralists. Few dare deny that they are partakers of it, and those few are evidently blinded by its power, since the best of men have always been the most ready to confess it. No man, Christ excepted, was ever yet produced as an example of moral perfection. Every man who examines himself by his own acknowledged rule of duty, finds he is continually coming short of it, and yet who can understand his errors? No man is willing to disclose every action of his life to his dearest friend. No one in solemn prayer to God, dare profess his freedom from sin, or could be informed that God would judge him according to his deserts without alarm. Every one feels that, by nature, sin is more easy to him than duty, that virtue requires effort, while vice steals on him unawares; whereas a disposition perfectly conformed to the law of God, would render sin abominable and duty a delight. In fine, that human depravity is universal, is clear from the universal prevalence of death—the universal necessity of regeneration—the impossibility of justification by the works of the law—the death of Christ for all—and the universal requisition of repentance and faith in the Redeemer.

Although the depravity of man be in the strictest sense moral depravity, or the sinfulness of creatures who are intelligent, free, and voluntary, who sin against conscience, and are therefore justly accountable, it is yet frequently denominated natural, because it is found to be the universal characteristic of men by nature, that is to say, the state in which they are born. Ephes. 2: 1—3. John 3: 6. Rom. 8: 5—9. For the same reason it is sometimes called constitutional; not that it forms any essential part of the original constitution of the species as it came from the hands of the Creator, but because in consequence of the sin of the first man, a predisposition to evil seems to inhere in all his descendants, and to develop itself in a series of voluntary transgressions, either internal or external, from the commencement of their moral agency. Hence also it has been called hereditary, native, innate, inbred depravity, or original sin. Rom. 5: 12—19. (See SIN, and FALL OF MAN.)

In regard to the degree of human depravity; though its forms and stages in social life are various, yet that essential element of all depravity which is common to the species, divines of the evangelical class have united in representing as total—meaning by that term, that unrenewed men, universally, are entirely destitute of the genuine principle of holy obedience—that is, of the love of God and man required in the divine law. This was manifestly the doctrine generally embraced at the Reformation, and which has been maintained by the advocates of sovereign grace in every age. It has been objected to this language, however, that the phrase, total depravity, conveys the idea of all men being as bad as they can be. As this is a sentiment which no one maintains, it were well perhaps if some happier terms could be found to express the great truth intended by total depravity. "ALL I MEAN BY THE TERMS," says Andrew Fuller, "IS THIS;—THAT THE HUMAN HEART IS BY NATURE TOTALLY DESTITUTE OF THE LOVE OF GOD, OR LOVE TO MAN AS THE CREATURE OF GOD, AND CONSEQUENTLY IS DESTITUTE OF ALL TRUE VIRTUE. A creature may be totally destitute of good, and therefore totally depraved, (such, it will be allowed, is Satan,) and yet be capable of adding iniquity to iniquity without end."

To elucidate this point, and remove the possibility of mistake, Dr. Dwight remarks, 1. That the human character is not depraved to the full extent of its powers. 2. That there are certain characteristics of human nature which, considered by themselves, are innocent. 3. That some of the natural human characteristics are amiable; as natural affection, the simplicity and sweetness of childhood, the modesty of youth, compassion, generosity, social integrity; to which may be added, friendship, patriotism, and the sense of honor. 4. That these and all other qualities of the mind are, however, MEANS EITHER OF VIRTUE, OR SIN, ACCORDING TO THE NATURE OF THAT CONTROLLING DISPOSITION OR ENERGY WHICH CONSTITUTES THE MORAL CHARACTER. 5. That there is not in the mind by nature, or in an unregenerated state, any real moral excellence, or evangelical virtue.—Lastly, That the heart of man, after all the abatements are made, which can be made, is set to do evil in a most affecting and dreadful manner: as is evident from the Scriptures, from every man's examination of the state of his own heart and life, and from the whole course of human conduct, both private and public, especially in the family, in the place of business, in the haunts of amusement, in insurrections, oppressions, wars, and religious impostures in every age of the world.

Unhappily nothing is more common than misrepresentations of the doctrine of total depravity by those who undertake to oppose it. Almost every objection advanced by them, may be resolved into a misconception of terms, a wrong standard of judgment, or the prejudices naturally arising from supposed difficulties, self-ignorance, mistaken tenderness, pride of character, or fear of consequences. From these causes, men refuse to give proper attention to the decisive evidence of its truth, supplied by every page of Scripture, and every legitimate induction of facts. Few, indeed, are aware of the amount of evidence which God has given in his word, for the conviction of men that such is their ruined state by nature. 1. All those passages of Scripture which expressly teach it, as true not of one age only, but of all. Gen. 6: 5, 12. 8: 21. Psalm 14: 2, 3. Eccles. 9: 3. Jer. 17: 9. Rom. 3: 9—19. Ephes. 2: 3. 2. All those passages which declare the utter impossibility of carnal men doing any thing to please God. Heb. 11: 6. Rom. 8: 5—9. 3. All those which speak of goodness and virtue as comprehended in love, that is, the love of God and our neighbor. Matt. 22: 37. Rom. 13: 8—10. John 5: 42. 1 John 4: 10. 4. All those which teach the necessity of regeneration in order to love God and our neighbor, as well as to eternal life. 1 John 2: 29. 3: 11. 2 Cor. 5: 17. 1 John 4: 7. 2: 9. John 3: 3—8. 1: 13. Rom. 5: 5. Gal. 5: 22. 5. All those passages which promise the blessings of salvation to repentance, faith in Christ, love to God, or a course of well-doing; that is, to the existence of holiness or true virtue, and not to a certain degree of it. 2 Cor. 2: 10. Heb. 5: 9. Acts 16: 31. Rom. 8: 28. James 2: 5. John 5: 29. Rom. 2: 7. 6. All those which teach that men must love God supremely, or be his enemies; that all are either with Christ, or against him. Matt. 6: 24. 10: 37. 1 John 2: 15. James 4: 4. Rom. 5: 10. Lastly, All those which represent mankind without the gospel, and the cordial reception of it, as in a perishing condition. John 3: 16. Rom. 10: 1—16. 2 Thess. 1: 8. 2 Cor. 2: 15.

Hence it appears, 1. That the fundamental principle of both moral and political science, so far as it relates to man, is his depravity. 2. That the peculiar provisions of the gospel, in the gracious offices of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, are indispensable to the recovery of mankind to happiness and virtue. 3. That the doctrine of gratuitous personal election may be clearly demonstrated, and proved to be not only true, but reasonable and glorious. 4. That the popular distinction between true religion and true morality, is false and deceptive. And lastly, That men are either required to be spiritually holy, or are allowed to live in sin, since there can be no medium.

On the proper manner of treating this important subject, Dr. Chalmers remarks: "While we assert with zeal every doctrine of Christianity, let us not forget that there is a zeal without discrimination; and that, to bring such a spirit to the defence of our faith, or of any one of its peculiarities, is not to vindicate the cause, but to discredit it. Now, there is a way of maintaining the utter depravity of our nature, and of doing it in such a style of sweeping and of vehement asseveration, as to render it not merely obnoxious to the taste, but obnoxious to the understanding. On this subject, there is often a roundness, and a temerity of announcement, which any intelligent man, looking at the phenomena of human character with his own eyes, cannot go along with; and thus it is, that there are injudicious defenders of orthodoxy, who have mustered against it not merely a positive dislike, but a positive strength of observation and argument. Let the nature of man be a ruin, as it certainly is, it is obvious to the most common discernment, that it does not offer one unvaried and unalleviated mass of deformity. There are certain phases, and certain exhibitions of this nature, which are more lovely than others—certain traits of character, not due to the operation of Christianity at all, and yet calling forth our admiration and our tenderness—certain varieties of moral complexion, far more fair and more engaging than certain other varieties; and to prove that the gospel may have had no share in the formation of them, they, in fact, stood out to the notice and respect of the world, before the gospel was ever heard of. The classic page of antiquity sparkles with repeated exemplifications of what is bright and beautiful in the character of man; nor do all its descriptions of external nature waken up such an enthusiasm of pleasure, as when it bears testimony to some graceful or elevated doing out of the history of the species. And whether it be the kindness of maternal affection, or the unweariedness of filial piety, or the constancy of tried and unalterable friendship, or the earnestness of devoted patriotism, or the rigor of unbending fidelity, or any other of the recorded virtues which shed a glory over the remembrance of Greece and of Rome—we fully concede it to the admiring scholar, that they one and all of them, were sometimes exemplified in those days of heathenism; and that, out of the materials of a period, crowded as it was with moral abominations, there may also be gathered things which are pure, and lovely, and true, and just, and honest, and of good report.

What do we mean, then, it may be asked, by the universal depravity of man? How shall we reconcile the admission now made, with the unqualified and authoritative language of the Bible, when it tells us of the totality and the magnitude of human corruption? Wherein lies that desperate wickedness, which is every where ascribed to all the men of all the families that be on the face of the earth? And how can such a tribute of acknowledgment be awarded to the sages and patriots of antiquity, who yet, as the partakers of our fallen nature, must be outcasts from the favor of God, and have the character of evil stamped upon the imaginations of the thoughts of their hearts continually?

In reply to these questions, let us speak to your own experimental recollections on a subject, in which you are aided, both by the consciousness of what passes within you, and by your observation of the characters of others. Might not a sense of honor elevate that heart which is totally unfurnished with a sense of God? Might not an impulse of compassionate feeling be sent into that bosom, which is never once visited by a movement of duteous loyalty towards the Lawgiver in heaven? Might not occasions of intercourse with the beings around us, develop whatever there is in our nature of generosity, and friendship, and integrity, and patriotism; and yet the unseen Being, who placed us in this theatre, be neither loved, nor obeyed, nor listened to? Amid the manifold varieties of human character, and the number of constitutional principles which enter into its composition, might there not be an individual in whom the constitutional virtues so blaze forth and have the ascendancy, as to give a general effect of gracefulness to the whole of this moral exhibition; and yet, may not that individual be as unimpartial of his God, as if the principles of his constitution had been mixed up in such a different proportion, as to make him an odious and a revolting spectacle? In a word, might not sensibility shed forth its tears, friendship perform its services, and liberality impart of its treasure, and patriotism earn the gratitude of its country, and honor maintain itself entire and untainted, and all the softenings of what is amiable, and all the glories of what is chivalrous and manly, gather into one bright effulgence of moral accomplishment on the person of him who never, for a single day of his life, subordinates one habit, or one affection to the will of the Almighty; who is just as careless and as unconcerned about God, as if the native tendencies of his constitution had compounded him into a monster of deformity; and who just as effectually realizes this attribute of rebellion against his Maker, as the most loathsome and profligate of his species, that he walks in the counsel of his own heart, and after the sight of his own eyes?"—Chalmers' Works, p. 121—285; *Controversy of Drs. DEPRAVITY, (TOTAL.) (See DEPRAVITY, HUMAN.)

DEPRECATORY; a term applied to the manner of performing some ceremonies in the form of prayer. The form of absolution in the Greek church is deprecative, thus expressed—"May God absolve you;" whereas in the Latin church it is declarative—"I absolve you."—Hend. Buck.

DEPUTIES, (DISSENTING;) a committee of gentlemen annually chosen by the several congregations of Protestant Dissenters of London and its vicinity, for the purpose of protecting their civil rights. It originated at a general meeting held on the 9th of November, 1732. Every congregation of Protestant Dissenters, Presbyterian, Independents, and Baptists, in and within twelve miles of London, appoints two deputies. Since 1737, the election has regularly taken place, and the committee have unremittingly watched over bills brought into parliament in any way affecting Dissenters,—kept alive an interest in behalf of the repeal of the test and corporation acts, supported every measure which promised to be beneficial in extending and consolidating religious liberty,—and successfully exerted themselves in protecting individual ministers and congregations against those molestations to which they have been exposed on the part of bigoted and persecuting churchmen. (See DENOMINATIONS, THE THREE.)—Hend. Buck.

DERBE; a city of Lycaonia, to which Paul and Barnabas fled when expelled from Iconium, Acts 14: 6. A. D. 41.—Calmet.

DERHAM, (WILLIAM, D. D.,) distinguished alike as a philosopher, Christian, and divine, was born November 26th, 1657, at Stoughton, near Worcester. His parents were respectable, virtuous, and intelligent; and from them he received lessons of wisdom, piety, and prudence. At the age of eighteen, Derham was admitted into Trinity college, Cambridge, and soon distinguished himself by the qualifications of his mind and his heart. Derham was early distinguished for his love of nature. As a natural philosopher he was celebrated. Fond of retirement and meditation, he accepted, in 1689, the rectory of Upminster, in Essex, that he might yet more diligently study the principles, and laws, and secrets of nature; and develop to his own mind, and to the minds of others, the truth of the holy Scriptures and of the Christian religion. As a natural philosopher, his fame rapidly spread; and his constant contributions to "The Philosophical Transactions" materially promoted its extension. His Letters and Essays on the Barometer, on Meteorology, on the Death Watch, on the Pendulum, on Sound, on the Migration of Birds, on Eclipses, on the Aurora Borealis, on Wasps, and various other topics, demonstrate the vastness of his mind, and the variety of his knowledge; and the constant vein of seriousness and piety, which distinguishes all his performances, proves his Christianity to have been more than doctrinal and speculative—to have been that of the heart. But his publications were not merely scientific, or indirectly serious—they were various. In 1712, he preached sixteen sermons, at Boyle's lectures, on the being and attributes of God, which, under the title of "Physico-Theology, &c.," he afterwards published. In that work, the profound and the simple are wisely blended; and whilst the facts which it contains interest, and the knowledge it communicates inform, the piety of its conclusions and reflections drawn from such facts, improves the heart. In 1714, he published a similar work, entitled "Astro-Theology; or, a Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, from a Survey of the Heavens." This was also ingenious and learned; and, according to his uniform principles, he made all such ingenuity and knowledge subservient to the cause of religion and virtue. In 1726, he revised the "Miscellanea Curiosa," and in 1730, he favored the world by the publication of his last work, entitled "Christo-Theology; or, a Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion." This publication also deserves great praise. To the cause of truth, science, and the advancement of the glory of God, Dr. Derham devoted a protracted and useful life. He continued long to illumine the horizon of this world by his piety, knowledge, and goodness; and when, at length, at Uppminster, on April the 5th, 1735, he expired, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, his glory was not extinguished, but only removed to that heaven, where it should continue to shine with increased splendor, and with perfect beauty.—See Memoirs of Derham.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

DERVISH; derived from two Turkish words, der, "a door," and ish, "extended," because the wandering poor often laid themselves down before the doors of the wealthy—is applied to him who voluntarily embraces poverty, and adheres to it as a religious profession. Like fakir, in the Arabic, it signifies originally one who has neither fire nor fixed place of abode. The first founders of the order had considerable difficulty in effecting the innovation into Mahometanism; they were restrained by the popular prohibition,—no monkey in Islamism! Hence they took care to leave out vows of chastity, and of living in community; nor did they exact a too severe obligation to fast and pray. Like all enthusiasts, they doubtless wished to discover some way of worshipping that should more efficaciously obtain the favor of heaven. But in false religion there are always as many knaves as enthusiasts: perhaps, indeed, the two characters are often combined in the same person than we suspect. Hence the first dervishes aimed at astonishing the multitude as much as propitiating the divine favor, by their violent exercises in dancing—by their austerities and macerations. In the latter respect, they have left Christian monks far behind. Yet, with all their foolery,—and, we may safely add, their roguery,—the doctrines which they taught were remarkable for their morality, and, above all, for inculcating a constant intercourse with God.

The Turkish dervishes pretend that their origin may be traced to Ali, and even to Abubekr—the first of the four immediate successors of Mahomet. But Ali, the fourth of those caliphs, was no dervish. He instituted no order: he was merely the first Mussulman who renounced riches, which he distributed to the poor. His example was imitated by others after him; so that, insensibly, a class of persons arose, who, like the Sisters of Mercy, devoted themselves to the service of the indigent and the helpless, and reduced themselves to voluntary poverty. But things soon changed. The legacies left by the faithful for the use of the poor were intrusted to the distribution of these zealous men, and thus the order became insensibly possessed of great riches. Besides, men so pious must necessarily have interest in heaven: hence their prayers must be purchased—a fruitful source of income. But human avarice is insatiable; and our dervishes, like their brethren of a purer faith, hit on another expedient: they manufactured and sold amulets, as the latter did relics, to which their knavery assigned miraculous virtues. Thus they acquired great consideration, and their order daily augmented by votaries, not from the lowest only, but from the highest ranks in society.

When one order was established, nothing could be easier than to establish others; for knavery is always fertile in invention. Of these, no fewer than thirty-two successively appeared, each endeavoring to outdo the other in address of discipline and extravagance of manner. Of course, all this was intended to have its effect on spectators; and that effect it assuredly produced. No man will act the mountebank for nothing: superstition has its jack-puddings as well as Bartholomew fair; and the object of both is in many cases the same. The dervishes grew rich and respected. They can say what they like with perfect impunity, even to the highest. They follow the army to the field, and, with the koran in hand, animate the warriors of the faith (so are Mussulmen soldiers called) against all infidels and misbelievers.

The dervishes who live in community, and who constitute by far the greater number, have their superior or sheikh, and are subject to a novitiate and religious practices, independent of the prayers which every Mussulman is bound to repeat. As celibacy is not strictly enjoined, though the observance of it is encouraged, many are married. These do not, however, live in community: they have all their separate establishments; but all are expected to pass the night preceding any public exhibition, in the religious retirement to which they belong. Besides these, there are the travelling dervishes, who are continually rambling from one part of the Mahometan world to the other,—some to preach, some on pilgrimage, many to beg and plunder.

Of the numerous order of dervishes formerly subsisting in Turkey, three only are deserving notice—the Mevlevy, the Bedevy, and the Rufaf; and even of these the Mevlevy are the only ones who are held in any degree of repute, at least among the higher classes.—Hend. Buck.

DESATIR; a lately-discovered collection of sixteen sacred books, consisting of the fifteen old Persian prophets, together with a book of Zoroaster. This, at least, is what the book itself pretends to be. The collection is written in a language not spoken at present any where, and equally different from the Zend, the Pehlvi, and the modern Persian.

Erskine, the translator, and De Sacy regard it as spurious. Joseph von Hammer, however, another very eminent orientalist, is said to consider it to be genuine. At all events, it is interesting to learn, from this work, with greater accuracy, an old religious system of the East, in which are to be found, with Pandemonism and the metempsychosis, the elements of the worship of the stars, of astrology, the theurgy, the doctrine of amulets, as well as the elements of the Hindoo religion, particularly the system of castes. Yet no trace of any connexion with the Zendavesta and the magic of the Parsees has been found in the Desatir.—Hend. Buck.

DESCARTES, (RENE, or RENATUS,) a philosopher and original thinker, eminent in various ways, was a native of Touraine, born at La Haye, in 1596; was descended from an ancient family, and was educated at the Jesuits' college at La Flèche. His progress was rapid, particularly in mathematics. From 1616 to 1621, he served, as a volunteer, under the prince of Orange, the duke of Bavaria, and count Buquoy, in Holland, Bavaria, and Hungary. After having travelled widely, he sold his estate, and settled in Holland, in 1629, to pursue his studies undisturbed. For twenty years, he assiduously continued his labors in metaphysics, chemistry, anatomy, astronomy, and geometry, and during that period he produced the works which have immortalized his name.

Descartes founds his belief of the existence of a thinking being on the consciousness of thought: "I think, therefore, I exist." He developed his system with much ingenuity in opposition to the empiric philosophy of the English, and the Aristotelian scholastics. The thinking being or the soul, he says, evidently differs from the body whose existence consists in space or extension, by its simplicity and immateriality, (whence also its immortality) and by the freedom that pertains to it. But every perception of the soul is not clear and distinct; it is in a great degree involved in doubt, and is so far an imperfect finite being. This imperfection of its own leads it to the idea of an absolutely perfect being. (This mode of establishing the existence of God from ontology, is hence called the "Cartesian proof.") Descartes placed at the head of his system the idea of an absolutely perfect being, which he considers as an innate idea, and deduces from it all further knowledge of truth.

At length, some of his metaphysical opinions having excited a persecution against him, he accepted an invitation from Christina of Sweden, to reside at her court. He, however, died at Stockholm, February 11, 1650, shortly after his arrival in that capital. His works, among which are the Principles of Philosophy, Metaphysical Meditations, a Treatise on the Passions, a Treatise on Man, and a Discourse on the Method of seeking Truth in the Sciences, occupy nine volumes in quarto. While he lived, it was chiefly as a metaphysician that

Descartes was celebrated, but his metaphysics, though strongly manifesting his genius, are now almost forgotten; his system of vortices, too, which once had partisans, is completely discarded; and it is to his geometrical and algebraical discoveries, which he himself undervalued, that he is indebted for the most solid part of his fame.—*Davenport; Ency. DESCENT OF CHRIST INTO HELL. (See HELL.)

DESERT. The Hebrews, by midbar, "a desert," mean an uncultivated place, particularly if mountainous. Some deserts were entirely dry and barren; others were beautiful, and had good pastures; Scripture speaks of the beauty of the desert, Psalm 65: 12, 13. Scripture names several deserts in the Holy Land; and there was scarcely a town without one belonging to it, i. e. uncultivated places, for woods and pastures, like our commons; common lands. (See WILDERNESS.)—Calmét.

DESERTS. Men are judged according to their deserts, and have their deserts rendered to them, when they receive the just punishment of their deeds. Psalm 28: 4.—Brown.

DESERTION; a term made use of to denote an unhappy state of mind, occasioned by the sensible influences of the divine favor being withdrawn. Some of the best men in all ages have suffered a temporary suspension of divine enjoyments, Job 29: 2. Ps. 51. Isa. 49: 14. Lam. 3: 1. Isa. 1: 10. The causes of this must not be attributed to the Almighty, since he is always the same, but must arise from ourselves. Neglect of duty, improper views of Providence, self-confidence, a worldly spirit, lukewarmness of mind, inattention to the means of grace, or open transgression, may be considered as leading to this state. The contrary opinion, which has been called the "Sovereignty of Desertions," is liable to many objections, and has been awfully employed to lull the conscience to sleep, and render it content to remain in a state of spiritual darkness, instead of its being excited to self-examination, repentance, and application to the only source of pardon, purification, and peace. As all things, however, are under the divine control, so even desertion, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "the hidings of God's face," may be useful to excite humility, exercise faith and patience, detach us from the world, prompt to more vigorous action, bring us to look more to God as the fountain of happiness, confirm us to his word, and increase our desires for that state of blessedness which is to come.—Hervey's Ther. and Asp., dial. xix.; Watt's Medit. on Job 23: 3; Lambert's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 16; Fleel's Works, vol. i. p. 167, folio; Goodwin's Child of Light, walking in Darkness.—*Hend. DESIRE. In intellectual philosophy, the original spring and fountain of all the affections. It may be directed to a great variety of objects, and is liable to a multitude of modifications. It is often used, in popular language, as equivalent to affection. In theology or morals, desire is either regarded as natural, (Deut. 21: 11,) or inordinate, (Deut. 7: 25. 5: 21;) or malignant, (Micah 7: 3;) or holy, Ps. 73: 25. The desires of the flesh are sinful lusts and inclinations, (Gen. 6: 5.) general, those of the annual nature in distinction from those of the intellectual, Ephes. 2: 3.

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS; a title of the Messiah. Hag. 2: 7. He is altogether lovely, necessary, and valuable; all that spiritually know him, love him and long for his presence and blessing; and in him at last shall the nations of the earth be blessed for the space of a thousand years, (Rev. 20:) as well as in the heavenly world.

DESPAIR; the loss of hope; that distressing state of mind, in which a person loses his confidence in the divine mercy.

Some of the best antidotes against despair, says one, may be taken from the consideration, 1. Of the nature of God, his goodness, mercy, &c. 2. The testimony of God: he hath said, he desireth not the death of the sinner. 3. From the works of God: he hath given his Son to die. 4. From his promises, Heb. 13: 5. 5. From his commands: he hath commanded us to confide in his mercy. 6. From his expostulations, &c.—Baxter on Religious Melancholy; Claude's Essays, p. 338. Robinson's edition; Gisborne's Sermon on Religious Despondency; Buck.

DESTRUCTIONISTS; those who believe that the final punishment threatened in the gospel to the wicked and impenitent, consists not in an eternal preservation in misery and torment, but in a total extinction of being, and that the sentence of annihilation shall be executed with more or less torment, preceding or attending the final period, in proportion to the greater or less guilt of the criminal.

The name assumed by this denomination, like those of many others, takes for granted the question in dispute, viz., that the Scripture word destruction means annihilation: in strict propriety of speech, they should be called Annihilationists. The doctrine is largely maintained in the sermons of Mr. Samuel Bourn, of Birmingham; it was held also by Mr. J. N. Scott, Mr. John Taylor, of Norwich, Mr. Marsom, and many others.

In defence of the system, Mr. Bourn argues as follows: There are many passages of Scripture in which the ultimate punishment to which wicked men shall be adjudged is defined, in the most precise and intelligible terms, to be an everlasting destruction from the power of God, which is equally able to destroy as to preserve. So when our Savior is fortifying the minds of his disciples against the power of men, and the punishment of his justice, he expresseth himself thus:—"Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Here he plainly proposes the destruction of the soul (not its endless pain and misery) as the ultimate object of the divine displeasure, and the greatest object of our fear. And when he says, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal," it appears evident that by that eternal punishment which is set in opposition to eternal life, is not meant any kind of life, however miserable, but the same which the apostle expresses by everlasting destruction from the presence and power of the Lord. The very term, death, is most frequently made use of to signify the end of wicked men in another world, or the final effect of divine justice in their punishment. The wages of sin (saith the apostle) is death; but eternal life is the gift of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord. See also Rom. 8: 6.

To imagine that by the term death is meant an eternal life, though in a condition of extreme misery, seems, according to him, to be confounding all propriety and meaning of words. Death, when applied to the end of wicked men in a future state, he says, properly denotes a total extinction of life and being. It may contribute, he adds, to fix this meaning, if we observe that the state to which temporal death reduces men is usually termed by our Savior and his apostles sleep; because from this death the soul shall be raised to life again: but from the other, which is fully and properly death, and of which the former is but an image or shadow, there is no recovery; it is an eternal death, an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power.

He next proceeds to the figures by which the eternal punishment of wicked men is ascribed, and finds them perfectly agreeing to establish the same doctrine. One figure of comparison, often used, is that of combustible materials thrown into a fire, which will consequently be entirely consumed, if the fire be not quenched. Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. The meaning is, a total, irrevocable destruction; for, as the tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire, and is destroyed; as the useless chaff, when separated from the good grain, is set on fire, and if the fire be not quenched, is consumed: so, he thinks, it plainly appears, that the image of unquenchable or everlasting fire is not intended to signify the degree or duration of torment, but the absolute certainty of destruction, beyond all possibility of recovery. So the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah are said to have suffered the vengeance of an eternal fire; that is, they were so effectually consumed, or destroyed, that they could never be rebuilt; the phrase, eternal fire, signifying the irrevocable destruction of those cities, not the degree or duration of the misery of the inhabitants who perished.

The images of the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched, used in Mark 9: 43, are set in opposition to entering into life, and intended to denote a period of life and existence.

Our Savior expressly assigns different degrees of future misery, in proportion to men's respective degrees of guilt, Luke 12: 47, 48. But if all wicked men shall suffer torments without end, how can any of them be said to suffer but a few stripes? All degrees and distinctions of punishment seem swallowed up in the notion of never-ending or infinite misery.

Finally, death and eternal destruction, or annihilation, is properly styled in the New Testament, an everlasting punishment, as it is irrevocable and unalterable forever; and it is most strictly and literally styled an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

Dr. Edwards, in his answer to Dr. Chauncey, on the salvation of all men, says that this scheme was provisionally retained by Dr. Chauncey; i. e. in case the scheme of universal salvation should fail him: and therefore Dr. Edwards, in his examination of that work, appropriates a chapter to the consideration of it. Among other reasonings against it are the following:—

1. The different degrees of punishment which the wicked will suffer according to their works, proves that it does not consist in annihilation, which admits of no degrees.

2. If it be said that the punishment of the wicked, though it will end in annihilation, yet shall be preceded by torment, and that this will be of different degrees, according to the degrees of sin; it may be replied, this is making it to be compounded partly of torment, and partly of annihilation. The latter also appears to be but a small part of future punishment, for that alone will be inflicted on the least sinner, and on account of the least sin; and that all punishment which will be inflicted on any person above that which is due to the least sin, is to consist in torment. Nay, if we can form any idea in the present state of what would be dreadful or desirable in another, instead of its being any punishment to be annihilated after a long series of torment, it must be a deliverance, to which the sinner would look forward with anxious desire. And is it credible that this was the termination of torment that our Lord held up to his disciples as an object of dread? Can this be the destruction of body and soul in hell? Is it credible that everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, should constitute only a part, and a small part, of future punishment; and such too as, after a series of torment, must, next to being made happy, be the most acceptable thing that could befall them? Can this be the object threatened by such language, as recompensing tribulation, and taking vengeance in flaming fire? 2 Thess. 1. Is it possible that God should threaten them with putting an end to their miseries? Moreover, this destruction is not described as the conclusion of a succession of torments, but as taking place immediately after the last judgment. When Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints, then shall the wicked be destroyed.

3. Everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, cannot mean annihilation; for that would be no exertion of divine power, but merely the suspension of it; for let the upholding power of God be withheld for one moment, and the whole creation would sink into nothing.

4. The punishment of wicked men will be the same as that of wicked angels, Matt. 25: 41. Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. But the punishment of wicked angels consists not in annihilation, but torment. Such is their present punishment in a degree, and such, in a greater degree, will be their punishment hereafter. They are "cast down to hell;" they "believe and tremble;" they are reserved in chains under darkness, to the judgment of the great day; they cried, saying, "What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to torment us before our time?" Could the devils but persuade themselves they should be annihilated, they would believe and be at ease rather than tremble.

5. The Scriptures explain their own meaning in the use of such terms as death, destruction, &c. The second death is expressly said to consist in being cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and as having a part in that lake, (Rev. 20: 14. 21: 8.) which does not describe annihilation, nor can it be made to consist with it. The phrase, cut him asunder, (Matt. 24: 51,) is as strong as those of death or destruction; yet that is made to consist of having their portion with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

6. The happiness of the righteous does not consist in eternal being, but eternal well-being; and as the punishment of the wicked stands every where opposed to it, it must consist, not in the loss of being, but of well-being, and in suffering the contrary.

The great Dr. Watts may be considered in some measure, a Destructionist; since it was his opinion that the children of ungodly parents who die in infancy are annihilated. DETRACTION; in the native importance of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing; and as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame, rendering him less valued and esteemed by others. Dr. Barrow observes (Works, vol. i. ser. 19,) that it differs from slander, which involves an imputation of falsehood; from reviling, which includes bitter and foul language; and from censuring, which is of a more general purport, extending indifferently to all kinds of persons, qualities and actions; but detraction especially respects worthy persons, good qualities, and laudable actions, the reputation of which it aimeth to destroy. It is a fault opposed to candor.

Nothing can be more incongruous with the spirit of the gospel, the example of Christ, the command of God, and the love of mankind, than a spirit of detraction; and yet there are many who never seem happy but when they are employed in this work: they feed and live upon the supposed infirmities of others; they allow excellence to none; they depreciate every thing that is praiseworthy; and, possessed of no good themselves, they think all others are like them. "O! my soul, come thou not into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united."—Hend. Buck.

DEURHOFF, (WILLIAM,) a native of Amsterdam, born in 1650, and by trade a box-maker, was the founder of a sect, which is not yet quite extinct, under the title of Deurhoffians. He represented the divine nature under the idea of a power or energy diffused through the whole universe, and acting upon every part of the vast machine. His works are, The Theology of Deurhoff, two volumes quarto, and a first volume of The Metaphysics of Deurhoff. The latter was published in 1717, in which year he died.—Davenport.

DEUTERO-CANONICAL; in the school theology, an appellation given to certain books of holy Scripture, which were added to the canon after the rest, either by reason they were not written till after the compilation of the canon, or by reason of some dispute as to their canonicity. The word is Greek, being compounded of deuteros, second, and kanonikos, canonical.

The Jews, it is certain, acknowledged several books in their canon, which were put there later than the rest. They say that, under Esdras, or Ezra, a great assembly of their doctors, which they call, by way of eminence, the "great synagogue," made the collection of the sacred books which we now have in the Hebrew Old Testament; and they agree that they put books therein which had not been so before the Babylonish captivity; such as those of Daniel, Ezekiel, Haggai, &c.; and those of Ezra and Nehemiah. And the Romish church has since added others to the canon, that were not, and could not be, in the canon of the Jews, by reason some of them were not composed till after—such as the book of Ecclesiasticus, with several of the apocryphal books, as the Maccabees, Wisdom, &c. (See CANON.)—Hend. Buck.

DEUTERONOMY; from deuteros, second, and nomos, law; the last book of the Pentateuch or five books of Moses. As its name imports, it contains a repetition of the civil and moral law, which was a second time delivered by Moses, with some additions and explanations, so well to impress it more forcibly upon the Israelites in general, as in particular for the benefit of those who, being born in the wilderness, were not present at the first promulgation of the law. It contains also a recapitulation of the several events which had befallen the Israelites since their departure from Egypt, with severe reproaches for their past misconduct, and earnest exhortations to future obedience. The Messiah is explicitly foretold in this book; and there are many remarkable predictions interspersed in it, particularly in the twenty-eighth, thirtieth, thirty-second, and thirty-third chapters relative to the future condition of the Jews. The book of Deuteronomy finishes with an account of the death of Moses, which is supposed to have been added by his successor, Joshua.—Watson.

DEVIL; the leader of the fallen angels, and the arch-foe of God and man. Matt. 25: 41. The name, like the French diabole, German teuffel, Latin diabolus, is only a modified form of the Greek word diabolos, which, from diaballein, to calumniate, properly signifies calumniator, detractor, false accuser, &c. In the Syriac language, he is called achel-kartzo, "the devourer of calumny," which most emphatically expresses the delight which he takes in every attempt that is made to blast the character of good and holy men. It deserves to be particularly noticed, that though the term "devils," in the plural, occurs frequently in the English version, in application to fallen spirits, the original word is not, in such instances, diaboloi, but daimones, or daimonia. When used in the plural, diabolos never refers to fallen angels, but to human beings. See 1 Tim. 3: 11. 2 Tim. 3: 43. Titus 2: 3. There is, therefore, according to the strict propriety of Scripture language, only one devil, who is otherwise characterized by the epithets—the god and prince of this world; the prince of darkness; the prince of the power of the air; the accuser; Belial; the tempter; an adversary, deceiver, liar, &c. His power, though infinitely short of omnipotence, is represented as great and extensive; and his influence, exerted either immediately by himself, or through the agency of the innumerable multitude of wicked spirits who are enlisted in his service, is set forth as fearful in the extreme. Yet truly appalling as are the power and influence of this malignant demon, it is nevertheless a fact, substantiated no less by the testimony of Scripture than by the experience of mankind, that they may successfully be resisted by the weakest moral agent who shall avail himself of the means placed at his disposal for this end by his benevolent and merciful Creator. Nothing, therefore, can possibly be more absurd than for sinners to attempt to exculpate themselves by throwing the blame of their wicked actions on the devil. Tempt them he may, and his methods of seduction are various and well adapted to compass his ends; but force them to the commission of one sin he cannot. "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." "Whom resist standfast in the faith." James 4: 7. 1 Peter 5: 9. The position attempted to be maintained by the Socinians, that by Satan we are merely to understand "a symbolical person," "the principle of evil personified," "a fictitious personage," "an evil disposition," &c. cannot be reconciled with any rational or consistent principles of Scripture interpretation, and deserves to be classed with the hypothesis, that our Savior himself had no real existence, but, as described by the evangelists, is only a personification of virtue or moral excellence. (See SATAN.)—Hend. Buck.

DEVOTEE, in the primary sense of the word, means a person wholly given up to acts of piety and devotion; but it is usually understood, in a bad sense, to denote a bigot or superstitious person—one addicted to excessive and self-imposed religious exercises.—Hend. Buck.

DEVOTION, a fervent exercise of the private or public offices of religion, or a temper and disposition of the mind rightly affected with such exercises. It is also taken for certain religious practices which a person makes it a rule to discharge regularly.

Wherever the vital and unadulterated spirit of Christian devotion prevails, its immediate objects will be to adore the perfections of God; to entertain with reverence and complacency the various intimations of his pleasure, especially those contained in holy Writ; to acknowledge our absolute dependence on and infinite obligations to him; to confess and lament the disorders of our nature, and the transgressions of our lives; to implore his grace and mercy through Jesus Christ; to intercede for our brethren of mankind; to pray for the propagation and establishment of truth, righteousness, and peace on earth; in fine, to long for a more-entire conformity to the will of God, and to breathe after the everlasting enjoyment of his friendship.

The effects of such a spirit habitually cherished, and feelingly expressed before him, must surely be important and happy. Among these may be reckoned a profound humility in the sight of God, a high veneration for his presence and attributes, an ardent zeal for his worship and honor, a constant imitation of our Savior's divine example, a diffusive charity for men of all denominations, a generous and unwearied self-denial, a total resignation to Providence, an increasing esteem for the gospel, with clearer and firmer hopes of that immortal life which it has brought to light.—Mrs. Barbauld; Paley; Hend. Buck.

DE WITT, (SUSAN) the wife of Simeon De Witt of Albany, and the second daughter of Rev. Dr. Linn, died at Philadelphia, while on a visit, May 5, 1824. She was a woman of strong intellectual powers and of elevated piety. She published a poem, which has been much read and admired,—The Pleasures of Religion.—Allen.

DE WITT, (JOHN, D. D.), professor of biblical history in the theological seminary of the Dutch Reformed church at New Brunswick, New Jersey, a native of Catskill, New York, was ordained as colleague with Daniel Collins of Lanesborough, Massachusetts, July 8, 1812, and was dismissed December 8, 1813, and afterwards settled as the minister of the second Reformed Dutch church in Albany. He was afterwards professor in the theological seminary, and also one of the professors of Rutgers' college, in New Brunswick, where he died, October 12, 1831, aged about forty-two.—Hist. Berkshire, 389; Allen.

DEW. Dew in Palestine are plentiful, like a small shower of rain every morning. Gideon filled a basin with the dew which fell on a fleece of wool, Judges 6: 38. Isaac, blessing Jacob, wished him the dew of heaven, which fattens the fields, Gen. 27: 28. In those warm countries, where it seldom rains, the night dews supply the want of showers. Isaiah speaks of rain as if it were a dew, Isaiah 18: 4. Some of the most beautiful and illustrative of the images of the Hebrew poets are taken from the dews of their country. The reviving influence of the gospel, the copiousness of its blessings, and the multitude of its converts, are thus set forth.—Watson.

DEXTER, (SAMUEL,) a benefactor of Harvard college, was a merchant in Boston. In the political struggles just before the revolution, he was repeatedly elected to the council, and negated for his patriotic zeal by the royal governor. In his last years he was deeply engaged in investigating the doctrines of theology. He died at Mendon, June 10, 1810, aged eighty-four. For the encouragement of biblical criticism he bequeathed a handsome legacy to Harvard college. He also bequeathed forty dollars to a minister, whom he wished to preach a funeral sermon, (without making any mention of him in the discourse,) from the thrilling words, (2 Cor. 4: 18.) THE THINGS, WHICH ARE SEEN, ARE TEMPORAL; BUT THE THINGS WHICH ARE NOT SEEN, ARE ETERNAL.—Allen.

DIACONOPTCHINS, a class of Russian dissenters from the Greek church; so called from Alexander Deacon, of the church of Veska, from which he separated in 1706, on a dispute relative to some ecclesiastical ceremonies. (See RASCOLNIKS.) Pinkerton's Greek Church, p. 302.—Williams.

DIADEM. (See CROWN.)

DIAL, is not mentioned in Scripture before the reign of Ahaz. Interpreters differ concerning the form of the dial of Ahaz, 2 Kings 20. The generality of expositors think that it was a staircase so disposed, that the sun showed the hours upon it by the shadow. Others suppose that it was a pillar erected in the middle of a very level and smooth pavement, on which the hours were engraved. According to these authors, the lines marked in this pavement are what the Scripture calls degrees. Grotius describes it as follows: "It was a concave hemisphere, and in the midst was a globe, the shadow of which fell on the different lines engraven in the concavity of the hemisphere; these lines were twenty-eight in number." This description answers pretty nearly to that kind of dial, which the Greeks called scapha, a boat or hemisphere, the invention (or rather introduction) of which, Vitruvius ascribes to Berosus the Chaldean. It would seem, indeed, that the most ancient sun-dial known is in the form of a half-circle, hollowed into the stone, and the stone cut down to an angle. This kind of dial was invented in Babelou, and was very probably the same as that of Abaz.—Watson.

DIAMOND, (jahlem.) Ex. 28: 18. 29: 11. Ez. 28: 13. This has from remote antiquity been considered as the most valuable, or, more properly, the most costly substance in nature. The reason of the high estimation in which it was held by the ancients, was its rarity, extreme hardness and brilliancy. It filled the sixth place in the high-priest's breast-plate, and to it was engraven the name of Naphthali. The word translated diamond in Jer. 17: 1, is shemir. (See ADAMANT.)—Watson.

DIANA; a celebrated goddess of the heathens, to whom a magnificent temple was dedicated at Ephesus, a medal of which is preserved. She was of the number of the twelve superior deities, and was called by the several names of Hebe, Trivia, and Hecate. In the heavens she was the moon; upon earth she was called Diana; but the infernal Diana was distinguished by the name of Hecate, or Trivia; in which character she was invoked in enchantments, and represented as a fury, holding instruments of terror in her hands, and grasping cords, swords, serpents, or burning torches. The appellation of trivia or triformis, appears to have been derived from the custom of representing her sometimes with three bodies, or three heads.

Diana was known under several other names, most of which appear to have originated from the different places where she was worshipped; but she is easily distinguished in the figures which represent her, either by the crescent upon her head, or by her bow and arrows, or by her hunting dress, or by the dogs that accompany her. Among the Greeks, she was considered as the goddess of chastity, and hence virgins were given her for companions; yet she is represented, in the ancient fables, as by no means averse from gallantry; and is said to have bestowed her favors on Endymion, Pan, and Priapus. The Greeks appear to have derived their mythological system, in a great measure, from the Egyptians; and Diana, the sister of Apollo, is generally held to be the same with Isis, the sister of Osiris.

Diana had many oracles in ancient times, and many temples were dedicated to her worship. Of these latter, the most celebrated was that at Ephesus, which, on account of its size, structure, and embellishments, was esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world. Some account of the construction of this famous temple has been transmitted to us by two ancient authors, Vitruvius and Pliny. The former tells us, that it had eight columns in the fore-front, and as many in the back-front; that it had a double range of columns round it; and that it was of the Ionic order. Pliny states, (lib. xxxvi. cap. 14.) that two hundred and twenty years elapsed during its construction; that it was four hundred and twenty-five feet in length, and two hundred and twenty in breadth; that it was adorned with one hundred columns, each sixty feet high, &c. Of these columns, twenty-seven were very curiously carved, and the rest polished. The architect employed in executing this edifice was Ctesiphon, or Ctesifonte; and the bas-reliefs of one of the columns were done by Scopas, the most celebrated sculptor of antiquity. The altar was adorned with the masterly performances of the famous Praxiteles. The "great Diana of the Ephesians" was, according to Pliny, a small statue of ebony, made by one Canitia, though believed by the vulgar to have been sent down from heaven by Jupiter. The temple was several times destroyed and rebuilt, until it was finally burnt by the Goths, in the year 260.

Diana is said to have been worshipped in Palestine, in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah, under the name of Meni, that is to say, the goddess of months, or the moon. But the city of Ephesus was, beyond all other places, devoted to the worship of Diana, and a considerable traffic was there carried on, in making little models of the temple with the image of the goddess inscribed in them, which the silversmiths sold to foreigners. Hence the clamor of the inhabitants, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Acts 19: 24, &c. (See ERNESTUS.)—Jones.

DIARY; a private register in which are recorded the views and experience of individuals, and their observations on passing events.

The practice of keeping such a record it would be obviously wrong to inculcate strenuously on all Christians. Thousands have not the education or capacity which it requires. Many to whom it might not be otherwise impracticable, are so situated in providence that they cannot command the necessary leisure. In some instances, it has been performed in an unguarded manner, or injudicious uses have been made of the document by surviving relatives or friends.—On the other hand, the idea that the record will sooner or later meet the eyes of men, and recommend the writer to their esteem and admiration as a person of eminent piety, is apt, at least, to mingle itself with purer views, and even unconsciously to exercise a considerable influence on the statements, and the expressions employed.

The published journals, however, of some exemplary Christians have been so judiciously written, and have proved so highly useful for the direction and encouragement of others in the service of God, that it is a cause of lively gratitude that ever they existed, and that they were ever given to the world. Who will say that it is wrong in any Christian, possessing the requisite ability and leisure, provided he observe the dictates of modesty and prudence, and strive, in dependence on divine grace, to be actuated only by pious and honorable motives, to record from time to time a few notices of what is most material in his own experience? The review of such memoranda, after months and years have passed away, may call to his recollection facts in his history important to himself, which, without such help, he would have utterly forgotten; and may serve not only to awaken fresh sentiments of humility and gratitude, but to incite to renewed ardor and circumspection in the path of righteousness.

To ministers of the gospel, whose official character obliges them to bestow much attention on the spiritual interests of others, the keeping of a diary has been recommended as an excellent means of preventing them from overlooking or neglecting their own.—Hend. Buck.

DIAZIUS, (John.) a learned and pious sufferer in the cause of God and of truth, was born and educated in Spain,

In the beginning of the sixteenth century. He was sent to Paris to complete his studies; but it pleased God, by means of the books of Luther and of some other Protestant divines, so to enlighten his mind in the knowledge of the Scriptures, that he began to see and abhor the heresies and abominations of the church of Rome. With a view to his further improvement, he visited Geneva, where he became intimately acquainted with Calvin, and much endeared to him. He afterwards went to Strasburgh, where Bucer was so pleased with his character and talents, that he obtained leave of the senate to have Diazius joined with him in the disputation at Ratisbon. At Ratisbon he found Peter Malvinda, a Spaniard, the pope's agent in Germany, who being uneasy at seeing one of his countrymen a Protestant, used every means to persuade him to return to the Romish church—large proffers, threats of severe punishments, and intermingled entreaties. Diazius remaining firm, Malvinda informed his brother Alphonsus Diazius, one of the pope's lawyers at Rome, who instantly hastened to Ratisbon, and thence to Nuremberg, (where his brother had gone to superintend the printing of Bucer's book,) determined to reclaim or destroy him. His efforts to turn him from the Protestant faith were ineffectual; in consequence of which he hired a ruffian to murder him, which bloody deed was accomplished in 1546. Alphonsus was applauded for it by the papists; but, stung by his own conscience, he not long after, at Trent, put an end to his own life.—Middleton.

DIBON; a city of Moab, so called from its softly-flowing waters; and thought to be the Dimon of Isa. 15: 9. This city was given to the tribe of Gad by Moses, and afterwards yielded to Reuben, Numb. 32: 3, 33, 34. Josh. 13: 9. It seems to have been again occupied by the Moabites at a later period, Isa. 15: 2. Jer. 48: 18, 22. Eusebius says, it was a large town on the northern bank of the river Arnon, Numb. 33: 45. Burckhardt speaks of a place called Dibon, about three miles north of the Arnon. (See GAD.)—II. The same perhaps as Debir, or Kirjath-sepher, Neh. 11: 25. The Seventy call that place Dibon, which in Hebrew is Deber, Josh. 13: 26.—Calmet.

DICKINSON, (JONATHAN), the first president of New Jersey college, was born in Hatfield, Massachusetts, April 22, 1688. He was graduated at Yale college, in 1706, and within one or two years afterwards he was settled the minister of the first Presbyterian church in Elizabethtown, New Jersey. Of this church he was for near forty years the joy and glory. As a friend of literature, he was also eminently useful. The charter of the college of New Jersey, which had never yet been carried into operation, was enlarged by governor Belcher, October 22, 1746, and Mr. Dickinson was appointed president. The institution commenced at Elizabethtown; but it did not long enjoy the advantages of his superintendence, for it pleased God to call him away from life, October 7, 1747, aged fifty-nine. His writings possess merit. They are designed to unfold the wonderful method of redemption, and to excite men to that cheerful consecration of all their talents to their Maker, to that careful avoidance of sin and practice of godliness, which will exalt them to glory. The most important are his Discourses on the Reasonableness of Christianity, and on the Five Points, in answer to Whitby. An octavo volume of his works was published at Edinburgh, in 1793. See Pierson's Sermon on his Death; Preface to his Sermons, Edinburgh edition; Miller, ii. 345; Dowglass, ii. 284; Brainerd's Life, 129, 161; Chandler's Life of Johnson, 69; Green, 297.—Allen.

DIDRACHMA; a Greek word, signifying a piece of money, in value two drachmas; about fourteen pence English, or twenty-five cents. The Jews were by law obliged, every person, to pay two drachmas, that is, half a shekel, to the temple. To pay this, our Lord sent Peter to catch a fish, which probably had just swallowed such a coin. Matt. 17: 24—27.—Calmet.

DIDYMUS, (a twin). This is the signification of the Hebrew or Syriac word Thomas. (See THOMAS.)—Calmet.

DIET, is a name given to an assembly of the States of Germany. The following is a short notice of the principal diets which were held in reference to the affairs of the reformation. They are inserted in the order of time in which they were held.

1. THE DIET OF WORMS, in 1521, where Alexander, the pope's nuncio, having charged Luther with heresy, the duke of Saxony said, that Luther ought to be heard; which the emperor granted, and sent a pass to him, provided he would not preach in his journey. Luther being at Worms, protested that he would not recant, except they should show his errors by the word of God alone, and not by that of men. Therefore the emperor ordered him to go out of Worms, and a month after, by an edict published 26th of May, before all the princes of Germany, outlawed him.

2. DIET OF NUREMBERG, in 1523, where Francis Ceregnat, pope Adrian Vth's nuncio, demanded the execution of Leo Xth's bull, and of Charles Vth's edict published at Worms against Luther. But it was answered that it was necessary to call a council in Germany, to satisfy the nation about its grievances, which were reduced to a hundred articles, some whereof aimed at the destruction of the pope's authority, and the discipline of the Roman church. They added, that in the interim, the Lutherans should be commanded not to write against the Roman Catholics, &c. All these things were brought into the form of an edict published in the emperor's name.

3. DIET OF NUREMBERG, in 1524. Cardinal Campege, pope Clement VIIIth's legate, entered incognito into the town, for fear of exasperating the people. There the Lutherans having the advantage, it was decreed, that, with the emperor's consent, the pope should call a council in Germany; but in the interim, an assembly should be held at Spire, to determine what was to be believed and practised; and that, to obey the emperor, the princes ought to order the observation of the edict of Worms as strictly as they could. Charles V. being angry at this, commanded the edict of Worms to be observed very strictly, and prohibited the assembly at Spire.

4. DIET OF SPIRE, in 1526. Charles V. being in Spain, named his brother, the archduke Ferdinand, to preside over that assembly, where the duke of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse demanded at first a free exercise of the Lutheran religion, so that the Lutherans preached there publicly against the pope; and the Lutheran princes' servants had these five capital letters, V. D. M. I. E., embroidered on their sleeves, signifying Verbum Domini manet in Aeternum, to show publicly that they would follow nothing else but the pure word of God. The archduke not daring to oppose those courses, proposed two things: the first, concerning the ancient religion which was to be obtained in observing the edict of Worms; and the second, concerning the help demanded by Lewis, king of Hungary, against the Turks. About the first, the Lutherans prevailing, it was decreed, that the emperor should be desired to call a general or national council in Germany within a year, and that, in the interim, every one was to have liberty of conscience. And whilst they were deliberating in vain about the second, the valiant king Lewis was defeated and killed at the battle of Mohacs.

5. DIET OF SPIRE, in 1529. There it was decreed, "that in all places where the edict of Worms against the Lutherans was received, it should be lawful for nobody to change his opinions; but in the countries where the new religion was received, it should be lawful to continue in it till the next council, if the ancient religion could not be re-established there without sedition; nevertheless the mass was not to be abolished there, and no Roman Catholic was to be allowed to turn Lutheran; that the Sacramentarians should be banished out of the empire, and the Anabaptists put to death; and that preachers should nowhere preach against the doctrine of the church." This decree destroying that of the first diet, six Lutheran princes, viz. the elector of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, the two dukes of Lunenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of fourteen imperial towns, protested in writing two days after in the assembly against that decree, which they would not obey, it being contrary to the gospel; and appealed to the general or national council, to the emperor, and to any other unsuspected judge. From that solemn protestation, came that famous name of Protestants, which the Lutherans took presently, and the Calvinists and other reformed Christians afterwards. They also protested that they would contribute nothing towards the war against the Turks till the exercise of their religion was free in all Germany. This protestation being presented to the emperor, he said that he would settle the affairs of Germany as soon as he had regulated those of Italy. The next year after, he called the famous diet of Augsburg spoken of before.

6. DIET OF AUGSBURG, in the year 1530. It was called by the emperor Charles V. to re-unite the princes about some matters of religion, and to join them altogether against the Turks. The emperor appeared there with the greatest magnificence that was ever seen in Germany; because so many electors and princes never met together before. There the elector of Saxony, followed by many princes, presented the confession of faith, called the Confession of Augsburg. The conference about matters of faith and discipline being concluded, the emperor ended the diet by a decree, that nothing should be altered in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Roman church, till a council should order it otherwise.

7. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1541, for re-uniting the Protestants with the Roman Catholics. The pope's legate having altered the twenty-two articles drawn by some learned doctors, the emperor proposed to choose some learned divines that might agree peaceably upon the articles; and being desired by the diet to choose them himself, he named three Roman Catholics, viz. Julius Plurigiuss, John Gropperus, and John Eckius; and three Protestants, viz. Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, and John Pistorius; but after an examination and disputation of a whole month, these divines never could agree about more than five or six articles, wherein the diet found some difficulties still. Therefore the emperor, to end those controversies, ordered by an edict, that the decisions of the doctors should be referred to a general council, or to the national council of all Germany, or to the next diet eighteen months after; and that, in the meanwhile, the Protestants should keep the articles agreed upon, forbidding them to solicit any body to change the ancient religion, &c. But to please the Protestants, he gave them leave by patent to keep their religion, notwithstanding the edict.

8. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1546, where none of the Protestant confederate princes appeared; nevertheless, it was decreed by the plurality of votes, that the council of Trent was to be followed, which the Protestant deputies opposed; and thus caused a war against them.

9. DIET OF AUGSBURG, in 1547, about matters of religion; the electors being divided concerning the decisions of the council of Trent, the emperor demanded that the management of this affair should be left to him, and it was resolved that every one should conform to the council's decisions.

10. DIET OF AUGSBURG, in 1548, where the commissioners named to examine some memoirs about a confession of faith, not agreeing together, the emperor named three divines, who drew the design of that famous Interim, so well known in Germany and elsewhere.

11. DIET OF AUGSBURG, in 1550, where the emperor complained that the Interim was not observed, and demanded that all should submit to the council which they were going to renew at Trent; but duke Maurice's deputies protested that their master did submit to the council on this condition, that the divines of the confession of Augsburg, not only should be heard there, but should vote also like the Roman Catholic bishops, and that the pope should not preside. But by the plurality of votes, the submission to the council was resolved upon.

12. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1557. The assembly demanded a conference between some famous doctors of both parties; which conference, held at Worms in September, between twelve Roman Catholic divines and twelve Lutheran, was soon dissolved by the Lutherans dividing among themselves.—Hend. Buck.

DIET, is also used, in the Scotch church, to denote the public service which any minister has to perform. Thus, if he has to preach three times on any given Sabbath, it is said he has three diets.—Hend. Buck.

DIGGERS; a name of reproach applied to some good people, probably Waldenses, who, being persecuted, were obliged to find or dig caverns, in which to hold their religious meetings. They were charged with despising the clergy and church of Rome.—Broughton's Dictionary.

The term Diggers was also, in Cromwell's time, applied to a religio-political party, from which the Spencean 5th tem is supposed to have been borrowed. (See SPENCE ANS.)—Williams.

DIGIT, (etzbah;) a measure containing sixty-seven eighty-ninths or about three-fourths of an inch. There are four digits in a palm, and six palms in a cubit.—Calmet.

DIKLAH; seventh son of Joktan, (Gen. 10: 27.) whose descendants are placed either in Arabia Felix, which abounds in palm trees, called Dikla in Chaldee and Syriac; or in Assyria, where is the town of Degla, and the river Tigris, or Dikkel.—Calmet.

DILIGENCE, CHRISTIAN, is constancy in the performance of all those duties enjoined us in God's sacred word. It includes activity and vigor—watchfulness against intruding objects—firmness and resolution—patience and perseverance. The shortness of our time; the importance of our work; the pleasure which arises from discharging duty; the uncertainty of the time of our dissolution; the consciousness we do not labor in vain; together with the example of Christ and all good men, should excite us to the most unwearied diligence in the cause of God, of truth, and our own souls.—Hend. Buck.

DISSISSORY LETTER; a letter given by a bishop to a candidate for holy orders, having a title in his diocese, directed to some other bishop, and giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him.—Hend. Buck.

DINAH; daughter of Jacob and Leah, (Gen. 30: 21.) born after Zebulon, and about A. M. 2250. When Jacob returned into Canaan, Dinah, then about the age of fifteen or sixteen, attended a festival of the Shechemites, to see the women of the country, (Gen. 34: 1, 2.) when Shechem, son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the city, ravished or seduced her, and afterwards desired his father to procure her for his wife. Dinah's brothers, being informed of what had passed, were much exasperated: and having made insidious proposals to Shechem, to his father Hamor, and to the inhabitants of their city, slew and plundered them, and carried off Dinah. Jacob, when informed of the occurrence, cursed their anger and cruelty, 49: 5-7.—Calmet.

DINAITES; a people who opposed the rebuilding of the temple, Ezra 4: 9.—Calmet.

DIOCESE, (Greek diokēsis, administration;) an ecclesiastical division, which originated in the arrangement made by Constantine, in the fourth century, when Christianity was made the religion of the state. This took place in accordance with the new division of the empire into one hundred and twenty provinces, governed by twelve vicars or sub-prefects. Among the Romanists, it signifies the territory over which the jurisdiction of an archbishop or bishop extends. With the Protestants in Germany, it signifies all the parishes that are under the inspection of one superintendent. In England, the province of Canterbury contains twenty-one dioceses, and the province of York three; each diocese is divided into archdeaconries, each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and each deanery into parishes. In the United States, a diocese is a territory under the jurisdiction of a single bishop of the Protestant Episcopal or Romish church, whether comprehending one or more states of the union.—Hend. Buck.

DIONYSIA; a Christian female, who suffered martyrdom at Carthage during the Arian Vandal persecution in the sixth century. She was a lady of fortune, and a widow. Being apprehended as an orthodox Christian, she was stripped, and scourged in a cruel manner. To her son, who, a mere lad, was placed on the rack before her, she is said to have addressed the following words: "Remember, O my child, that we were baptized in the name of the ever sacred Trinity; let us not lose the benefit thereof, lest it should hereafter be said, Cast them into utter darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth: for that pain which never endeth, is indeed to be dreaded, and that life which endureth to eternity, to be desired." The sufferings of both mother and child were shortly closed by death.—Fox.

DIONYSIUS, the Areopagite, is said in his youth to have been bred at Athens, and to have been instructed in all the arts and sciences for which that seat of the muses was renowned; and at the age of five and twenty, to have travelled into Egypt, there to perfect himself in the study of astronomy. When Christ died, he is said to have been at Heliopolis, and observing the preternatural darkness which accompanied his crucifixion, he remarked that either God himself was suffering, or that he sympathized with some one that was suffering. (See DARKNESS.) Returning to Athens, he became one of the senators of the Areopagus, disputed with the apostle Paul, and by him was converted to the Christian faith. Acts 17. According to ecclesiastical history, he became a presbyter of the church in Athens, where he labored much in the defence and propagation of the gospel, and after suffering greatly on account of his profession, he crowned his labors with a glorious martyrdom, being burnt to death in that city, in the year of Christ 95.—Jones.

DIOSPOLIS, (the city of Jupiter.) or THEBES. Nahum is thought to have intended it under the name of No-Amon. (See AMMON-NO.)—Calmet.

DIOTREPHES; a professed Christian, near Ephesus, who did not receive and kindly aid those missionaries to the heathen whom the apostle had sent to him; nor would he suffer others to do so. He is a perfect representative of the anti-missionary spirit in modern times. See 3 John 5-10.—Calmet.

DIRECTORY; a kind of regulation for the performance of religious worship, drawn up by the assembly of divines in England, at the instance of the parliament, in 1644. It was designed to supply the place of the liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, the use of which they had abolished. It consisted of some general heads, which were to be managed and filled up at discretion; for it prescribed no form of prayer, or circumstances of external worship, nor obliged the people to any responses, excepting Amen. The substance of it is as follows:—It forbids all salutations and civil ceremony in the churches;—the reading the Scriptures in the congregation is declared to be a part of the pastoral office;—all the canonical books of the Old and New Testament (but not the Apocrypha) are to be publicly read in the vulgar tongue: how large a portion is to be read at once, is left to the minister, who has likewise the liberty of expounding, when he judges it necessary. It prescribes heads for the prayer before sermon; it delivers rules for preaching the word; the introduction to the text must be short and clear, drawn from the words or context, or some parallel place of Scripture. In dividing the text, the minister is to regard the order of the matter more than that of the words: he is not to burden the memory of his audience with too many divisions, nor perplex their understanding with logical phrases and terms of art; he is not to start unnecessary objections; and he is to be very sparing in citations from ecclesiastical or other human writers, ancient or modern, &c. The directory recommends the use of the Lord's prayer as the most perfect model of devotion; it forbids private or lay persons to administer baptism, and enjoins it to be performed in the face of the congregation. It orders the communion table at the Lord's supper to be so placed, that the communicants may sit about it. It also orders that the sabbath be kept with the greatest strictness, both publicly and privately; that marriage be solemnized by a lawful minister of the word, who is to give counsel to, and pray for the parties; that the sick be visited by the minister under whose charge they are; the dead to be buried without any prayers or religious ceremonies; that days of fasting are to be observed when the judgments of God are abroad, or when some important blessings are desired; that days of thanksgiving for mercies received be also observed; and, also, that singing of psalms together in the congregation is the duty of Christians. In an appendix to this directory it is ordered, that all festivals, vulgarly called holidays, are to be abolished; that no day is to be kept but the Lord's day; and that as no place is capable of any holiness under the pretence of consecration, so neither is it subject to pollution by any superstition formerly used; and therefore it is held requisite, that the places of public worship now used should still be continued and employed. Should the reader be desirous of perusing this directory at large, he may find it at the end of Neal's History of the Puritans.—Hend. Buck.

DISCERN. To discern time and judgment is to know the season proper for such works, and the works proper for such occasions. Eccl. 8: 5. To discern the Lord's body, is by spiritual knowledge to take up the bread and wine in the Lord's supper, as representing the person and righteousness of God in our nature. 1 Cor. 11: 29. Christ is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart; he fully knows and can judge of their motions, manner, and ends; the Scripture is a discernor of them: when powerfully applied, it makes men truly to understand them. Heb. 4: 13. Discerning of spirits was either a miraculous power of discerning men's state or secret conduct; or a spiritual ability to discern true apostles and ministers from false ones. 1 Cor. 12: 10.—Brown.

DISCIPLE, (from the Latin word discere, to learn,) is one who professes to receive instruction from another. Hence the followers of a teacher, philosopher, or head of a sect, are usually called his disciples: and in this acceptation the term is used in the New Testament, where it occurs as the common designation of those who, by the preaching of the gospel, were converted to the Christian faith, and consequently professed themselves to be the followers of Christ. Hence we read of "the disciples of Moses," (John 9: 28,) "the disciples of John the Baptist," (Matt. 11: 2,) and "the disciples of Christ." Luke 14: 26, 27, 33.

In the days of our Lord's public ministry, it is said that great multitudes followed him, actuated, no doubt, by various motives; but, aware that many of them had not hitherto counted the cost, he turned and said unto them, "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple; and whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple; and whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." Luke 14: 25-27, 33. See also Matt. 7: 21-23. These things sufficiently show the danger that professors are in, of deceiving themselves in this important article; and they suggest the necessity of carefully examining the grounds on which men build the truth of their discipleship. It is hoped, that the vital interest which every professor has in that inquiry, will be admitted as an apology for submitting to the reader's consideration the following general reflections on this subject:

1. A teachable disposition is essential to the character of a true disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. Matt. 18: 1-5. John 6: 45. Prov. 4: 18. 2 Pet. 3: 18. 1 Cor. 8: 2. Phil. 3: 8-14.

2. A genuine disciple of Christ can admit no human teacher to be the lord of his conscience. Matt. 23: 8-10. Luke 4: 44. John 4: 1. James 1: 18. 1 Pet. 1: 22, 23. 1 Thess. 2: 13. Mark 14: 24. Luke 8: 18. James 1: 21. 1 Pet. 2: 1-3. John 17: 17. 2 Cor. 3: 18.

3. A disposition to obey all the will of God, so far as he has the means of doing it, is essential to the character of a real disciple of Christ. Luke 6: 46. Acts 9: 6. Matt. 5: 19. 7: 26, 27. James 1: 22-26. John 15: 14. 6: 60. Luke 9: 23. Phil. 2: 14, 15. Luke 17: 10.

4. A steady, consistent, and uniform perseverance in the ways of Christ, is another characteristic of discipleship. Hos. 6: 4. Eph. 4: 14. Matt. 16: 24-27. Mark 8: 34-38. Luke 9: 23-26. 10: 38. Matt. 6: 33. 1 Cor. 15: 58. Rev. 3: 21. (See LOVE.)—Jones.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST,* (sometimes called CAMPBELLITES, or REFORMERS.) As is usual in similar cases, the brethren who unite under the name of Disciples of Christ, or Christians, are nicknamed after those who have been prominent in gathering them together: they choose, however, to be recognised by the above simple and unassuming name.

The rise of this society, if we only look back to the drawing of the lines of demarkation between it and other professors, is of recent origin. About the commencement of the present century, the Bible alone, without any human addition in the form of creeds or confessions of faith, began to be plead and preached by many distinguished ministers of different denominations, both in Europe and America.

With various success, and with many of the opinions of the various sects imperceptibly carried with them from the denominations to which they once belonged, did the advocales of the Bible cause plead for the union of Christians of every name on the broad basis of the apostles' teaching. But it was not until the year 1823, that a restoration of the original gospel and order of things began to be plead in a periodical, edited by Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Virginia, entitled "the Christian Baptist."

He and his father, Thomas Campbell, renounced the Presbyterian system, and were immersed in the year 1812. They, and the congregations which they had formed, united with the Redstone Baptist association; protesting against all human creeds as bonds of union, and professing subjection to the Bible alone. This union took place in the year 1813. But in pressing upon the attention of that society and the public the all-sufficiency of the sacred Scriptures for every thing necessary to the perfection of Christian character, whether in the private or social relations of life, in the church or in the world, they began to be opposed by a strong creed-party in that association. After some ten years' debating and contending for the Bible alone and the apostles' doctrine, Alexander Campbell and the church to which he belonged, united with the Mahoning association, in the Western Reserve of Ohio, that association being more favorable to his views of reform.

In his debates on the subject and action of baptism with Mr. Walker, a seceding minister, in the year 1820, and with Mr. McCalla, a Presbyterian minister, of Kentucky, in the year 1823, his views of reformation began to be developed, and were very generally received by the Baptist society, as far as these works were read.

But in his "Christian Baptist," which began July 4, 1823, his views of the need of reformation were more fully exposed; and as these gained ground by the pleading of various ministers of the Baptist denomination, a party in opposition began to exert itself, and to oppose the spread of what they were pleased to call heterodoxy. But not till after great numbers began to act upon these principles, was there any attempt towards separation. After the Mahoning association appointed Mr. Walter Scott an evangelist, in the year 1827, and when great numbers began to be immersed into Christ under his labors, and new churches began to be erected by him and other laborers in the field, did the Baptist associations begin to declare non-fellowship with the brethren of the reformation. Thus by constraint, not of choice, they were obliged to form societies out of those communities that split upon the ground of adherence to the apostles' doctrine. Within the last seven years, they have increased with the most unprecedented rapidity; and during the present year, (1833,) not much less than ten thousand have joined the standard of reformation. They probably at this time, in the United States alone, amount to at least one hundred thousand. The distinguishing characteristics of their views and practices are the following:

They regard all the sects and parties of the Christian world as having, in greater or less degrees, departed from the simplicity of faith and manners of the first Christians, and as forming what the apostle Paul calls "the apostasy." This defection they attribute to the great varieties of speculation and metaphysical dogmatism of the countless creeds, formularies, liturgies, and books of discipline adopted and inculcated as bonds of union and platforms of communion in all the parties which have sprung from the Lutheran reformation. The effects of these synodical covenants, conventional articles of belief, and rules of ecclesiastical polity, has been the introduction of a new nomenclature, a human vocabulary of religious words, phrases and technicalities, which has displaced the style of the living oracles, and affixed to the sacred diction ideas wholly unknown to the apostles of Christ.

To remedy and obviate these aberrations, they propose to ascertain from the holy Scriptures, according to the commonly-received and well-established rules of interpretation, the ideas attached to the leading terms and sentences found in the holy Scriptures, and then to use the words of the Holy Spirit in the apostolic acceptation of them.

By thus expressing the ideas communicated by the Holy Spirit in the terms and phrases learned from the apostles, and by avoiding the artificial and technical language of scholastic theology, they propose to restore a pure speech to the household of faith; and by accustoming the family of God to use the language and dialect of the heavenly Father, they expect to promote the sanctification of one another through the truth, and to terminate those discords and debates which have always originated from the words which man's wisdom teaches, and from a reverential regard and esteem for the style of the great masters of polemic divinity; believing that speaking the same things in the same style, is the only certain way to thinking the same things.

They make a very marked difference between faith and opinion; between the testimony of God and the reasonings of men; the words of the Spirit and human inferences. Faith in the testimony of God and obedience to the commandments of Jesus are their bond of union; and not an agreement in any abstract views or opinions upon what is written or spoken by divine authority. Hence all the speculations, questions, debates of words, and abstract reasonings found in human creeds, have no place in their religious fellowship. Regarding Calvinism and Arminianism, Trinitarianism and Unitarianism, and all the opposing theories of religious sectaries, as extremes begotten by each other, they cautiously avoid them, as equi-distant from the simplicity and practical tendency of the promises and precepts, of the doctrine and facts, of the exhortations and precedents of the Christian institution.

They look for unity of spirit and the bonds of peace in the practical acknowledgment of one faith, one Lord, one immersion, one hope, one body, one Spirit, one God and Father of all; not in unity of opinions, nor in unity of forms, ceremonies, or modes of worship.

The holy Scriptures of both Testaments they regard as containing revelations from God, and as all necessary to make the man of God perfect, and accomplished for every good word and work; the New Testament, or the living oracles of Jesus Christ, they understand as containing the Christian religion; the testimonies of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, they view as illustrating and proving the great proposition on which our religion rests, viz. that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the only-begotten and well-beloved Son of God, and the only Savior of the world; the Acts of the Apostles as a divinely-authorized narrative of the beginning and progress of the reign or kingdom of Jesus Christ, recording the full development of the gospel by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven, and the procedure of the apostles in setting up the church of Christ on earth; the Epistles as carrying out and applying the doctrine of the apostles to the practice of individuals and congregations, and as developing the tendencies of the gospel in the behavior of its professors; and all as forming a complete standard of Christian faith and morals, adapted to the interval between the ascension of Christ and his return with the kingdom which he has received from God; the Apocalypse, or Revelation of Jesus Christ to John in Patmos, as a figurative and prospective view of all the fortunes of Christianity, from its date to the return of the Savior.

Every one who sincerely believes the testimony which God gave of Jesus of Nazareth, saying, "This is my Son, the beloved, in whom I delight," or, in other words, believes what the evangelists and apostles have testified concerning him, from his conception to his coronation in heaven as Lord of all, and who is willing to obey him in every thing, they regard as a proper subject of immersion, and no one else. They consider immersion into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, after a public, sincere, and intelligent confession of the faith in Jesus, as necessary to admission to the privileges of the kingdom of the Messiah, and as a solemn pledge on the part of heaven, of the actual remission of all past sins and of adoption into the family of God.

The Holy Spirit is promised only to those who believe and obey the Savior. No one is taught to expect the reception of that heavenly Monitor and Comforter as a resident in his heart till he obeys the gospel.

Thus while they proclaim faith and repentance, or faith and a change of heart, as preparatory to immersion, immersion, and the Holy Spirit, they say to all penitents, or all those who believe and repent of their sins, as Peter said to the first audience addressed after the Holy Spirit was bestowed after the glorification of Jesus, "Be immersed, every one of you, in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." They teach sinners that God commands all men every where to reform or to turn to God, that the Holy Spirit strives with them so to do by the apostles and prophets, that God beseeches them to be reconciled through Jesus Christ, and that it is the duty of all men to believe the gospel and to turn to God.

The immersed believers are congregated into societies according to their propinquity to each other, and taught to meet every first day of the week in honor and commemoration of the resurrection of Jesus, and to break the loaf which commemorates the death of the Son of God, to read and hear the living oracles, to teach and admonish one another, to unite in all prayer and praise, to contribute to the necessities of saints, and to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord.

Every congregation chooses its own overseers and deacons, who preside over and administer the affairs of the congregations; and every church, either from itself or in co-operation with others, sends out, as opportunity offers, one or more evangelists, or proclaimers of the word, to preach the word and to immerse those who believe, to gather congregations, and to extend the knowledge of salvation where it is necessary, as far as their means extend. But every church regards these evangelists as its servants, and therefore they have no control over any congregation, each congregation being subject to its own choice of presidents or elders whom they have appointed. Perseverance in all the work of faith, labor of love, and patience of hope is inculcated by all the disciples as essential to admission into the heavenly kingdom.

Such are the prominent outlines of the faith and practices of those who wish to be known as the Disciples of Christ: but no society among them would agree to make the preceding items either a confession of faith or a standard of practice; but, for the information of those who wish an acquaintance with them, are willing to give at any time a reason for their faith, hope and practice.

The views of reformation in faith and practice of "the Disciples of Christ" may be seen at great length, by those desiring a more particular acquaintance, in the Christian Baptist and Millennial Harbinger, edited by Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Brooke county, Virginia; also in the Evangelist, published by Walter Scott, Carthage, Ohio; and the Christian Messenger, published by Barton W. Stone and J. T. Johnson, Georgetown, Kentucky. The Christian Baptist and Millennial Harbinger, being the first publication of these sentiments, contains a history of this reformation, as well as a full development of all things from the beginning.

DISCIPLINARIANS; those in Baxter's time, who advocated the cause of pure communion. "Those that pleaded for discipline were called by the new name of Disciplinarians; as if it had been a kind of heresy to desire discipline in the church."—Hend. Buck.

DISCIPLINE, (CHURCH); the application in a Christian church, of those principles and rules, derived from divine authority, which regard the purity, order, peace, and useful efficiency of its members. Discipline is to a church what order and regularity are to a family; or the maintaining of government and the administration of law to a nation. With respect to its object, it must carefully be observed, that it is not to pander to human domination, or to subserve the political interests of any party; to coerce the judgment and conscience of men; or to avenge any public or private injury; but it is designed to effect the observance of those means by which the holiness, comfort, and usefulness of Christians may be preserved and improved; to exhibit the influence of the Christian religion in producing all that is excellent, amiable, and beneficial; to secure the fulfilment of all the relative obligations of church union; to attract into such union persons whose minds and characters are governed by evangelical truth and undissembled piety; and to remove from the visible ranks of the faithful such as prove themselves to be unworthy of a place among the followers of Christ. Matt. 18: 15—18. 1 Cor. 5. 2 Thess. 3. 6 and Tit. 3: 10, 11, and other passages in the New Testament, clearly recognise, or positively and authoritatively enforce, the exercise of discipline in the church of Christ; and it becomes all who bow to his spiritual rule, to hear what the Spirit saith on this point to the churches. See Lib. of Eccles. Knowl.; Hallan's Social Worship; James's Church Member's Guide; James's Advice to Church Members; Fuller's Works, vol. ii. 462, &c.—Hend. Buck.

DISCIPLINE, (BOOK OF), in the history of the church of Scotland, is a common order drawn up by the assembly of ministers in 1650, for the reformation and uniformity to be observed in the discipline and policy of the church. In this book, the government of the church by prelates is set aside; kirk sessions are established; the superstitious observation of fast days and saints' days is condemned, and other regulations for the government of the church are determined. This book was approved by the privy council, and is called the first book of discipline.—Hend. Buck.

DISCONTENT; uneasiness at our present state.

Man never appears in a worse light than when he gives way to this disposition. It is at once the strongest proof of his pride, ignorance, unbelief, and rebellion against God. Let such remember, that discontent is a reflection on God's government; that it cannot alter the state of things, or make them better; that it is the source of the greatest misery; that it is an absolute violation of God's law, (Ileb. 13: 5); and that God has often punished it with the most signal judgments, Num. 11. Ps. 107. (See CONTENTMENT.)—Buck.

DISCRETION; prudent behavior, arising from a knowledge of and acting agreeable to the difference of things. "There are," says Addison, (No. 225. Spectator), "many more shining qualities in the mind of man, but there is none so useful as discretion: it is this, indeed, which gives a value to all the rest; which sets them at work in their proper times and places, and turns them to the advantage of the person who is possessed of them. Without it, learning is pedantry, and wit impertinence; virtue itself looks like weakness; the best parts only qualify a man to be more sprightly in errors, and active to his own prejudice.

"Discretion is a very different thing from cunning: cunning is only an accomplishment of little, mean, ungenerous minds. Discretion points out the noblest ends to us, and pursues the most proper and laudable methods of attaining them; cunning has only private, selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended views, and, like a well-formed eye, commands a whole horizon; cunning is a kind of short-sightedness that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but not able to discern things at a distance. Discretion, the more it is discovered, gives a greater authority to the person who possesses it; cunning, when it is once detected, loses its force, and makes a man incapable of bringing about even those events which he might have done, had he passed only for a plain man. Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life; cunning is a kind of instinct, that only looks out after our immediate interest and welfare. Discretion is only found in men of strong sense and good understandings; cunning is often to be met with in brutes themselves, and in persons who are but the fewest removes from them. In short, cunning is only the mimic of discretion, and may pass upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom." (See PRUDENCE.)—Buck.

DISDAIN; contempt, as unworthy of one's choice. It is distinguished from haughtiness thus: Haughtiness is founded on the high opinion we have of ourselves; disdain on the low opinion we have of others.—Buck.

DISEASES. Many kinds of disease are mentioned in Scripture. Diseases and death are consequences of sin; and the Hebrews, not much accustomed to recur to physical causes, often imputed them to evil spirits. (See Luke 13: 16.) If their infirmities appeared unusual, and especially if the cause were unknown to them, they concluded it to be a stroke from the avenging hand of God; and to him the wisest and most religious had recourse for cure. King Asa is blamed for placing his confidence in physicians, 2 Chron. 16: 12. Job's friends ascribed all his distempers to God's justice. Paul delivers the incestuous Corinthian to Satan "for the destruction of the flesh:"

that the evil spirit might afflict him with diseases, 1 Cor. 5: 5. (See SATAN.) The same apostle attributes the death and diseases of many Corinthians to their communicating unworthily, chap. 11: 30. He also elsewhere ascribes the infirmities with which he was afflicted to an evil angel: "a thorn in the flesh—an angel of Satan," 2 Cor. 12: 7. An angel of death slew the first-born of the Egyptians; a destroying angel wasted Sennacherib's army; an avenging angel smote the people of Israel with a pestilence, after David's sin. Saul fell into a fit of deep melancholy, hypochondriacal depression, and it is said "an evil spirit came upon him." Abimelech, king of Gerar, for taking Sarah, the wife of Abraham, was threatened with death, (Gen. 20: 3, 4.) and the Philistines were smitten with an ignominious disease, for not treating the ark with adequate respect, 1 Sam. 5: 6, 7. These diseases, and others that we read of, were evident interpositions of Providence, by whatever agency they were produced. (See DEMONIACS.)—Calmet.

DISINTERESTED LOVE. (See SELF-LOVE.)

DISPENSATION; a particular form of the divine administration of the church, and of the world in relation to the church. In this view of the matter, there have been several dispensations or forms of the revealed administration of heaven, all adapted to the purpose of God for the time, and all tending to the same great end. The present dispensation supposes that there may have been one or more past dispensations, and that there may be a dispensation yet to come. It may be in itself complete, or it may bear some relation both to a former and a future economy. It may be the conclusion or completion of that which has passed away, and the preparation for something that is to come. We cannot, therefore, arrive at correct views of its nature, without forming some correct estimate of what preceded it, and having some general notion of what is to follow it.

That changes of dispensation, in the sense in which the expression has been explained, have already occurred, and that one more is yet to follow, cannot for a moment be doubted by any one who is even superficially acquainted with the Scriptures. Such changes, however, by no means imply any fickleness or actual change on the part of God. It is not, indeed, so much change, as progress, we are called to mark. The gradual development of the successive parts of a great plan, so far from evincing alteration of purpose on the part of the contriver, is often a proof of the contrary; affords evidence of the penetrating wisdom and foresight which foresees future contingencies, and effectually provides against defeating the original design. The light of the early dawn, by whose medium we imperfectly see surrounding objects, and often mistake their nature, is of the same character, and proceeds from the same source, with that meridian brightness which converts objects of terror or disgust into a scene of surpassing and ravishing splendor. So it is with the dispensations of God. The morning star, which threw a faint and twinkling ray on the once fair, but then gloomy scenes of paradise, was the harbinger of a brighter and steadier light of a distant period. The light which then dawned, though occasionally dimmed, and sometimes seemingly overpowered by the dark atmosphere through which it had to penetrate, was never afterwards entirely withdrawn. On the contrary, it gradually, though slowly, increased, diffusing through many ages a pale but celestial radiance, till at last it burst forth upon an astonished world, in the peerless splendor of the sun of righteousness. (See ADAM; NOAH; and ABRAHAM.)

But the present dispensation stands in a peculiar relation to the covenant made with Israel at Sinai, which it has entirely superseded, and with which it is often contrasted in Scripture. "So important," says Dr. Henderson, "is a right understanding of the Mosaic covenant to a correct knowledge and due appreciation of the blessings of the present covenant, that I believe I hazard no mistaken observation when I say, that nine tenths of the mistakes which have beclouded and injured Christianity, have arisen from the introduction into it of Jewish principles, practices, and errors. This was the early bane of the primitive churches, the evil against which the apostle had to struggle and to protest; which was the fruitful parent of the numerous sects and heresies into which Christianity became early divided, and which accounts for a large proportion of the difference of opinion that still prevails among Christians. I am altogether in error if this is not the root of many of the mistaken views of the future state of the kingdom of Christ which are entertained by those who consider that they have obtained more than common insight into the secret things of God, and who are as familiar with the visions of the Apocalypse as with the first principles of the gospel.

"What, then, was the dispensation of Moses? It was a peculiar form of administering the affairs of the church of God while it was in a state of pupillage and servitude, and by which both the church and the world were prepared for the establishment of a better and more enduring economy. In it, God appeared chiefly in the character of a law-giver, and the system of his administration was a species of tutorage and discipline adapted to the condition of weak, carnal, and worldly people. Under that form of God's government, men became members of his kingdom by birth and parentage,—entitled to its privileges by external conformity to its prescribed ritual,—and enjoyed, under a theocracy, peculiar immunities, while they were subject to special and severe penalties.

"The law made nothing perfect, being intended only as the introduction of a better hope. Its sacrifices, and the priesthood which was founded on them, were only shadows, and not even the images of the good things which were to come. The tabernacle and vessels of the ministry—the temple and all its glory—the land of Canaan, and the Jerusalem that was on earth—were but figures to the time then being of the great transactions of the world to come, of which we speak. Unfitted by its very nature and enactments to be a universal and permanent dispensation, the seeds of dissolution were implanted in its constitution, and preparation was made for its abrogation long before it took place. Adapted to the locality of Palestine, and never designed to extend far beyond it, the spirit of propagation and enterprise was neither recommended by its author, nor congenial with its institutions. Limited to place, temporary in duration, and preparatory in its whole design, it gradually decayed and waxed old, and was ready to vanish away, even without a positive act of dissolution—when he, whose voice shook Sinai to its foundation, once more shook, not the earth only, but also heaven; removing, by one sweeping blow, the things that were shaken, and establishing in their place the kingdom which cannot be moved.

"This is the kingdom which we have received—the dispensation to which we belong—which the apostle enjoins us to hold fast, that thus we may have grace to serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. In contrast, therefore, with the old dispensation, its character may be summed up in three words,—SPIRITUAL, UNIVERSAL, PERPETUAL. It is spiritual in its nature, universal in its adaptation and design, and destined for no temporary or subordinate purpose, but to last while the world itself shall endure; till the suffering kingdom on earth be exchanged for God's unsuffering kingdom in heaven."—Head. Buck.

DISPENSATIONS OF PROVIDENCE, are any particular or unusual modes of visible treatment to which, under the divine government, mankind are subjected. They are either merciful, or in judgment; though what frequently appear to belong to the latter class are only blessings in disguise.—Head. Buck.

DISPERSION OF MANKIND. This was occasioned by the confusion of tongues at the overthrow of Babel, Gen. 11: 9. As to the manner of the dispersion of the posterity of Noah from the plain of Shinar, it was undoubtedly conducted with the utmost regularity and order. The sacred historian informs us, that they were divided in their lands; every one, according to his tongue, according to his family, and according to his nation, Gen. 10: 5, 20, 31. The ends of this dispersion were to populate the earth, to prevent idolatry, and to display the divine wisdom and power. (See BABEL; CONFUSION OF TONGUES; and DIVISION OF THE EARTH.)—Head. Buck.

DISPOSITION; the settled order of the mind, or the general tendency of its affections.

DISPUTATION. (See CONTROVERSY.)

DISSENTERS; those who separate from, or refuse to have any fellowship with the established church.

Their origin, in England, may be traced as far back as the times of Wickliffe; but it was the year 1662 which formed the famous era of non-conformity, and laid the foundation of that more prominent and marked separation which was afterwards effected, and has continued ever since. At that period, and for some time after, the Presbyterians were the most numerous and influential section of the dissenting body in England; but for a century past, their interest has been gradually declining, owing to the introduction among them of Arian and Socinian leaven; and, at the present day, with the exception of some fifty or sixty orthodox congregations in the north of England, they are all Socinian. Their number amounts to little more than two hundred; and most of them consist only of a few individuals. During that century, and especially during what has passed of the present, the Congregational churches have greatly multiplied, so that, according to a statistic summary made in 1829, their number amounted to twelve hundred and eighty-nine. The number of Baptist congregations, at the same time, amounted to eight hundred and eighty-eight. Add to which numerous other congregations of dissenters, though not connected with the bodies just mentioned, and it may safely be estimated, that the total number of orthodox dissenting congregations in England amounts nearly to twenty-five hundred; containing an aggregate of between eight and nine hundred thousand bearers.

The Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists, though they do not allow themselves to be called dissenters, are also in a state of separation from the church of England, and have nearly three thousand places of worship, and little short of a million hearers.

Dissenters object to the church of England on the following, among other grounds. 1. That the church, as by law established and governed, is the mere creature of the state, as much as the army, the navy, the courts of justice, or the boards of customs and excise. 2. That she professes and asserts that the church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in matters of faith. 3. That she has a multiplicity of offices and dignities which are utterly at variance with the simplicity of the apostolic and primitive times. 4. That the repetitions in her liturgy are numberless and vain; that, in many respects, it abounds in antiquated references and allusions, and, in others, is miserably deficient. 5. That the Apocrypha is read as a part of the public service. 6. That the creeds which she acknowledges and repeats, contain unwarrantable metaphysical representations and speculations relative to the doctrine of the trinity. 7. That every one who is baptized is considered to be thereby regenerated and really received into the family of God. 8. That this rite, together with confirmation, the visitation of the sick, and the burial service, have a most manifest tendency to deceive and ruin the souls of men. Lastly, and more urgently than any other, that no distinction is made between the holy and the profane; the ordinances of religion being administered, without discrimination, to all who present themselves to receive them. The church and the world are thus completely amalgamated; and, as far as the system can be carried out, the nation is the church, and the church the nation.

The dissenters in Scotland are chiefly Presbyterians, who object to the established Presbyterian church on the ground of the exercise of patronage, and other encroachments on the rights and consciences of the people. They are a numerous and influential body. A considerable Congregational interest has also sprung up within the last thirty years, which at present numbers eighty-four churches, and has been the means of effecting much good in different parts of the country. The Baptists also are a growing body of dissenters.—Hend. Buck.

DISSIDENTS; a term sometimes applied to dissenters from the church of England, but more commonly and particularly used of those in Poland, who, since the year 1736, are allowed the free exercise of their respective modes of worship, including Lutherans, Calvinists, Greeks, and Armenians, but excluding Anabaptists, Socinians, and Quakers. Although the rights of the Dissidents were afterwards repeatedly confirmed, they were gradually repealed, particularly in 1717 and 1718, in the reign of Augustus II., when they were deprived of the right of voting in the diet. Late events in Poland have again placed them precisely on a level with the Catholics.—Hend. Buck.
